Rock Album has serious potential to become a huge success. Recorded in Boston with producer Matthew Ellard, who has worked with Weezer, Coolio, George Michael and Morphine, Rock Album is moderately heavy with a twist of a pop surprise. The group has been described by the Boston Globe as "a brash, take-no-prisoners band." It is certainly their goal to bring hard-hitting rock to Boston. The first track from the album, "All About It," is not too heavy, but certainly could never be considered soft rock. Other tracks such as "Rox Bottom" and "Pico De Gallo" allow the band to convince listeners that they are in your face, with nothing you can do about it.

Cheerleadr will be in the area to promote the new CD on May 5 at Bay State Hotel. If you are looking for some great, hard rock, definately check them out. A (Ryan Benharris)

SHELTER
When 20 Summers Pass
Victory

About halfway through Shelter's When 20 Summers Pass, you get the general idea of how the album is going to work, and you either love or hate it. I love it. Shelter combines hardcore/punk style music with uncharacteristically emotional and meaningful lyrics that deal with everything from spiritual worth ("Spirits Blinded"), the nature of celebrity ("Public Eye"), and finding value in integrity ("When 20 Summers Pass"). These disparate elements no doubt cause the audience to split; it may not be heavy and loud enough for the hardcore kids, while it may be too aggressive for the punk crowd. I welcome the mesh of styles, personally, and on this, Shelter's sixth album, the diversity of influences is certainly an asset.

Aside from what sets Shelter apart from the hardcore/punk scene, there are many ways they separate from today's popular music that are refreshing. All twelve songs sail by at under three minutes, and there's all work, no play, giving the rare sense of a full album in this mp3-happy time in music. And in this age where any band that simply lets their emotions be heard is suddenly worth hearing, vocalist/lyricist Ray Cappo actually has something to say. Cappo doesn't break down or cry on the album, but the emotion is in his lyrics and in his loving delivery. "When 20 Summers Pass" has an undeniable air of lost youth and uplifting memories, and "In the Van Again" is a joyous celebration of life on the road. While Cappo's lyrics don't stray too far from the usual model, there are surprises, like spirituality confronting violence in "Song Of Brahma" and the internal struggle of "Killer of My Dreams." On the strength of this, their first Victory release, Shelter should continue to enjoy success on their new label. B+ (Michael Delano) is here...

Easter entertainers have no fear,

The Ham Man

By Stephanie Witt Sedgwick
Washington Post

Country ham has come a long way since Tom Calhoun's grandfather cured his own. The farmhouse staple, born out of necessity, has become a specialty food. The producers are artisans, carefully curing their hams for both the country people, who grew up with them, and the city types, who are learning to appreciate the unique flavor of the hand-cured, slow-aged hams.

Calhoun's grandfather, like many farmers, used to slaughter his hogs in the fall. He rubbed the hind legs with salt and sugar and set them aside to cure.

Then the legs were smoked and hung to dry over the winter. It was an imperfect process. There was no way to control the temperature and the hams aged differently each year. If the winter was warm, more salt was added to prevent spoilage and the ham became saltier. The goal was to preserve the ham.

"The main thing my grandfather was interested in was making sure he had ham through August and September," says Calhoun.

Today it's a different story. Consistency, quality and flavor in the final product are the goals. There are still some people who like to cure their own ham, but it is far more likely that the country ham on the table has been purchased, either from a large operation like Smithfield Packing Co. in Smithfield, Va., or from one of a handful of small country ham producers such as Calhoun's Ham House in Culpeper, Va.

The shop is a window back in time, filled with country hams, cured sides and ham hocks. Calhoun's curing process, on the other hand, involves more than a little help from modern conveniences like temperature-controlled rooms, a customized salt mix and ventilation systems. The hams are less salty, less likely to spoil and far more consistent in flavor and texture than those his grandfather made.

And it's that flavor – salty, smoky and deep – that's attracting a new audience. Samuel Edwards, president of S. Wallace Edwards & Sons, a retail store and mail-order company in Surry, Va., has a comparison he likes to use for standard brine-cured ham and country ham: "It's the diffrence between American processed cheese and a fine aged cheddar."

The statement speaks to where the industry is going too. While old country recipes call for frying slices of country ham or slicing ham for ham biscuits, Edwards sees country ham competing with prosciutto and other specialty hams for a shire of the gourmet market.

"It's a treat, an enhancement for other dishes," he explains. The National Country Ham Association has a glossy brochure filled with recipes from chefs around the country illustrating country ham's versatility.

Calhoun has also seen the market moving in that direction. Fifty percent of his business is now from out of town, and he gets calls from chefs across the country requesting his ham. He knows these chefs are using the ham in ways his grandfather never imagined.

But Calhoun thinks the best way to eat country ham is the old way. He cooks the hams, waits until the meat gets cold, then slices it into very thin slivers, which he sandwiches in the middle of small baked yeast rolls. After tasting the ham this way, it's hard to argue with him.

Tube Notes Nick is mad

Why am I mad? I'll tell you why I'm mad. The world of television is going straight to Hell, from CBS's crappy shows and NBC's diving ratings to ABC's executives totaling rearranging their schedule so that now we have a "20/20" for every night of the week. This is the time when networks begin working on new shows to see who will get spots in next fall's line up. It's also the time of year when they throw on God-awful TV movies to raise ratings. If things continue the way they are going now, I just might not watch TV at all. Okay, so that's a stretch, I'll watch it, but by God I won't like it.

First of all, TV movies are a waste of time. They all suck. Besides any Stephen King made-for-TV-movie (with the exception of "The Shining") can you name one good, and I mean freakin' spectacular, TV movie? NO! And the ones coming around the next month are real winners. CBS, the channel that doesn't really matter and is only still around because Dan Rather owes his career to it and it carries football, is releasing the movie "Jesus" soon. I couldn't have said it better myself. It's one thing to make a movie about O.J. or David Koresh. I can even understand "Small Shacks, Long Letters: The Ted Kaczinsky story", but do we really need the morally upright CBS thome of "Touched by an Angel", the mutated offspring of "Highway to Heaven") to retell the life and death of Jesus of Nazareth. And this is kind of one sided. I mean, only a small fraction of the Earth's population believes that Jesus is the messiah. In the interest of fairness, shouldn't they also produce Islam, Judaism and Buddhist stories?

Tube Notes with Nicholas Pizzolato

Is anyone actually going to watch this? The people who watch it will be the same people who watch other CBS shows. They are people over the age of 55 who don't believe in the sultry comedy of "Who's Line is it Anyway" and "Will & Grace". Even if you didn't go to church every Sunday or didn't read the bible, you probably know the story of Jesus. He is one of the most influential figures in history, not just religion. But it everyone knows of Christ's story, then why is a movie being made about it? That is one thing I have never understood. Why do people make movies where you already know what happens? Titanic for example: You walked into the theater knowing the boat was going to sink. Not to mention that "Jesus" also has a soundtrack, featuring the singing talents of LeAnn Rimes and Hootie and the Blowfish. For those of you interested, it will air May 14 and 15. Judge for yourself.

For those of you who loved "The 60's", NBC's musical story of one of the most turbulent times in American history, you're in luck because coming soon is "The 70's". Like last year's "60s," the new miniseries promises to the same format: an awful script with the soundtrack that accompanies the entire show. I never knew that Bob Dylan's music played in the background of anything important that happened in the sixties. But according to "The 60s" there was same magical loud speaker that blasted his music all throughout the country. After watching "The 60s" I had no idea what I saw. Was it a documentary about the sixties? Was it a people documentary? Was it both? I just don't know. I think Jerry O'Connell was in it but he disappeared for all of episode one and his performance in episode two was sub-par compared to his past performances, not that he has or is going to be recognized for anything else he has done ten years from now (except may be the teen series "My Secret Identity"). It's a whole new group of people in "The 70's" (they just look the same) who have know each other since high school.

This is the point where I would right something witty about the plot of the show, but just reading the NBC synopsis is confusing enough. And if it's confusing to read, that means that it will make no sense on television. What scares me even more is that the next "musical experience" that NBC makes will be "The 80s". Which of course will be about yuppies, Wall Street, and Reagan, with a soundtrack that you can already hear if you buy soundtracks to The Wedding Singer, Rushy and Michelle's High School Reunion, and Grosse Point Blank.

And that's just one half of the reason why I'm pissed. The other reason is just a plain old gripe about programming. ABC has shelved the Emmy Award winning show "SportsNight", for an unknown period of time. This is despite the fact that Kyra Sedgwick's new comedy "Talk to Me", which from what I've seen is a woman's version of "Frasier". Sedgwick, probably known best for her performances in Born on the Fourth of July and Phenomenon plays Janey Munro, a radio personality. The series also stars "MAD TV" alum Nicole Sullivan as her sister. Probably the best sign that this show will fail is that Beverly D'Angelo is the antagonist of the show. D'Angelo the star of the National Lampoon's Family Vacation series and the breakthrough film American History X. Any network that recruits film stars to be stars in its sitcom knows from the start that it is going to fail. And as the execs wait to see when the ratings go into negative numbers, we "SportsNight" fans want it back.

Also to my disappointment, ABC has put "Wonderland" on the shelf. While the executives re-evaluate its time slot opposite "ER" and its content, "Wonderland" is being replaced by "20/20 Downtown". That's what we need – some more television news magazines. Either "Dateline" or "20/20" is on every night during the week. How many times do we have to see a McDonald's burger chef sneeze into our hamburger or a mechanic rip us off? And what's the difference between "20/20 Downtown" and regular "20/20"? Every story these days is about Elian anyway. I think that the exec should give "Wonderland" more of a chance. Plus, don't put it against "ER" – that's just asking for a show to be killed in ratings. Throw it on opposite any CBS show and I guarantee ratings will go up.

Biking

The Norwottuck Trail (named after a local Native American tribe) connects Amherst to Hadley and Northampton through an 8.5 mile paved bicycle path that runs parallel to route 9, along an old Boston & Main Railroad right-of-way. Parking is available at Elwell State Park on Damon Road in Northampton and Station Road in South Amherst.

If eight miles sounds too daunting, Northampton maintains a 2.6 mile paved bike path roughly parallel to the Connecticut River. The trail starts at Look Park on Rt. 9 2.5 miles northwest of downtown Northampton.

Canoeing

For great class-two whitewater, head north to the Deerfield River (but be careful to avoid Zoar Gap, unless you're prepared for a sudden surge of class-four). You can rent boating equipment and get directions from the Zoar Outdoors outfitting company, (800) 532-7483, in Charlemont.

Camping

Ahh, camping. There's nothing as relaxing as spending a weekend away from every possible trapping of modern civilization, cooking your food over an open fire, spending your evenings singing hippie songs on poorly tuned guitars, sleeping beneath the stars (until the mosquitoes come out, that is), making day trips for fishing, canoeing, and hiking, and just enjoying the outdoors.

The best campgrounds in Western Mass are state-run, and there are plenty to choose from. North of UMass, along 202, are Otter River State Forest (1978) 939-8962) and Lake Dennison State Park (1978) 939-8962). Otter River has access to several miles of trails that tour woodlands and wetlands, and Lake Dennison offers boating and swimming.

Along route 2A is Erving State Forest, which has significantly fewer camping sites than Otter River or Lake Dennison. Fewer sites mean a greater chance arriving to no vacancies, but it also means that those who do find a spot (which should be no problem early in the season) can enjoy increased privacy and peacefulness. One of the Forest's maintained trails leads to a high outcropping of rock that offers a beautiful view of rolling hills leading into the Berkshire Mountains.

The Quabbin Reservoir

As a means of supplying a growing Boston with sufficient water, the Swift River was dammed up and its valley flooded, eliminating four towns and creating the state's largest body of water. The Quabbin Reservoir, surrounded by a buffer of forest and wetlands, offers solitude and a sense of true wilderness beyond anything else to be found in Massachusetts (the last time I went boating on the Quabbin, I spotted several bald eagles). Boats can be rented from several places along the Quabbin's borders (best to head north on 202), or you can head east on route 9; pass through the Belchertown set of lights, and a few miles down the road on your left will be a park entrance. From here, you can explore on foot one portion of the Quabbin's grounds, and take a look at the massive earthen dike that holds Boston's drinking water.

Fine arts are even finer in spring

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff

With only two or three weeks of classes left, now's the time to ignore responsibility and take advantage of the many spring themed, solar inspired fine arts events in the five college area. Plays, concerts, art shows and nature parties are all using the April-May renaissance as an excuse to perform, get together, and entertain one more time before the semester ends. Here's just a bit of what you have to choose from:

The weekend of April 27 through 29 will host a variety of theatre productions. Here in the lovely Durfee Conservatory Gardens (that pretty little space across from the Public Health building) three one-acts will be performed: The Universal Language by David Ives, The Line That's Picked Up 1,000 Babes (And How it Can Work for You) by Eric Berlin, and Women and Wallance by Jonathan March Sherman. Performances on April 27 and 28 begin at 6:00 p.m. and April 29 at 2:00 and 6:00 p.m. And admission, if you can believe it, is free.

Smith College will present their own Spring Festival of One Acts each night at 8:00, featuring Fool for Love and Cowboy Mouth, both by Sam Shepard – also free admission.

Ongoing at the University Gallery is Soft White: Lighting Designs by Artists. This exhibit displays a variety of objects that fall within the general design conventions of electric lamps and chandeliers and their subsequent mockers. Okay, this isn't so vernal, but you should go anyway.

Leave it to Hampshire College Farm Center to organize a community Wake Up the Earth Celebration on April 29, beginning at 9:30, running through the day and into the balmy night. The day will include face painting, pony rides, vegetable printing, instrument making, mask making, origami and pinwheel crafts, cake walk, a petting zoo, theater productions, musical acts and a fantastic puppet parade.

And spring just wouldn't be spring without the University's Vocal Jazz Ensemble's May Day performance, scheduled for May 1 at 8:00 p.m. in the Bezanson Recital Hall.

For more artistic dedications to Spring, check out the Five College Calendar events online at www.fivecolleges.edu.

Chronicle of Holocaust

By Dennis McLellan
Los Angeles Times

As the founder of Chapman University's Holocaust education program, Marilyn J. Harran teaches two courses a year on the subject. She's familiar with World War II's atrocities, and she has heard survivors' first-hand accounts of life and death in Nazi concentration camps.

But as a contributing author to the newly released "The Holocaust Chronicle: A History in Words and Pictures," she wasn't prepared for the emotional toll the work would take on her.

"I got to where I didn't want to get up in the morning," said

Harran, 51, a professor of religious studies and history at the university in Orange, Calif. "I thought, 'I don't know if I can keep doing it.' You start sitting there crying at the computer."

The purpose of "The Holocaust Chronicle" Publications International) is "to bring the truth of the Holocaust to as many people as possible," said Louis Weber, whose Illinois-based company published the not-for-profit book in March. Publications International also produces Consumer Guide magazine, children's interactive books and books based on chronologies, such as "A Hundred Years of the Automobile."

Weber said that, having achieved success over the past 30 years, he decided to publish the book and distribute it as widely as possible to "create something that would give back to my people, the Jewish people, and give kind of a legacy to my kids and grandchildren."

The 63-year-old businessman vividly recalls the European Jews who began moving into his west Chicago neighborhood in late 1945.

"We lived on the second floor, and we had a good view of 18th Street, and I remember looking out the window and seeing these people walking by," he said. "They just stared straight ahead, like walking mummies. It kind of frightened me, and I didn't comprehend what was going on. As I grew up, I began to understand the suffering these people went through.

The oversized, hardcover book 765 pages and nearly seven pounds tells the story of the Holocaust through 1,700 photographs, illustrations and more than 250 stories covering the years 1933 through 1946. It also has a 3,000-item timeline of Holocaust-related events.

While "The Holocaust Chronicle" typically retails for $35, similar books sell for $75 to $100, but Weber felt that price range was too expensive.

"How many people are going to buy if you charge that much? I've sold the book at a low enough wholesale price it could sell for as low as $15 to as high as $35, depending upon the merchants," Weber said. "I'm basically selling it for what the value of the paper, printing and binding is."

He also plans to offer international publishing rights at no charge.

The first printing was 50,000 copies, thousands of which are being given to synagogues, churches, schools and public libraries, he said. Also, a companion site reproduces the entire text and a revolving selection of images (http://www.holocaustchronicle.org).

"The public will be able to download not only what's in the book, but hopefully in the future, we'll add (updated text and images) and make this a comprehensive resource for anyone interested in knowing more about the Holocaust," Weber said.

"It's a museum between the covers of a book," said John Roth, another contributing editor who is one of the world's leading Holocaust scholars

Heavy Godsmack and Sheila Divine rule BMA

By Tom Sadlowski
Collegian Staff

BOSTON – The only surprise at this year's 13th Annual Boston Music Awards at the Orpheum Theater was how Godsmack and The Sheila Divine failed to come away with more than four awards. Each artist led the 161 nominees with 6 nominations.

Godsmack, riding the success of their double platinum self-titled debut, enjoyed top honors with Act of the Year. They also were awarded Outstanding Rock Band, Outstanding Male Vocalist (Sully Erna) and Outstanding Song / Songwriter ("Keep Away" / Sully Erna). However, former New Kid on the Block's Jordan Knight and Joey McIntyre denied them for Single of the Year and Video of the Year. Their follow up album is slated for a summer release.

The Sheila Divine commanded the indie label category with Outstanding Rock Band, while their Roadrunner Records debut, New Parade, won them an award for Album of the Year. Lead singer Aaron Perrino also picked up an award for Outstanding Male Vocalist.

The band's radio breakthrough single "Hum" was denied by Susan Tedeschi for Single of the Year. The Grammy nominated Tedeschi went on to win two other awards, Outstanding Female Vocalist and Outstanding Blues Act.

Debut Album of the Year for an indie label went to The Pills for Wide Awake With The Pills.

Powerman 5000 earned both Album of the Year for a major label and Rising Star. The Push Stars, who were awarded with Rising Star last year, obtained Outstanding Debut Rock Band.

Outstanding Hardcore / Metal Band went to Tree.

Northampton resident Mark Trelli, winner at last year's Kerrville Folk Festival was unfortunately passed up for Debut Folk / Acoustic Album by Jabe's Twenty Point Turn.

The Boston Music Awards was a kick off to the NEMO Music Showcase & Conference which included daytime seminars and panels at the Swissotel and evening performances by over 200 bands dispersed throughout twenty clubs.

Fans lucky enough to obtain a ticket witnessed Godsmack tear down the intimate and newly renovated Axis in a potent 60-minute set that consisted of a split between old and unreleased material. Godsmack experimented with tracks that may be on their heavily anticipated follow-up album.

The Sheila Divine played to a packed Axis crowd the night before with a similar philosophy.

Highlights of the conference included the Big Bad Bollock's set at Bill's Bar which saw lead singer John Allen stripping down to his boxers and the band's guitarist trading in his pick for a glass of Guinness. Tree vocalist River flipping off of Axis' stage to mosh with the crowd, and Waltham's frontman singing and dancing with patrons at TT the Bears.

and a professor of philosophy at Claremont McKenna College. "There is nothing quite like this book, as far as I know, anywhere in the world." He wrote the essays that begin each chapter as well as the prologue, the epilogue and some other passages.

The book's photographs, many of which had never been published, came from collections at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., and Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, as well as other archives and private collections.

As part of her contribution to the book, Harran wrote 500 photo captions.

"Many of them were really mini research projects to try to find out what was going on at the time, what was most meaningful about this (particular) photo and interpret it in a way that would be meaningful and engaging to someone who has little knowledge of the Holocaust," she said.

Inspired by the black-and-white cover photo of a wide-eyed young girl found in 1945 in the typhus ward at Bergen-Belsen concentration camp in Germany, Harran inaugurated a student Holocaust essay contest tied into the book's publication.

"It just occurred to me that Mr. Weber's goal was to get this book in the hands of young people, and what better way to connect their voices with the picture of this little girl? Here's the young people our future connecting to the past in a very individual way," Harran said.

Students at 47 high schools and middle schools in California's Orange County and three in Los Angeles County were asked to give the girl a voice in a 500-word essay. The 1939 Club, a Los Angeles-based Holocaust-survivor organization, gave $500 prizes to the two winners. They were honored March 13 at a public ceremony at Chapman University.

Harran, who hopes to make the essay contest an annual event and expand it, received the club's Teacher of the Holocaust Award in February during a ceremony honoring Weber.

Harran, whose academic background is in the 16th-century Reformation, began including the Holocaust in the university's freshman seminar program in 1987. She founded its Holocaust education program in 1984 and plans to focus the rest of her career on the Holocaust and European history during that period.

That she, a non-Jew, does so much to teach younger generations about the Holocaust amazes song of her Jewish friends, including survivors she has invited to speak on campus.

"I don't find it remarkable," Harran said. "That's what we should all be talking about. This is a humanity issue, and education is critical."

She says her experience researching and writing portions of the chronicle affected her deeply, giving her "so much more respect and awe for the survivors.

"How could you trust humanity again after this? And yet the survivors that I've come to be friends with and know well are (people) of enormous warmth and trust and humanity."

Arts needs fine arts writers! Come down to the campus center basement and talk to Kristi or Ryan. You'll be glad you did.

Pimpadelic display some Southern Devilish attitudes

PIMPADELIC

Tommy Boy

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Many people head to the video store on Friday to pick out an overstocked new release of a film that they missed in the theater, like maybe The Mummy or The Insider as recent examples. One is some adventurous, escapist fun; the other a sobering look at corporate influences on journalism, and both are fine choices. But when my friend and I headed to Video to Go last weekend we ended up with Dario Argento's The Deep Red Hatchet Murders, a 1975 entry into the world of Italian horror films. Why? Besides the fact that we love horror films, we're all about the genre. Hell yes, the more corny and cheesy is really the better in our minds, and Deep Red fit the bill nicely with some ridiculous acting and deliciously over-the-top death scenes. As far as the artistic value of this film, I would rather not comment and I would rather not comment on the artistic value of Southern Devils, the third and first to be widely released album from Ft. Worth bad-boys Pimpadelic. But if you're looking for an alternative to today's pompous, high-class bands that don't mention weed, whiskey, and sex fantasies nearly enough, than Pimpadelic is right up your alley. And for fans of the cheese, like myself, a band that's all about the "hoes, cash, and sour mash," simply has to be divinely guided.

An introduction to the fine gentlemen of Pimpadelic is in order, or at least one more in-depth than the one you get after opening the CD case: vocalist/MC/guitarist Easy Jesus leaning against a pool table, holding a bottle of Lone Star beer while grabbing his crotch. Accompanying the Easy rider is MC Dirty K, drummer Madison, bassist Cha Chi R Cola, and DJ MIA. Listening to Pimpadelic's silly rap/rock is strictly optional; you'll learn everything you need to know from the booklet, which contains both bikini-clad and topless girls, band members doing various things to the aforementioned ladies, and the heart of Pimpadelic, the lyrics.

You have to be in the right set of mind to appreciate Pimpadelic's lyrics. If you think maybe Limp Bizkit's "Snack" or Snot's "I Jus' Lie" has prepared you for the extreme over-the-top misogyny presented here, you're probably wrong. But take into account that it's all in good fun and that Pimpadelic's concerts are reportedly filled with (uninhibited) women, and it's hard for even the most hardened of feminists to be up in arms over the lyrics. "Eatin' up your girl like tooth decay" and "Callin' me boss, while your girl grips my sauce" are two examples of the more humorous sections of Easy Jesus' flow, although when he spits forth nuggets of knowledge about "underage sex" and "rawdog," Pimpadelic effectively prevents itself from being quoted at length in the Collegian.

While skipping out on the actual listening portion of Pimpadelic is the route many a discerning listener would opt for, a disservice is done since you miss out on all the funny music references that are littered throughout the fourteen tracks. Inspecktah Deck's famous "Triumph" opening is quoted in "Caught it from Me," and the lovable Big Baby Jesus, otherwise known as Ol' Dirty Bastard, finds his notorious 'Shimmy Shimmy Ya" declaration of how he likes it quoted on not one but two tracks. Run DMC and Erykah Badu are both borrowed from as well, while rock acts like Motley Crue and Corrosion of Conformity balance out the rock and the rap influences. The funniest shout-out, however, goes to Ozzy Osbourne, when Easy Jesus sings portions of the "I Don't Know" and complements one of the Ozzman's lines with "When you're a pimp you got to be hated."

Thankfully the lyrics and flow are usually enjoyable, because musically Pimpadelic is pretty dismal. Easy Jesus' rapping is somewhere between Fred Durst and Kid Rock, which is certainly not a complement, and the DJ skills are only passable. The music is strictly in the background for the most part, and thankfully, since there isn't much exciting going on back there. In the end, Pimpadelic is simply Kid Rock's entertaining white trash rapper schtick taken to the rebel yell extremes it should have been all along. But without a song even as enjoyable as Rock's pounding "Bawitdaba," these guys are running on the fumes of their lyrics and image. As cheese, however, Pimpadelic hits the spot as a beautiful diversion from much of today's plodding aggro, and there is no doubt in my mind that Pimpadelic is a live show that simply has to be experienced. to people through actions.

In 1974, she helped to create the Women's Sports Foundation, a national nonprofit organization dedicated to promoting the participation of girls and women in sports. The organization also seeks to create an educated public that supports females' participation and supports gender equality in sports.

Another major project that King focused on since retiring from professional competition in the early eighties is World TeamTennis. TeamTennis, of which King is director and official spokesperson of, is America's only professional co-ed team sport. Much like her Women's Foundation, TeamTennis is aimed at bringing men and women together on a level playing field.

Her extensive charity work has helped to raise money for, among others, the United Negro College Fund, Elton John's AIDS Foundation and the National AIDS Fund.

Coach Dixon, a longtime friend of King's, praised the University for securing such an important and public figure.

"I'm very pleased the University is honoring her," said Dixon. "She has done so much for athletics in general, and society as a whole. I think it's fitting we honor someone of her stature."

Although her persistent lobbying and commitment to social equality has broken many barriers, it is her accomplishment on the tennis court that will always define her in the public eye.

During her professional career, King was ranked the top tennis player in the world five times, and was listed among the top 10 players in the world for a total of 17 years. She won a record 20 Wimbledon titles (six of them in singles), as well as four U.S. Opens and the Triple Crown in both the British and American championships. In 1971, she became the first woman athlete to win more than $100,000 in any sport.

It was a 1972 publicity match, however, that brought King the most media attention of her career. In front of a record 30,472 fans, King disposed of Bobby Riggs in the much-hyped "Battle of the Sexes." Tired of Riggs' condescending attitude toward women, King accepted his challenge and defeated the one-time Wimbledon champion in three straight sets.

"I didn't feel it was a very big accomplishment athletically," said King of the Riggs match in a 1998 interview with Newsweek. "But psychologically and emotionally it was a big deal...that match wasn't just about women. It was about equal opportunity.

played hard."

Sara MacNabb, a senior defender, was the first on the board yesterday afternoon, scoring on a pass from Minaker at 28:59. Meile went end to end on her first goal, putting UMass up 4-2 at 13:53.

Pavlick's third goal of the day was the product of a beautiful backhand shot, after receiving the ball from Nabor.

MacNabb, who had four assists, got her first on a toss to Nabor, whose second and winning goal ricocheted in then out of the cage, putting the Minutewomen up 9-3.

NHL

had no goals. Most of the credit for keeping Bure quiet goes to defenseman Scott Stevens, who has done a solid job in shadowing the speedy forward

"Ray Bourque and the Colorado Avalanche power play. Isn't it beautiful?

"Stu Barnes kept the Buffalo Sabres alive for one more game the other night, scoring at 4:42 into overtime to force a game five against Philadelphia. "You just react at that point," Barnes said in an interview after the game. "I can't say I even picked the corner. I just tried to get it on net, and fortunately it went where the goalie wasn't." Nice effort, Stu, really, but you'll be heading to where the goalies aren't too, as soon as Philly sends your Sabres packing.

"Guy Carbonneau, the oldest player in the NHL at 40, is having a great first round with Dallas against the Edmonton Oilers. On Tuesday night, Carbonneau led his teammates to a 4-3 victory over Edmonton that gave the Stars a 3-1 series lead. In an age where spoiled teenagers rule professional sports, it's great to see a classy veteran like Carbonneau contributing to the success of his team.

"The "Phantom Goal" that John LeClair "scored" last week against the Sabres just goes to show how incredibly apathetic the NHL has become in ensuring that all contests end fairly. The puck went in through a hole in the netting, a flaw which was quickly pointed out to on-ice officials. The league reviewed and discussed, prompting commissioner Gary Bettman to say, "things happen and people just have to live with it. The game must go on." This is true in many cases, but not this one. This is playoff hockey, where a team's season is at stake, and to compromise that by virtually ignoring the facts is completely unprofessional and simply wrong. What we have here are men fighting for the Stanley Cup, not children involved in a pickup game. No "do-overs." It's a disgrace to the game, and an absolute shame that Buffalo was sent home on what should have been just a temporary delay of game. When you have 82 games worth of hockey behind you, a few minutes is not too much to ask.

The Maroon and White came out firing on all cylinders in the game's opening minutes, taking a 3-0 lead at the 4:06 mark of the first quarter when Rich Kunkel, amidst a scrum in front of the Harvard cage, picked up the loose ball and nestled it by Cynar, who was well out of position. The Crimson then answered much like Maryland-Baltimore County had in its 9-8 overtime victory two weeks back. The Ivy Leaguers ran off five straight, the last one coming by way of Primm, who drove left side on John Hutchen to crash the cage with his 20th goal of the season.

UMass weathered the storm with two scores of its own, as Jeremy Guski and Keith Gabrielli each got beautiful looks in front to find the back of the net. The latter's effort knotted the record at 5-5. The teams traded goals before Harvard's Lawson DeVries, who notched a hat trick on the afternoon, posted his second of the day to close out the scoring column for the first half.

Balanced offense was the key for the Minutemen, who got multi-goal games from Gabrielli, Guski, Ianowicz and Alex Racioppi. Racioppi has scored five goals in the last two games, pushing his total to nine after yesterday.

"Any time you beat a team ranked thirteenth in the country, it's a big win for the program," Cannella said. "We proved it for a half against Loyola and today we did it for two halves."

As a whole, the Minutemen looked like an entirely different squad from last week's loss to the Greyhounds. After being routed for 30 minutes against the Marylanders, UMass bounced back with a solid effort on both sides, including a 46-22 advantage in the shot column. Cynar picked up 15 saves, but it was one too few on the afternoon.

"It was a collective effort. Our guys have confidence in their abilities and when you win, it reinforces everything."

The Minutemen travel to the nation's capital this weekend for a clash with No. 5 Georgetown. The Hoyas are 9-1 on the season, including a perfect 4-0 mark in the ECAC.

It's all attack and win for Lax squads

Defense settles down, Janowicz takes over in squeaker over No. 13 Crimson

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

UMass	10
Harvard	9

Big win.

Its confidence draining with each loss tacked on, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team needed a victory not only for its playoff hopes, but for its morale. With three consecutive losses sitting uncomfortably on their shoulders, the Minutemen used a strong defensive stand in the second half to secure a 10-9 victory over No. 13 Harvard yesterday afternoon at Richard F. Garber Field.

Since the 8:29 mark of the second quarter, the teams were no further apart than a single goal. But it was Mike Janowicz's tally with 14:34 remaining in the final frame that put the Minutemen (5-5, 1-3 CAC) ahead for good, despite the overabundance of time for Harvard to even things up. After a loose ball in the defensive zone, Chris Gabrielli stormed downfield, firing a pass crossfield to a wide-open Janowicz on the left wing, who beat Harvard goaltender Keith Cynar with a bullet.

"C-Gab came down the field and the long pole drew the defense to his side," Janowicz said. "When I got it, I just put it where the goalie wasn't."

One waited for an answer from the Crimson (6-4, 2-2 Ivy League), as the game had gone back and forth all afternoon long. However, their reply would never be voiced. The Minuteman defense, after surrendering 23 goals in the past four quarters, dating back to Saturday's second half collapse against Loyola, buckled down and yielded just two goals after intermission, which included a scoreless fourth stanza.

"We asked our guys to play as a team," head coach Greg Cannella said. "You can't leave someone out on an island and expect them to play 1-on-1. It was a collective effort.

"We played four quarters, the end of Loyola and the first half against Harvard, that was pretty rough on us. Then we played a really good half against a really good team.

With three minutes left in the third quarter, Harvard's Matt Primm beat UMass netminder Chris Campolettano with a point-blank shot from up front to put the cross-state rivals ahead, 9-8. Then Janowicz took over. The Upper Arlington, OH native got a pretty feed from John Madigan to beat Cynar from a tough angle on the right side.

It was Janowicz's ninth goal of the season, whose offensive production heated up as the game's tempo slowed down. After a fast-paced two periods of play, UMass trailed 7-6, as its defense looked vulnerable only days following a 16-goal second half eruption by Loyola. This time, UMass picked its points and reeled in the win.

"In the second half, the defense just settled down," defenseman Matt McFarland said. "We were hectic and running around and we weren't really playing our game. Then we settled down and played composed."

Pavlick helps Minutewomen shoot down Hawks in scoring extravaganza

St. Joseph's	8

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team went Hawk hunting yesterday at Totman Field, obliterating St. Joseph's by a final score of 18-8.

UMass took control early, scoring six goals in the first 20 minutes of action to leave St. Joe's far behind.

By the end of the first half, the Maroon and White enjoyed a 12-3 edge. Senior midfielder Stephanie Pavlick increased her season goal total from 16 to 20, while junior midfielder Rachel Ingraffea jacked her tally of scores from 14 from 11. Junior attacker Fay Nabor notched two of the four goals she scored in the game over the first half, as well as two assists.

On the other side of the scoreboard, St. Joe's junior attack Bernadette Smith was doing her best to keep her team in the game, netting one of her four goals. Smith was helped out by freshman attack Brett Dymarczyk and senior midfielder Donna Burke, who chipped in with a goal apiece.

UMass finished the first half strong, with six of its goals coming in the final 10 minutes of the half. It carried that momentum into the second half, scoring four more in the first 10 minutes of that half.

Nabor contributed the second half of her four-goal game in this period, and senior defender Melissa Miele tallied her second goal of the afternoon. Also adding a point in the opening moments of the second half was senior midfielder Rebecca Minaker, who scored her 15th goal of the season to run the score to 16-4.

Freshman midfielder Kelli Kurtz netted her fifth goal of the season and freshman Leslie Pollock put the ball in the net for the second time this semester before the 20-minute mark.

UMass' offense was quiet for the rest of the game, but the defense stood strong, allowing the Hawks only four more goals against junior goalie Jen Nardi, and letting the biscuit slip past backup freshman goalie Cyndi Doyle just once.

The second half was not as productive for the Hawks, who put only five more points on the board. Smith, bringing her season total to 34, netted three of the team's second-half goals. Sophomore defender Anne Blank and freshman attacker Shannon Hungate each contributed one goal.

UMass dominated the game all around. The Minutewomen took 39 shots on net, eight of which were saved by sophomore starting goalie Lauren Bradley, and two were stopped by freshman backup goalie, Kristen Olszak.

UMass won 18 of 23 draws, and picked up 24 groundballs. St. Joe's grabbed 18.

Coming off their loss to Virginia Tech, the Minutewomen knew that this game was important. "We knew that we only had two more games left in the Atlantic 10," Pavlick said. "And they mean the most."

"We gave a great effort today," coach Phil Barnes said. "The kids

It's a Catamount catastrophe
UMass, Morgan find winning way

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

In case you haven't heard, "the early bird catches the worm."

Although it seems like the Massachusetts baseball team has been mastering the art of "the comeback," that's really not the case. The key factor for the Minutemen is in grabbing the early lead, because every time they do, the outcome is a triumphant one.

Yesterday, they added to this notion with an 8-2 shellacking of the University of Vermont Tuesday's loss to UConn was a tough pill to swallow, and the Minutemen made sure that they were ready for this battle with hands ready on the muskets. And they fired quickly.

Catcher Chris Morgan, back after a one-day rest, drove a single to center field to lead off the top-half of the second inning. Kevin O'Connell followed with a single to right field that allowed Morgan an easy trot to second. Aaron Senez then put down a sacrifice bunt that scored Morgan. Senez was able to reach base because of an error by Vermont first baseman Josh Tehonica, but was caught stealing on the next pitch. Jeff Altieri hit a sacrifice fly to left field to bring in O'Connell for the second and final run of the inning, giving UMass the 2-0 lead.

Vermont struck back in the third inning, plating one run on two hits aided by an error courtesy of centerfielder Nick Guarneauli. UMass starter Nick Skirkanich was able to hold the Catamounts to the lonely run, by forcing a Tehonica groundout to end the inning, stranding three UVM runners.

Morgan led off the top of the fourth inning with another line single to center field. After an O'Connell fly out to center, Senez drove a double to right field to push Morgan to third. Morgan scored when Altieri flew out to center for his second RBI on the day. Gavin Clark then struck out swinging, but was able to get to first on a wild pitch that plated Senez. Matt Boulanger singled to left field, driving in Clark to give the Minutemen a 5-1 lead.

It was all just a road to glory from there on in as the Maroon and White would bring three more runs to the plate while surrendering just one. Skirkanich picked up the win, allowing only five hits during the eight innings he hurled. He fanned seven Vermont batters and walked only four in the victory.

On the offensive side, Morgan led the way with three hits, but Boulanger provided a much-needed spark by going 2-for-3 and driving in two runs.

"Coach just told us to stay positive, to not let our heads down, and try to start a winning streak," Boulanger said. "We didn't play that well today, but we got enough hits to keep us ahead. And Nick pitched well for us."

With the win, the Minutemen improve to 14-14-1 overall, while the Catamounts drop to 17-15 on the season.

Fordham will travel to Amherst from Bronx, NY this weekend to challenge UMass in a three-game Atlantic 10 Conference series. The first game begins on Friday at noon. The Minutemen will scuffle with the Rams in a doubleheader on Friday afternoon, followed by a single game on Saturday at noon.

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

The Minutemen came to play yesterday in Vermont, topping the Catamounts by a score of 8-2.

Playoffs begin; San Jose chews Blues

Matt Despres on the NHL

God bless the San Jose Sharks.

Since their entrance into the NHL in May of 1990, the Sharks have largely existed to serve one purpose: to take out the legs of the first seed of the Western conference each year in the opening round of the Stanley Cup playoffs. Maybe they take a series, or maybe they only take a few games. The point is, the Sharks make teams earn victories the old fashioned way: blood, sweat and tears. Just ask coach Joel Quenneville and his St. Louis Blues.

The Blues steamrolled through the regular season, and popular thought (myself included) was that they would continue rolling all the way to the finals. As of yesterday afternoon, however, the Blues found themselves trailing the Sharks 2-1 in the opening round, with game four scheduled for 10:30 p.m. last night. Should they escape the first round, the Blues will be followed by a cloud of caution, aware that they are no longer an unconquerable entity. An abundance of confidence propelled the Blues along through the 2000 season, and now that some of it has been chipped away, fans are left wondering what this club is really made of.

The loss of Pavol Demitra to post-concussion syndrome has certainly been a factor, though the loss of a single player is not a legitimate excuse for a first round collapse. The team survived injuries all season without incident, most notably to Al MacInnis, and has enough talent to cover the loss of one individual. Pierre Turgeon needs to get his regular season groove back, and Chris Pronger simply needs to check in with the usual solid effort that has rapidly made him the games most dominant young defenseman. In net, the Blues are solid but untested. Turek is a Vezina candidate for sure, but has no playoff experience. He has done an admirable job between the pipes, though, and continues to turn in 60 strong minutes while the rest of his team tries to catch up.

So what exactly are the Sharks, who went 0-4-1 against St. Louis in the regular season, doing right? Basically, everything. As the eighth seed, they carry few expectations, and have the element of surprise on their side (Although, in the case of San Jose, surprise should soon be removed from the equation). Owen Nolan has turned up his game, and Steve Shields has performed remarkably well in the face of a potent Blues offense. They have absolutely nothing to lose, and are enjoying every minute of their upset in the making. For a minute here, I'll almost forgive the sin that is NHL expansion.

Almost.

*A quick note before I jump into the rest of the post-season. The Boston Bruins announced yesterday afternoon that coach Pat Burns will return for the 2000-2001 NHL season. The move by management to retain Burns offers Beantown fans a light at the end of what has grown to be a long, and very dark tunnel. I've written enough on this subject already; keep Burns until he wants to leave.

Notes from the NHL notebook:

*The New Jersey Devils, who are looking to make the second round of the playoffs for the first time in three years, have managed to do something few teams could during the regular season: silence the Russian Rocket, Pavel Bure. Bure struck for 58 goals and one Anna Kournikova during the regular season, which in my book should give him an "Advance to Round Two for Free" card. Things don't work that way, however, and as of yesterday afternoon the Panthers were down 3-0 and Bure

Softball to battle Fordham

Minutewomen crash New York to tell own Bronx tale

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

There is good news and bad news for those people planning on traveling down to Bronx, NY in order to watch the Massachusetts softball team take on Fordham this Friday at 3:30PM. The bad news is that the game will not take place on Friday.

However, the good news is that the game will take place at the same time today instead, making it probably the first ever game to be postponed to an earlier date.

UMass is coming into the contest having just swept a doubleheader against the Temple Owls last Sunday and split a twin bill with the St. Joseph's Hawks on Saturday. Freshman phenom Kaila Holtz once again led the way by throwing a no-hitter against the Owls and pitching well against the Hawks despite getting the loss. In her two games on the mound she K'd 14 opposing hitters, and improved her record to 9-6 while lowering her team-leading ERA to 2.11. This ERA is good enough for seventh in the Atlantic 10 while her 91 punch-outs are the fourth best in the conference.

Holtz also dominated at the plate over the weekend, going 5-10 with two RBIs and a run scored. All of this hitting and pitching earned her UMass/WHMP Athlete of the week honors, the second time she has won the award this year.

Fordham enters the game having lost seven straight, but it does have a group of promising young players that could give the Minutewomen trouble. Freshman shortstop Marie Mitchill leads the team in most offensive categories including a .377 batting average, 23 runs scored, and two home runs. C/1B Amanda Smith, another freshman, will also be a serious threat, as she posts a .300 average to go along with 13 RBIs. Veterans Megan Georgevich (.283) and Sarah Jones (.282) are also very potent hitters.

On the mound for the Rams will be some combination of Courtney Collins (4-9, 1.88 ERA), Renee Little (3-9, 2.77 ERA), and KC Crowder (4-4, 5.00 ERA). These pitchers will be looking to improve the team's 11-30 (1-5 A10) record, despite the fact that this is a significant improvement from last year's 5-37 season.

The Minutewomen, on the other hand, are looking to jump above the .500 mark for the first time all year. They are 18-19 (4-2 A10), and seem to be gelling at the right time before the postseason. A big step for the young team will be taken if they can get the job done at Bahoshy Field at the Murphy Field Complex, under the shadows of the Bronx Zoo and the Botanical Gardens.

After the Fordham game, UMass will travel down to Philadelphia in order to play another conference opponent in LaSalle.

Arrests follow Washington protests

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

COURTESY OF STRAUSS

Ian Duryea and Mike Stevenson, Two UMass students, form a human chain in protests in Washington.

A group of University of Massachusetts students organized with the larger Western Massachusetts Global Action Coalition to protest last weekend's IMF and World Bank meeting in Washington D.C.

In wake of the protests, mixed feelings have arisen from the event. While most of the people involved believe that the protests were a tremendous success, between twelve and fourteen Western Massachusetts residents remain imprisoned because of their protest activity, including one UMass student.

According to Chauney "Tuck" Young, an organizer for the Western Mass. Coalition, "The main goal [of the protest] was to get information out about these organizations." And in light of national attention, he feels that the protestors were tremendously successful.

Young explained that before the Seattle protests, which took place earlier this year, people had little to no knowledge about the IMF's or the World Bank's activities, and now reputable media organizations like Time Magazine, the Washington Post, and the New York Times are printing stories favorable to the protestors' actions.

Matt Stevenson, a sophomore STPEC major in Social Thought and Political Economy, said he has a positive experience of civil disobedience while in Washington D.C.

He commented, "I know that a lot of people had looked on the Internet or talked to other people about it...talking about specific problems with the IMF and World Bank."

Stevenson described the "affinity groups" for which the protest has become known. According to him, each of these groups had their own motivation and their own plans for blocking IMF/World Bank delegates. The affinity groups would each send a representative to a larger council, where the overall plans for the protest would be discussed. Each of the affinity groups then voted on the plans. This would go on until a consensus was reached among the groups.

Tuck Young commented that this type of system allowed for better organization of protestors in Washington D.C. than in Seattle.

The original motivation behind the protests was to stop the IMF/World Bank meeting on Sunday, April 16, but soon spread to other areas, including a Saturday evening protest at a prison facility. The protest subsequently spilled over to Monday, because of the protestor's self-perceived success. As a result of all the weekend's protesting, the interaction between police and protestors has become a main focus for many people.

"Before people were jailed, I feel like police response was fairly non-aggressive. There are a few incidents where police were provoked," said Young. However, he added, "Once they were in jail, I thought it was an extreme case of injustice."

Young described conditions in which prisoners were left on buses for 8-13 hours without water, where people were fainting because of exhaustion or even suffering from hypothermia. He also said that at one point, 600 people were arrested without warning, including a Washington Post photographer and, in a particularly ironic note, a World Bank representative.

Conversely, Stevenson observed that police activity was relatively benign, saying that police often responded to voices of reason while ignoring more rowdy crowd members. He added that he had heard tales of uncalled for arrests and police brutality alike.

The Western Mass. Coalition still maintains support groups in Washington for those who have been arrested, and according to Young, "There will be civil action lawsuits filed individually and as a group against the U.S. marshals [in D.C.]."

As for their combined efforts, the two were cautiously optimistic.

Stevenson said, "It [the success of the protest] depends on whether or not this combines with lobbying or different campaigns for new officials or new systems for organizing Third World debt relief."

Young added, "It's a pretty big step to say that we're questioning the economic structure of our country and the world."

People's U. discusses awareness of issues

By Virginia Avedisian

Last night in the Dukes Meeting Room of the Student Union, the People's University group met to discuss potential actions for making students and parents more aware of issues such as the budget cuts, affirmative action and privatization on campus. Undergraduate as well as graduate students met and gave their opinions and suggestions on what could be done. John Buttell, an Afro-American Studies major, led the meeting by introducing certain topics and issues, and what to do about them.

Buttell encouraged actions such as newsletters produced by the Graduate Employment Organization (GEO) and The People's University, leaflets handed out to potential students and their parents on campus tours, "sit-ins" at Commonwealth College classes, posters put up by the "model" dorm room posters and even campus walkouts. People also discussed asking parents to send form letters or small comment cards to the Massachusetts State Auditor, who has not yet decided whether or not to privatize the Campus Center. He encouraged prevention of campus privatization in favor of allowing the student-run businesses to stay.

Another idea that was brought up was to focus attention next semester around the tax cut showing up on the ballots in Massachusetts proposed by Governor Celluci.

It was also said that the professors' union has been sending groups that have been lobbying to make sure that the University is getting enough money to satisfy its purpose, which is to educate the students who pay to come here. One woman also stated that the professors' union was looking for students to join the lobbying efforts in order to represent the student body on campus.

It was agreed that the universal idea among all students on campus is that they all want to be able to pay to return to a University that offers the best education that students can possibly afford.

It was said that students should be more aware of issues on campus as well as how to deal with them. It was suggested that graduate students who teach College Writing classes distribute information to students, since that class is required for all freshman and junior students.

Benjamin Balthaser, graduate student in the Master of Fine Arts program (MFA), stated, "Essentially what we're trying to do is continue the momentum of the People's University and not allow the energy of this entire movement to disperse."

He added, "This is not necessarily just about budget cuts and about getting money for the University. It's about an entire restructuring of the University's priorities away from the original mission of establishing a land grant University of public education for everyone."

"Basically, this meeting was about figuring out ways to make linkages between things like affirmative action, Commonwealth College, privatization and budget cuts."

John Buttell, a freshman history major, stated, "The issue of the budget cuts and related things such as privatization, affirmative action, the problem with access for working class students, aren't things that are going to go away. I really think that the administration's agenda, the agenda of the people behind them and the state government are the kinds of things that will only succeed in the absence of information. That is one of the reasons that they are so careful not to give information out."

"The whole point of trying to start this coalition is instead of just reacting to what's done and taking things one issue at a time, we want to have some type of coordination on our side in some way so that every time a crisis comes up, student's don't have to reinvent the wheel."

UMass to honor six with degrees at Commencement

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

In addition to Commencement speaker Billie Jean King, the University of Massachusetts will honor six other people with honorary degrees on May 20-21.

Among those who will receive honorary degrees, there are three UMass alumni, one U.S. ambassador, one former member of the South African parliament, and one president of an international company.

The honorees are Jeffrey A. Davidow, Evan S. Dobelle, Eugene M. Isenberg, Ahmed M. Kathrada, Bruce M. Penniman and Edgar F. Smith.

Jeffrey Davidow graduated from UMass in 1965 before going on to study at the University of Minnesota. In 1969, Davidow entered the U.S. State Department where he subsequently served 31 years in foreign affairs. He has received four presidential appointments, including ambassadorships to Zambia, Venezuela and Mexico.

The current president of Trinity College, Evan S. Dobelle has spearheaded a $250 million neighborhood revitalization effort in the surrounding area. During the Carter administration, the UMass alumnus served as assistant secretary of state. He has also held been commissioner of management and natural resources for Massachusetts and U.S. chief of protocol for the White House.

Eugene Isenberg donated $6 million dollars in support of the then pending School of Management, which now bears his name. After graduating UMass, he went to Princeton before taking positions at Exxon and Geninar Steel. He is currently chairman of the world's largest offshore oil-drilling company, Nabors Industries. In addition to his support for the School of Management, Isenberg funds ten annual two-year scholarships for outstanding students with business skills.

Three students arrested in undercover drug bust

By Daniel Ruetenik
Collegian Staff

Two University of Massachusetts students were arrested on Friday, April 14 in a dormitory room when UMass police executed a search warrant obtained after receiving tips and conducting an undercover investigation. Also, three smashed dryers were discovered in an elevator in Southwest.

Brendan P. French, age 19, of Ballaston, NY and David Dubrino, age 19, of Antrium, NH were arrested in room #242 on the second floor of Baker Residence Hall. French is being charged with possession of a class B substance with intent to distribute and Dubrino is being charged with possession of class B and D substances and possession or use of a false or stolen RMV document.

According to the search warrant, during the month of February, 2000, police had conversations with an informant, regarding "drug distribution activity on the campus of [UMass]." According to the informant, an individual known as Andre, who resides in 242 Baker, had been selling marijuana from his room. The informant stated that he had known Andre for "approximately seven months and knows Andre to sell marijuana." Police conducted a dormitory check with the 2000 UMass student directory and found that an individual named Andre Zdanow, age 18, lived in room #242 of Baker.

The search warrant went on to say that on March, 22, at around 2:55 a.m., a UMass police officer observed Zdanow operating a motor vehicle on a sidewalk. Zdanow was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license and during the booking process, a bag of marijuana was found in his shoe. "An additional charge of possession of a class D substance, marijuana was added."

Also, according to the warrant, during the second week of April, police received further information regarding the activities of Zdanow. This informant said that he had known Zdanow for seven months and had purchased marijuana from his room. Police officers had the informant purchase a specific amount of marijuana from Zdanow as proof of illegal activities being conducted in the room.

Officer Michael S. Ross, a member of the UMass police department and other police officers, then used this information to obtain the warrant and search Zdanow's room.

Inside the room, officers discovered French and Dubrino along with three glass pipes, ecstasy powder, a scale, marijuana, over a thousand dollars cash, and other drug related paraphernalia.

Also during the weekend, on Sunday morning at around 7:30 a.m., three smashed clothes dryers were discovered in an elevator in John Quincy Adams Dorm. The dryers were from floors nine, 14 and 21. The change boxes had been destroyed and all of the money was removed. Nobody in the area heard or saw anything.

This is the second incident of clothes dryers being vandalized in JQA Dorm. On Tuesday, April 11, at 7:56 a.m. a clothes dryer was discovered in an elevator, with the change box missing. There are no suspects in either incident.

Senate to vote on Amateur Sports Integrity Act

By John Suehira
Daily Bruin (U. California Los Angeles)

(TWIRE) LOS ANGELES – The end of legalized gambling on amateur sports may be near, as the U.S. Senate Commerce Committee approved the Amateur Sports Integrity Act last Thursday. The bill will now go to the senate chamber for a full vote sometime in the next few weeks.

The support for the bill satisfied the National Collegiate Athletic Association, one of the bill's most fervent sponsors.

"We could not be more pleased," said Dave Dixon, NCAA director of federal relations. "The overwhelming vote of support favors gambling."

The Amateur Sports Integrity Act is just one of several bills introduced into both the U.S. House and Senate this year that aim to close a loop hole in the Professional and Amateur Sports Act, enacted in 1992. That act prohibited gambling on sports in all states except Delaware, Montana, Nevada and Oregon. Currently, Nevada is the only state that allows gambling on college sports. If passed, the Amateur Sports Integrity Act would prohibit gambling on amateur sports in Nevada also.

"It will be nice to see betting on college sports made illegal," said Jim Muldoon, Pac-10 assistant commissioner of public relations.

One of the main proponents of this bill is Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who is also the chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee. According to Dixon, McCain teamed up with Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) to co-sponsor the Amateur Sports Integrity Act after dropping out of the Republican presidential race in March. His support of the bill, Dickson said, has been one of the main reasons why it has moved through the Commerce Committee so quickly.

"When McCain approached the NCAA, he was very enthusiastic about eliminating sources of point shaving and point spread scandals," Dixon said.

In his opening statement at the bill's hearing, McCain indicated that banning legalized betting on college sports would be a service to student-athletes throughout the country.

"Legalized gambling on kids is wrong," McCain said in a statement after the bill was approved. "They should not be reduced to a point spread and a spectacle for wagering. By closing the Las Vegas loophole and banning college sports gambling completely, we will end a practice that has exposed college athletes to unwarranted pressure, bribery and corruption."

On the other hand, Sen. Richard Bryan (D-Nev.) argued that this bill will be ineffective in curbing gambling on amateur athletics and that its only intent is to "give Nevada the shaft."

According to the Associated Press, in fiscal year 1999 the Nevada gaming industry took in $2.3 billion in sports wagers, with 30 to 40 percent of that bet on college sports. Should the Amateur Sports Integrity Act pass, Nevada's economy will lose more than just the betting revenue, according to Tom Enukels, a member of Bryan's staff.

"Since many people go to Nevada just to place bets on sporting events, restaurants and hotels will also suffer," Enukels said.

In an attempt to spread the burden of combating gambling on amateur sports, Bryan sought to add several amendments to the bill, which would require the NCAA and its member's schools to deal with illegal gambling more directly. All the amendments were rejected.

"The fact the amendments were defeated proves that the intent of this bill is to only place the blame on Nevada," said John Sheffi, spokesman for the American Gaming Association. Sheffi pointed out that the NCAA also profits from the entertainment its member institutions provide, since it makes billions of dollars annually on television contracts and advertising. As a result, he said, the NCAA should fund anti-gambling programs.

"The problems are on college campuses and are not related to the professional bookies in Las Vegas," Sheffi added.

UM scientists defy microscopic limits

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

A group of scientific researchers at the University of Massachusetts has discovered a way to control molecules too tiny to be seen under the strongest microscopes. They can then direct them toward the development of faster computers and ultra-sensitive sensors that locate land mines and diseases.

A report on the findings was printed in the April 13 issue of Nature and featured UMass Chemistry Professor Vincent Rotello. According to Rotello, the scientists are able to control the behavior and shape of particles 1/100 the size of a virus. These particles are called nanoparticles and Rotello and his team specialize in coaxing such infinitesimal particles to "self-assemble," forming a much larger and easier to observe molecule.

"While self-assembly occurs often in nature – such as when ice forms and salt crystals congeal in the salt shaker – it's much tougher to make synthetic molecules self-assemble in a controlled way," Rotello said in a press statement.

By being able to control and monitor the shape of the molecule atom-by-atom, Rotello and his team were able to perform multi-scale engineering to construct a particle that would behave in a certain way applicable to computer technology.

"There's no way to address them [nanoparticles] and you have all these molecular devices floating around with no way to make an effective device out of it," Rotello said.

The problem confronting the group of scientists was scale. They were attempting to build Tinkertoy-like structures without being able to see the sticks and hubs. The researchers explored ways to make these molecules behave and act in ways that would hold together until they reached a visible molecular size that would then allow them to be manipulated.

"If transistors fashioned from molecules could be effectively arranged, a billion to a trillion times as many transistors could fit on the same size chip as fit not," Rotello said. "If you were able to find a way to put these molecular devices on a chip and then access them, you'd be able to get a billion [times] more information than on a hard drive."

The team started with tiny, solid gold spheres containing a solution of nanoparticles. The scientists attached six binding molecules to each gold sphere using sulfur atoms as links. They then "glued" the molecules to the spheres by combining them with a form of polystyrene containing complementary binding sites on the molecule, so that the two mixtures fit together like puzzle pieces. They discovered that the sulfur-modified, gold particle-polystyrene combination fit together in an orderly fashion, forming a perfect, tightly-packed sphere of 7,000 gold particles, 100 nanometers across.

"We can then order the spheres – we have order from molecular to macroscopic scale," Rotello said. "If you want to do multi-scale engineering, you have to be able to order on all scales."

Entertainment inspired by Vietnam

By Patrick Goldstein
Los Angeles Times

One of the first big-budget Hollywood films to confront the Vietnam War, The Deer Hunter, showed captive American soldiers tortured and forced to engage in a grisly game of Russian roulette. The film's grim depiction of young Americans' loss of innocence stirred raw emotion in audiences in 1978, three years after the war's end.

Ned Tanen, then the president of Universal Pictures, felt the intensity at a preview showing in Detroit. "The screening was a blood bath," Tanen said. "Some people were very moved, but we had walk-outs and lots of people who were enraged and totally shocked."

Tanen himself was confronted by a beefy auto worker who stormed out of the theater. "He said, 'Do you have anything to do with this (expletive) movie?' And when I said yes, he grabbed me by the throat and wrestled me to the ground ... I mean, this is the same film that won the Oscar, but here's this guy trying to punch my lights out in the lobby."

The tumultuous response to The Deer Hunter mirrored the divisions the war wrought in American society. For young and old, rich and poor, white and minority, Vietnam became the great divide, the catalyst for a seismic shift in contemporary pop culture.

The antiwar movement, coupled with the disillusionment of Watergate and the youth culture's embrace of mind-altering drugs, helped create a new breed of alienated antiheroes who have held sway in the culture for a generation, from John Lennon and Jack Nicholson to Kurt Cobain and Tupac Shakur.

This new pop culture sensibility embraced a provocative anti-authoritarianism that offered a clean break from the sunny optimism of films and music in the 1950s and early 1960s. The war sparked an era of distrust, paranoia and cynicism among musicians, filmmakers, novelists and comedians. It could be heard everywhere but especially in pop music, in the protest ballads of Bob Dylan and Phil Ochs, then in Top 40 hits like Creedence Clearwater Revival's "Fortunate Son," and Edwin Starr's "War."

Hollywood didn't directly address Vietnam until the war was over. But many of the most acclaimed films of the late '60s and early '70s, including The Godfather, Chinatown, Easy Rider and Midnight Cowboy, were seen as heavily influenced by a distrust and cynicism that grew out of the war.

As critic Pauline Kael wrote in a 1973 essay called "After Innocence:" "The Vietnam War has barely been mentioned on the screen, but you could feel it in the conviction-less atmosphere, the absence of shared values, the brutalities taken for granted ... the heroes didn't believe in anything and didn't pretend they did."

The war disturbed some artists while it inspired others. "Vietnam changed everything because it changed the way we looked at everything," says David Crosby of Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young, co-author of Stand and Be Counted, a new book about pop artists and politics. "The war was such a visceral issue that people couldn't help but create great art from it."

Pop icons who embodied the mercurial spirit of this new counterculture were all shaped by the war: John Lennon performed at peace concerts; Muhammad Ali was stripped of his heavyweight crown for refusing to be drafted; Jimi Hendrix, a onetime member of the 101st Airborne division, regularly played "Machine Gun" in concert, dedicating the song to "all the soldiers fighting in Chicago, Milwaukee, New York and, yeah, all the soldiers fighting in Vietnam."

The war provoked art that fed the burgeoning "us versus them" antiwar spirit of the times.

"The war changed the music, and the music helped galvanize the anti-war effort," says Howie Klein, president of Reprise Records, who was active in college protests in the '60s.

Jeremy Scheingold kisses his fiancee, Sarah Ingham, who suffered a stroke on Sunday, at Prince William Hospital in Manassas, Va. Ingham will be out of intensive care soon, but she faces months of hospital rehabilitation. She is among an unknown number of Americans who have suffered serious illness or death after taking products containing ephedra, a traditional Chinese asthma remedy marketed with almost no governmental oversight by scores of U.S. companies as an energy booster or as a way to lose weight.

Safety of ephedra comes into question

By Guy Gugliotta
Washington Post

By Tuesday, Sarah Ingham could swallow again, and shrug her shoulders, and almost talk. Wednesday morning, she told her mother "I love you" and managed to say the name of her fiance, Jeremy.

Ingham, a 24-year-old Manassas, Va., resident, had been taking a dietary supplement containing the powerful herbal substance ephedra for about a month. She wanted to lose some weight before her fall wedding, and yes, she nodded from her hospital bed, she did lose a few pounds.

But on Sunday morning, the day after Jeremy Scheingold put the engagement ring on her finger, she awoke with numbness in the right side of her face. She arose, walked to the bathroom and collapsed in the shower. She had had a stroke, and she nearly died.

Ingham is one of an unknown number of Americans who have suffered serious illness or death after taking products containing ephedra, a traditional Chinese asthma remedy marketed with almost no governmental oversight by scores of U.S. companies as an energy booster or as a way to lose weight.

Ingham has partial movement in her right arm and no movement in her right hand, and she can only mumble a few words at a time. She will leave intensive care soon, but she faces months of hospital rehabilitation.

"She may make a significant recovery," said neurologist Michael Hofstetter, who is treating Ingham at Manassas's Prince William Hospital. "But she will have persistent language problems and will lose some dexterity in her right hand. She must learn how to compensate."

The safety of ephedra, whose manufacturers boast that they sell three billion doses each year, has been a source of dispute for years between the industry and those who regard ephedra as a dangerous, unpredictable drug with potentially catastrophic side effects.

The Ephedra Education Council, an industry group, denies that ephedra, "if used according to label instructions," causes bad reactions, and for several years it has thwarted attempts by the Food and Drug Administration to impose dosage regulations below those prescribed on most ephedra bottles.

Ingham used Metabolift, made by Twinlab of Ronkonkoma, N.Y. The label says, "take two capsules before each meal" and "do not exceed six capsules daily." When asked if he had followed the instructions, Ingham nodded her head.

Our Opinion

Security gone berserk

Police officers are here to help us. There is no question about that. Potential officers go through a great deal of school and training to become certified, and if their main goal wasn't to help society, they wouldn't put themselves through the long, arduous process.

Officers of the law stop crimes, protect society and save lives. The police catch murderers, stop rapes, punish dangerous drivers and arrest drug dealers. They are indeed essential ingredients to our well-being, and without them we would almost certainly plummet.

But lately, we Americans have been hearing horror stories about the police, and some of us have even experienced an excessive amount of force from "the boys in blue," which is commonly known as police brutality. The police carry billyclubs and guns, and are trained in a number of self-defense styles. With all of this artillery the police have, is there the potential for abuse? Of course. Does it happen as often as some people describe? You be the judge.

We all remember the Rodney King case from a few years back and most of us can agree that excessive force was used on him, but let us look at more recent examples of what many have claimed to be "power-trips" taken by the police.

The most recent example occurred last weekend in our nation's capital, Washington DC. Thousands of people were protesting the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the police were ready for any trouble that may have arisen. When things started getting out of control, the police took action, leading to the arrest of hundreds of people. Although this may sound like normal police work, a great number of people who were just watching the protest were grabbed, hit with billy clubs and arrested. Just for watching. The police wouldn't listen to any explanations given to them by the bystanders, and they just hauled them off to the station.

Now, while no one was severely beaten unnecessarily during this fiasco, there was an excessive amount of police force used. There was indeed a violation of these innocent people's civil rights and it would not be surprising if a lawsuit arises. But this is not the first time the police have violated civil liberties. It happens almost every day here at the University.

The University Police are notorious for entering noisy homes or dorm rooms without the consent of the residents. And they are also notorious for wanting to inspect the backpack of every student who walks by them on Friday and Saturday nights. Should these types of behaviors be considered police brutality? While that is certainly up for debate, one cannot deny that they are at least borderline abuses of civil rights.

As previously stated, the police are here to help us. They prevent a lot more crimes than they allegedly commit and they usually do more good than harm. But these issues cannot be ignored. Something must be done now before the situation becomes out of hand and no one is safe.

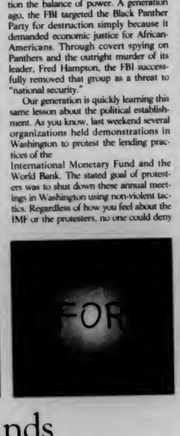
An "F" for democracy in D.C.

Keith Hedlund

According to the First Amendment of the Constitution there is no law in the U.S. prohibiting the freedom of speech or the right of the people to peaceably assemble. The truest test of these democratic principles occurs when people who hold views in sharp contrast to the ruling political establishment try to exercise these fundamental rights. In Washington D.C. this past week, democracy was put to that test. It failed miserably.

The events in D.C. were nothing new to those who have studied the history of social movements. Police agencies have long been used as instruments of the state to crush those that dared to question the balance of power. A generation ago, the FBI targeted the Black Panther Party for destruction simply because it demanded economic justice for African-Americans. Through covert spying on Panthers and the outright murder of its leader, Fred Hampton, the FBI successfully removed that group as a threat to "national security."

Our generation is quickly learning this same lesson about the political establishment. As you know, last weekend several organizations held demonstrations in Washington to protest the lending practices of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. The stated goal of protesters was to shut down these annual meetings in Washington using non-violent tactics. Regardless of how you feel about the IMF or the protesters, no one could deny that these groups had a First Amendment right to be in Washington. If they chose to violate the law, there would, of course, be consequences.



In the week preceding the demonstrations, the D.C. and federal police departments did nearly everything in their power to abridge the free speech rights of the protesters before they actually exercised them. D.C. Police Chief Charles Ramsey started by whipping up a climate of fear in the community. He showed merchants a video of protestors committing property damage at the World Trade Organization meeting in Seattle back in December. He warned that those same individuals were coming to D.C. even though Seattle is 2,000 miles away. The Postal Service removed all outdoor mail-boxes in the downtown area for fear that bombs could be placed in them. Scores of businesses and even George Washington University closed for fear of violence and property damage. The federal government closed down its offices in the area. The Metro subway system shut down two of its transit stations around the IMF/World Bank buildings. A siege mentality hung over D.C., and it was blamed on the protestors.

After creating this atmosphere, the Metro D.C. Police then began to directly repress the activists themselves. On Friday, several people in a van were pulled over and arrested for possessing items to be "used in the commission of a crime." These items? PVC pipe, duct tape, chicken wire and roofing tar, hardly criminal instruments but effective tools for committing civil disobedience against the state. The next day, 300 police and federal agents committed an early morning raid on the headquarters of the protestors under the guise of a "safety inspection." Apparently it is normal in D.C. on a Saturday morning for several hundred officers to investigate housing code violations. Finding several violations, they closed the building, evicting the people inside and locking up medical supplies and puppets to be used in the demonstration on Sunday. Police tried again to paint the protestors as violent when they found an empty plastic bottle with a rag in it- labeling it a "Molotov cocktail." Later that day, several hundred people, including a reporter and a tourist, were arrested by D.C. Police for demonstrating without a permit. They had been in front of a police barricade when another group of officers closed in behind them, placing them in custody before giving them a chance to disperse.

On the day of the rally, D.C. police and federal agents closed off over 50 blocks of streets surrounding the IMF/World Bank buildings. Two police helicopters buzzed over the area all day. Police lookouts on the tops of high-rises kept track of the movements of demonstrators. Was such behavior necessary? Keep in mind that from the beginning the organizers of the protest stated that they would not commit violence or property damage and that their demands would be supported by peaceful and non-violent action. During the actual protest tens of thousands of people took to the streets, and there was no violence caused by demonstrators and only minor property damage (less than campus police see on a busy weekend).

When popular movements and capitalist institutions clash, democracy is often the first casualty. The protestors in Washington were a serious threat to the objectives of the IMF/World Bank and the Clinton administration (which is trying to increase the "free trade" policies of those organizations). The federal government could not allow the meetings in D.C. to be stopped as they were in Seattle. If the First Amendment had been allowed to work as intended, the IMF meetings almost certainly would have been shut down. Protestors would have exercised their lawful rights of free speech and assembly unabridged by government interference. Sanctions would have been enacted if protestors actually committed crimes, not before they attempted to use the First Amendment. Last week in Washington, our leaders showed that even democracy has its limits.

First, the mushy stuff.

There have been a lot of people who have been good to me at the University:

Chancellor Soon – Without this fine gentleman, I would not have had the opportunities to pay for such privileged things as parking permits, Internet access and fresh air.

Bruiser Flint – When I came to UMass a wee freshman, the men's basketball team was still basking in the afterglow of their Final Four appearance. Now the football team threatens to be the most successful Division I-A program that we have. Whitey Bulger has to be behind this.

Whitey Bulger – Whenever anything goes wrong on this campus, you can blame it on Whitey and everyone has to believe you.

Samuel Adams – If I had never met this man, my life would not be the success that it is today. He has shown me that there is always something more important than homework to do on any given night.

When I leave the Pioneer Valley in little over a month, I am going to miss a lot of things about it. For those of you who never get a chance to drive to Northampton or have a cup of coffee at the Black Sheep, you are missing the entire experience of living in one of the nicest areas in the state. If you enjoy smoking pot, you will never leave this part of the state.

Ten-cent wings night at Charlie's is the reason that I save my change every day. There is no other place in the known world where you can get enough food to feed you for a week for four bucks. Oh, and for the idiots who represent much of the journalism major, I have one question: why the hell aren't you down here right now? I understand that some of you are interested in law school and other noble pursuits. Then, there are the rest of you that realize far too late that you need news clips to work for a newspaper. Funny how that works, huh? Just try submitting your "interview with a real journalist" assignment to a perspective employer. Try saying, "would you like fries with that?"

Oh, and to the people that think that the Collegian is a big clique, you're right. We take the cool people; the ones that like to write, like to have a good time, and no one has more fun uptown than the people of 113 Campus Center.

One of the best decisions I have made at this school is to take Social Dance. Not only is it a practical class, but the ladies go wild for a guy who can do a simple underarm turn.

A special shout-out (I can say that because I live in Southwest) goes to my boy, Mr. "I can say ANYTHING and get away with it," Brett Mauser. Not only did he live with my fifth freshman year, but all my annoying habits ever since. To our credit though, we showed the world what two skinny white kids can achieve when given a thirty rack and a Christmas tin of assorted popcorn. To the people who live in 727 Dickinson right now, I'd wash those mattresses, pronto.

Another shout-out goes to the former residents of 7th Floor Dickinson as a whole. There was something about skipping classes the first nice day in the spring, sitting on the balcony and smoking cigars that I will never forget. And I'll never forget all the moments that I don't remember. Apologies also go out to our RA, Letitia.

The tie that binds

Jason Czernich

The University of Massachusetts Theater Department puts out at least two shows per semester. It is a place where undergraduates and graduates can get a thorough education in the fields of theater performance, design and dramaturgy. If you want to learn about the world of the theatrical stage then the UMass Theater Department is the place to go. With all this to offer, one would wonder who has kept things running so smoothly over the years in this busy department.

Is it Catherine Bloch, the production manager? She oversees production on all the theatrical productions in the department and makes sure all production positions are filled. Without her, all the major productions would not execute properly. She is without a doubt an extremely important component of the UMass Theater Department; she is not the person, however, I refer to when I talk about who holds the UMass Theater Department together. The person I have in mind has been present in the department longer than Catherine Bloch.

Am I referring to Ed Golden or Penny Remsen, the co-chairs of the Theater Department? Ed is an amazing acting teacher and Penny Remsen does quite well at presenting lighting design material. Both of them are very friendly, approachable people who have mastered their respective fields. Students feel free to go to them with questions and concerns anytime, but again there is someone else whom I see as embodying the spirit of the UMass Theater Department. Don't get me wrong, Catherine Bloch, Ed Golden, Penny Remsen, and other faculty and staff at the UMass Theater Department are all important elements. The students also make up a big part of the department too.

However the glue that binds all these parts is someone that everybody in the UMass Theater Department knows and loves: Denise Wagner. She is the Theater Department secretary and has been with the Department since 1991, almost a decade of service! Before that she had secretarial experience from the Chancellor's Staff Office and the School of Management. Besides handling phone calls, filing away files and other secretarial duties, she is an all around helpful and nice person. Need to know something about the department? Ask Denise. If she doesn't know the answer off the top of her head she will definitely know who will, as she knows everybody in the department.

When you stop into the Theater Department lobby Denise will be the smiling woman sitting behind the desk in the main office. More often than not Denise will have a jar full of candy on her desk that anybody is welcome to. She doesn't have to have that candy but it's there just the same for anybody who wants one. That's just plain nice.

On the opening days of department shows Denise will place some refreshments out in the lobby for the students and faculty. These refreshments are usually Dunkin' Donuts Munchkins or something similar. It is almost always a race to see who can eat all the chocolate glazed ones first. Denise doesn't have to spend the time or money for these treats but she does anyways because that's just who Denise is - a sweet and caring person.

Denise does her best to be helpful and make everybody feel welcome in the department, and everybody in the department appreciates what she does.

She is one of those people who you never hear anything bad about, like Al Roker. Even so, there was one time last summer when Denise was having doubts about her effectiveness in the department due to the stress of her busy schedule. I happened to be on campus at the time so I stopped in to see how things were going. When I bumped into Denise I was surprised to find her down in the dumps. After hearing how stressed she was, I told Denise that she was in fact the glue that holds the UMass Theater Department together. If she were to suddenly disappear, the department would become disorganized and maybe a less fun place to be. She thanked me for the reassurance, gave me a hug, and went straight back to work, right on top of things as always. She didn't really need my reassurance because deep down she knows how valuable she is to the department. She would have gotten over her stress anyway because Denise Wagner is unsinkable.

Secretary's Day is coming up very soon. If you're a Theater Department student and you appreciate what Theater Department does to make the UMass Theater Department a brighter place then please let her know. Also give her a hug. She likes those.

End of days in Africa

Wes Wrightson

Africa has been in the news a lot recently with the raging floods in Mozambique (which halted to last month), the Ugandan cult mass suicide, and now Rwandan newborns being left for dead.

I was reading the April 3 issue of Time when I came to an article about how pregnancy is oftentimes a death sentence for expectant mothers in Rwanda. For those of you out there who don't know where Rwanda is located, it's a very small country between Uganda and Burundi, bordering Zaire on the west.

Since many of you probably don't know a lot about Rwanda, I'll give you a few details about the country before I get going on the article I read. It is one of the most crowded African countries (try fitting 6.7 million people into a country roughly the size of Vermont). Most of the inhabitants are farmers. Rwanda was colonized by the French, so French is the official language. The majority of Rwanda's people belong to the Hutu ethnic group. The other ethnic group is called the Tutsi, the minority that has been in control politically and economically for many years.

The Rwandan genocide of 1994 tore apart an infrastructure that was frail to begin with. There were fewer than a dozen doctors within its borders in 1997, and fewer than 100 nurses. Hospitals were destroyed during the genocide, as were power plants and government buildings. A society that was once a solidly built agrarian state was reduced to Stone Age living standards in a short span of time. According to the article, before 1993 only 53 percent of all households were below the poverty line. By 1997, that figure had risen to more than 70 percent.

The article tells the story of Joseph and Nereciana, two Rwandan refugees living in a compound in Tanzania (for fear that the Tutsi rebels will slaughter them because of the genocide caused by the Hutu extremists back in 1994) who fell in love and got married. Then the compound was attacked by Tutsi extremists, and the refugees were forced to leave and fled back to Rwanda. With their feet bloodied and bound by the long days of trekking, they made it back to their homeland of Rwanda – which is now a virtual wasteland because of the genocide six years ago.

Joseph and Nereciana found a plot of land on which to start all over again. They began building their home: a hut consisting of four very small rooms and a dirt floor. The hut is perched on a hillside that overlooks a lush and fertile valley. They built a thatched-roofed outhouse and a chicken hutch. They sowed their own crops on the four acres they carved out of the land for themselves. Things were looking good for the African couple until Nereciana went to a traditional midwife who began to feel her stomach, pelvic area, and ask questions about her menstrual cycle. Nereciana was pregnant.

When a baby Is born in Rwanda, a traditional ceremony of performed on the eighth day of the child's life. Traditional African beer is served, and there is a gathering of the community as the newborn Is held up to the sky. Nereciana was looking forward to the eventual day when the child would be born. Finally the day came. She was in so much pain (her contractions were just minutes apart), but the baby was finally here – or so everyone thought. She began to have violent spasms and complained of abdominal pain. Eight hours after her first set of contractions, Nereciana was dead. Her fetus lay inside her, and the cause of death is unknown. It could have been any of a number of causes, but the most glaring one of all is that this is a nation that is so poor in provisions and so weak in spirit that it cannot create a bright future.

The issue of maternal mortality (mothers dying while trying to give birth) Is a pressing issue in Rwanda. Pregnancy is tantamount to a death sentence. The risk in Africa is one in nine; the risk in the United States is one in 4,000. Malnourishment and unsanitary delivery conditions are the main causes for maternal mortality in Rwanda. When complications ensue during the birthing process in Rwanda, infections run the gamut from dirty swaddling cloth to unclean razors used to cut the umbilical cords. Sometimes the resources are so severely limited that an IV cannot even be used in case of hemorrhaging.

Next year I will be a Peace Corps Volunteer in West Africa (either Togo, Guinea, or Mauritania), and I cannot wait to get there and see if I can help out. It is one of the poorest regions of the world and (along with the likes of Rwanda, Uganda, and Burundi), one of the neediest in terms of aid and development. Just to think that in a country the size of Vermont (with 6.7 million people), one in nine women will die from complications during childbirth is beyond comprehension.

Be aware of what a gifted and privileged life you all live here.

Ben and Jerry's Sold

By Shawn Ilinitch
Collegian Staff

On April 12, Unilever, a giant food distributor in Europe, purchased Ben and Jerry's in a deal valued over $260 million. News of the sale came as no surprise, as rumors of a sale have been circulating since December.

It all began with an offer from Unilever in December, which was followed by an offer from Dreyers International. About a month later, a new group entered the fray. Meadowbrook Lane Capital, a company based in Springfield, reportedly put an offer on the table. In the end, however, Unilever put the strongest offer on the table.

Ben and Jerry's began in 1978 in a gas station in Burlington, Vermont. In 1984 the company's founders, Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield, took the company public. They have grown famous with their social responsibility, donating their pre-taxed profits to various charities as well as buying their milk and cream at above market prices in Vermont.

One of the recipients of their charity, Wavy Gravy, namesake of a popular Ben and Jerry's flavor, runs a drama camp in Southern California. The money Wavy Gravy receives from the ice cream gurus goes to provide scholarships to those children who otherwise would be unable to attend.

With the sale came of a wave of questions, mainly relating to how Unilever would handle the responsibility that Ben and Jerry's took on. The deal came with news that Ben and Jerry's will maintain a separate board of directors and will continue with its social mission.

Krista Yungam, a manager at the Ben and Jerry's shop in Newbury, was worried at the first news of a possible sale. She hoped that, "they would end up like they were before."

Now, however, she is happy because she thinks, "Unilever will help to sell more, and because of that they will be able to give away more."

COURTESY BENJERRY.COM

Ben and Jerry's started using eco-pints on the World's Best Vanilla flavor.

Mike Garrett echoes these thoughts. He is the owner of four scoop shops in Connecticut and New York. He feels that it is important that Ben and Jerry's remains an independent type of business. He also added that Unilever will help immensely in European distribution, where Ben and Jerry's has been having a problem since the beginning. In addition, "they will help to implement a better distribution in the United States."

Not everyone feels as optimistic about the deal as these two, though. Garret Laporto, who ran a "Save Ben and Jerry's" website since the first talk of a sale, is worried. Although, he feels "that Ben (Cohen) did the best he could to put as many requirements as possible," he thinks that, "a large company could not hold the same ideals."

He feels that Unilever is capable of maintaining Ben and Jerry's commitment to responsibility, but he not convinced that this will happen. He remains hopeful, however, that Unilever's new ice cream company will "act as a catalyst" for the rest of the corporation. He adds, "if Unilever feels that way, it would be wonderful."

In other Ben and Jerry's news, the company has posted its first quarter reports, which are looking promising. The company reported increased profits on higher revenues as well as improved profit margins.

The earnings per share increased two cents to 18 cents per share. At the same time, net income rose to $1.3 million.

In other responsibility news, virtually all of Ben and Jerry's flavors have converted to the eco-pint, a more environmentally safe packaging option. The new containers use unbleached paperboard, which eliminates the use of chlorine compounds, which are used to bleach the paperboard. When these chemicals are used, millions of gallons of organochlorine laced waste water are released on a daily basis. Some of these chemicals are a human health hazard. By using the new pints, Ben and Jerry's hopes to set a standard in the ice cream industry.

For now, Ben and Jerry's will keep its own board of directors and it seems that the established social responsibility of the company will not be affected by the deal.

IMF has racist goals

Liza Burbank
Collegian Correspondent

The International Monetary Fund and the World Bank have been much in the news in recent weeks. The ostensible purpose of these financial organizations is to act as international lending institutions for their member states, supplying funds needed to finance large-scale development projects, restructure national economic systems and repay external debts, thereby stabilizing the global economy and simplifying the expansion of international trade. Those opposed to the policies of the IMF/World Bank, including the thousands of protesters who converged on Washington last weekend, charge that these institutions do not fulfill their intended purpose, but rather have increased poverty throughout the world by their conventional lending policies to Third World nations since the beginning of the global debt crisis in 1982.

Nations are forced to comply with structural adjustment programs (SAPs) in order to receive desperately needed funds from the IMF/World Bank. Structural adjustment is intended to provide ways for nations to raise money, which they can then use to repay their foreign debts. SAPs call for cuts in government spending, privatization, increasing exportation, and courting foreign investors by providing incentives for them to invest. According to opponents of the IMF/World Bank, these SAPs have disastrous effects on already impoverished nations. Cuts in government spending mean that health care, food and education are no longer subsidized and are thus often unaffordable; privatization means that the costs of goods and services rise; more exports mean that resources are no longer available for people living within the country; incentives for foreign investors have contributed to falling per capita incomes for many of the nations subject to SAPs. In the past 20 years, SAPs have caused the developing world to pay to the industrialized First World five times as much capital as it has received in loans.

So then, who benefits from the policies of the IMF/World Bank? According to them, the global economy. But, in fact, the "global" economy with which they are concerned is a white economy.

The global economy is not an arena where all the nations of the world have equal opportunity to grow and prosper. Western capital has from its very beginnings depended on racist policies. In its earliest stages it was made possible by the enslavement and colonization of non-whites by Whites for the purpose of making profits and obtaining natural resources. In today's post-colonial world, it is the policies of the IMF/World Bank that continue to unfairly appropriate the natural resources of former colonies and profit by forcing millions of people to live in sub-human conditions.

The African continent has historically borne the brunt of much of the horrors of Western capitalism. The profits resulting from the kidnapping and enslavement of millions of Africans helped to make the industrial revolution possible, and African gold was the main medium of capitalist exchange. It is apparent from a look at the state of Africa today, in the hands of the IMF/World Bank, that the unconscionable treatment of this mainly black continent by the mainly white West continues. In countries in which less than 60 percent of school-age children attend school, 31 percent of children are underweight and only 44 percent of the population has access to safe drinking water. SAPs force governments to reduce spending on education, health care and sanitation.

Last week at a press conference, Stanley Fischer, the acting Managing Director of the IMF, said, "All the evidence is that the best way to grow is to integrate into the global economy." Forcing non-white, Third World nations to join the White, global economy of the industrialized West is clearly only "best" for the latter.

So, then, who benefits from the policies of the IMF/World Bank? The White, Western World.

Women need more fair pay

Megan Clarke
Collegian Correspondent

Right now people are fighting for a Cuban boy to stay in the US. Students traveled to D.C to fight the IMF and protect other countries. But no one is fighting for the 50% of our population being discriminated against daily. Congress hiring has placed waste water are released on a daily basis. Some of these chemicals are a human health hazard. By using the new pints, Ben and Jerry's hopes to set a standard in the ice cream industry.

For now, Ben and Jerry's will keep its own board of directors and it seems that the established social responsibility of the company will not be affected by the deal.

For some reason everyone else is more important than the women in the work force. It is time that people start looking at the problems we have in our country and our society.

Being a woman in the work force is frustrating. I have done some research on my own for an honors credit about the differences between men and women In the work place and the more I research, the more I get discouraged and upset. Let me explain why I am so frustrated.

My tendencies to go above and beyond the call of duty will not stop after I graduate. In fact I have goals of making it big, being known in my field, or at least in the company I work for. I am not going to settle for middle management. I want to get to the top. However there are people who don't want me to get there. There are also people who will doubt everything I say. I know going into the work force that I will be paid less than my male counterparts. The reason for all of this discrimination is that I am a woman.

Women today are still making significantly less than men. Black and Hispanic women are making less than white women and much less than white men. The statistics baffle me. What is wrong with our society that allows this blatant discrimination to happen day in and day out?

The citizens of this country, and especially the students going into the work force need to demand better for women in the work force. We are letting 50 percent of our population receive unfair treatment for no reason at all. I urge people to fight our problems, once we have that under control, we can fight the Cubans and the IMF and everyone else.

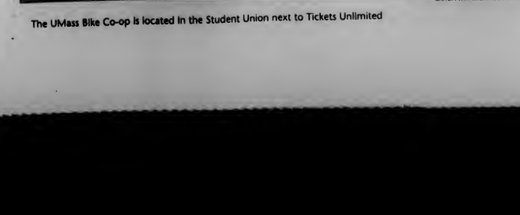
Bike co-op gives you wheels

By David Katzoff
Collegian Staff

Located in the Student Union next to Tickets Unlimited, The UMass Bike Co-op caters and serves to the "two-wheel" needs of the Amherst community. As a student run cooperative specializing in maintenance and repair, staff members collectively share an enthusiasm for cycling and mechanics. By incorporating and uniting their knowledge of the sport (and fixing stuff), they have formed a successfully competitive small business, additionally selling small essentials such as chains, grips and seats. Second hand bikes and fashionably hipster satchel-strap bags are other items sold in the retail department.



The predominant clientele of the UMBC ranges from Pioneer Valley cyclist/commuters and the UMass Bike Club to virtually anyone with ailing bicycles. Since labor is not fixed and the cost overhead is low, there are both limitations and advantages to the shop's operational flexibility. Because of space and budget constraints, inventory is primarily reliant on special order. Capital is gained through the repair and sale of used bicycles, which are purchased, fixed and sold for a diminutive profit. Mechanics, who receive a percentage of the labor cost, are paid based on their time and experience with the shop.

In efforts to stabilize and preserve an egalitarian, democratic organization, the UMBC administers itself with austere formality and highly structured policy. While decision-making is a confederated process, specific expectations are individually placed upon the staff constituents.

Responsibilities (which primarily entail "pulling your weight") include hiring, training, mechanical work, the "two-wheel" needs of the Amherst community, overseeing repairs, accounting and ordering/inventory management. Weekly meetings are also instated to evaluate general operations, professionalism and economics.

Bike Co has made subtle progressions during its more than two decades as a registered student business. Once employed by strictly volunteer labor, UMBC implemented an appropriate payroll system, built with financial incentives for more experienced workers, as well as a co-curricular store constructed upon the principles of a learning environment. In 1995, with the shop facing enormous internal and financial difficulties, "chapter 11" was narrowly prevented by a group of undergrads who re-scribed the business plan and mission.

Today the Co-op remains supportive and active in the cycling community, publicizing and promoting Critical Mass, a group of commuters who spend the last Friday of each month bike riding from Amherst to Northampton on Rt. 9, demonstrating the need for a more cycle-friendly highway. Check out the UMass Bike Co-Op, which will maintain a table at the Earthday celebration this weekend.

Fall of e-commerce companies

By Cassey Gardner
Collegian Staff

Hmmm... what's happening to all this online investment hype? Finally waning is it? Good! Maybe investors and Management Teams are smartening up. VC's and their Internet start-up companies cannot continue to allow IPO Investors to fund their first years of operations. As returns falter, and IPO's begin to flop, how will this play out in the economy in terms of future startup companies and overall success of the stock market?

In the face of online sales rising, there seems to be some Internet Headliners whose stocks have gone south. For instance, the stock prices of CDNow and E-toy have recently dropped to the single digits and the Amazon stock has had almost a 50 percent dip. At the same time, on-line sales are projected to rise at least 50 percent this year, after doubling from last year. Why might these Internet darlings lose the faith of their gold crazy investors?

Many of these companies didn't project the costs of operations and distribution of their products. E-toy has had to spend much more than expected to open up warehousing facilities to simply maintain the supply of customers, much less remain competitive with rivals. Another reason companies have been unable to post a profit is the high cost of marketing their sites. Internet companies are disinterested in advertising on pricey portals, and marketers have turned to expensive off-line efforts to boost their brands. Some companies spend six or eight times the company's sales for a period just to acquire customers. Customer acquisition is very similar to another problem on-line companies are struggling to pay for: shipping.

Many firms have found that customers get to the end of the purchase process, yet balk at the shipping costs and abandon their shopping carts. To alleviate empty carts free shipping is now a competitive advantage on the web. If Amazon has free shipping and Barnes and Noble does not, who will get the sale? This price war situation on the web has re-created the "value-shopper" mentality in the minds of those web shoppers who might not normally search for the best deal.

Since the web has made it so easy, it seems shoppers cannot resist finding the best deal. Companies have been forced to offer so many deals in this "value-shopper" medium, that they cannot sustain their profit margin. This has been the issue for the once famous, now infamous company Buy.Com. In the earlier stages of the Internet, (a year ago, or less) some companies like Buy.com looked like it could become a category killer. With an initial loss on margins, margins were made up for later with the customers who returned to their well-known brand. This myth has not yet come to pass.

About 90 percent of web sites are still offering special deals and incentives. These are the deals funded at early, middle and late rounds of funding. It seems investors are losing patience with this model, as they rightly should. What's funny is that purchasing customers and shareholders of .coms haven't realized that they cannot continue to pay bargain basement prices on merchandise and reap above average returns. The ironic word on the street is that the trend for Venture money is heading towards "Democratization." More inexperienced investors are setting up angel networks to fund fledgling ideas of their neighbors, passed over by VC firms. VC Firms are partnering with Incubator companies that enable and scour campuses for hot new business ideas.

But this "democratization" will be severely affected by the fall of the stock prices of start-ups that would have inspired these campus geniuses. The lack of VC interest in business plans that haven't a chance will eventually trickle down to the amateur angel investors. The experience of investors and startup companies who had great ideas will strongly influence the climate of new ideas and the agencies that fund them in the upcoming years.

It's not that I want to see the stock market take its inevitable adjustment downward. It will be harder to find a job and it will be harder to find optimism for new ideas. It will also force management teams and financial advisors toward a more strategic evaluation of the operations and marketing that will build companies to provide long term value.

Winners and Losers

Chris Brennan

5 Winners:

1. With so many new technologies available and soon to be available, there is demand in the semi-conductor industry. Advanced Micro Devices (AMD) was around $40 in January and now is around $80.
2. Union Pacific Corp. (UNP) beat its projected earnings by .04 cents a share. Its subsidiary Overnight Trucking saw a $1 million operating revenue, this on the heels of a union strike of a small amount of their employees. UNP's greatest growth came from a market that is the most competitive to trucks and other railroads, which could potentially pose problems in the future.
3. Quaker (OAT) hit earnings of .77 cents per share well above the expected .60 cents per share, partially due to Gatorade's better than expected sales. Some new products means better potential for the future.
4. CNET Networks Inc. (CNET) reported a gain of .02 cents per share, which may not seem that great but it is better than the expected loss of .06 cents per share.
5. Union BanCal (UB) reported earnings of .96 cents per share better than the expected .82 cents per share, giving this stock a three-point boost on Thursday.

5 Losers:

1. Another railroad company that saw better than expected earnings was Canadian Pacific (CP), with .93 cents share .22 cents above the expected earnings. Despite this news the shares slipped 1/8 recently.
2. CSX (CSX) and Norfolk Southern Corp (NSC) are experiencing earnings of .15 cents a share, much lower than the expected .36 cents a share and .04 cents a share down from .30 cents a share, respectively. This is partially due to merger problems.
3. IDEC (IDPH) matched their .07 cents earnings per share. This, however, is a 25 percent drop from last year's earnings. This stock saw a high of around $180 and is now around $80.
4. Official Payments Corp. (OPAY) is down about $11 to $5 after a reported .42 cents loss per share.
5. Legato Systems Inc. (LGTOE) may not be listed on the Nasdaq for long. This is because they failed to file its 1999 annual report. The price is down about $4 to $11.

Martin and Candy rule our weekly video pick

By Wes Wrightson
Collegian Staff

My name is Dell Griffith; American Light and Fixture Association, Shower Curtain Ring Division. I sell shower curtain rings best in the business."

This is one of the funniest introductions by a character in a comedy, in my opinion. This week, I am celebrating John Hughes's 1984 comedic masterpiece Trains, Planes, and Automobiles. Starring the portly John Candy as Everyman Dell Griffith (everyone knows a Dell Griffith - someone who just squeaks by in life) and Steve Martin as a hard, by-the-books marketing executive trying to get home to his family for Thanksgiving.

This film is my favorite comedy of all time because of the chemistry between the two screen idols, and the timing of their comedy.

The film concerns Neil Page, who is trying his best to get home in time for Thank-giving dinner. He is thwarted in his first attempt at getting home (hailing a cab) by Dell. Then he is unfortunate enough to have to sit next to Dell on the plane back to St. Louis.

The plane is detoured to Wichita and the two are forced into sleeping the night at the Braidwood Inn. This is where the infamous scene between the two occurs when they wake up in the morning. They are both in the "spoon" position and Dell gently kisses Neil's hand. Neil then asks Dell where his hands are. Dell responds: "Between two pillows, why?" Neil says, "Those aren't pillows!" They both end up on a train, due to the fact they were robbed at the hotel.

Dylan Baker makes an appearance as a gun-rack toting, tobacco-chewing, and down-on-his-luck hick who gives Dell and Neil a lift to the said train station. For those of you who don't know Dylan Baker, he recently starred, with critical acclaim, as a pedophiliac father in Todd Solonze's Happiness.

Anyway, our two journeymen make it to a plane terminal, as their train breaks down and both are forced into taking a bus. It is at the plane terminal where Steve Martin utters his famous, "I need a (expletive) car right (expletive) now" speech to John Hughes alum Edie McClure (Mrs. Pool from the TV show The Hogan Family). Neil and Dell soon find themselves riding across the country in Dell's lemon of a car.

Our two heroes finally make it home to St. Louis where Neil learns that Dell's wife has been dead for eight years. You see, Dell told Neil that his wife loved him unequivocally and was still with him. Upon hearing that Dell has no one to go home to for Thanksgiving, Neil finally does a good deed and invites Dell to his home.

Director John Hughes is a legend in the department of 80's teen movies. He is responsible for such films of the 80's as The Breakfast Club, Sixteen Candles, Ferris Bueller's Day Off, and Pretty In Pink. He is solely responsible for the creation of the Brat Pack. The Brat Pack (comprising Molly Ringwald, Anthony Michael Hall, Andrew McCarthy, Rob Lowe and Emelio Estevezt starred, both together and separately, in many of the films we grew up watching, loving and eventually buying on video. Hughes brings us a sweet story here in Plains, Trains, and Automobiles that concerns two people coming together under unusual circumstances.

Fiction blurs U-571

By Lonnie Harris
Daily Bruin (U. California-Los Angeles)

(U-WIRE) LOS ANGELES -- The makers of U-571, a new submarine film following a group of American seamen in their attempt to steal a code-breaker from a German U-boat during WWII, take special care to note that their film is not technically based on any actual events. Instead, they argue, it's a composite inspired by several different actual WWII missions made by both British and American naval officers.

It's an important distinction in this era when so many films based on actual events, from The Hurricane to The Insider to Erin Brockovich have come under fire for taking artistic liberties with true stories.

There has already been some griping in the British press about U-571, which ends with an American crew salvaging the all-important Enigma code-breaking machine used by the German Navy off the American East Coast in 1941. In truth, the first Enigma machine was captured in May of 1941 by a crew led by Lt. Commander David Balme.

"The Enigma was something very real," director Jonathan Mostow said. "It existed on submarines. It was a code that we were desperately trying to break. We captured an Enigma from a U-Boat. I felt that it was fair game, but this is clearly a work of fiction. In 'Hunt for Red October,' no one ever says, 'Hey, wait a second, the Russians never defected a sub.'"

To help keep the filmmakers true to the history of their tale, Mostow (Breakdown) consulted with numerous experts on U-boats and code-breaking-related espionage from WWII, from those who were present to witness the activities and historians who have made submarine warfare their academic pursuit.

Technical advisors for the film include author of Seizing the Enigma and leading cryptology researcher David Kahn and Vice-Admiral Patrick Hannifin, who served in the U.S. Navy during WWII and operated submarines for 35 years.

"One of the great joys of making movies is that it gives me an opportunity to encounter people I otherwise never would have met," Mostow said. "The fact that admirals, submarine veterans, the world's leading expert on Enigma cryptology and the war hero who actually captured the first Enigma device have given the film their blessing is very meaningful to me."

One of the key technical details captured in U-571 which other similar films haven't really dealt with is the poor condition of the Navy's own submarines at the onset of the War. The War Department had failed to allocate appropriate funds for new submarines before 1942, so most of the submarines sent out before that time were left over from the first World War, with horribly out-of-date technology.

To express the ominous nature of these shaky early boats, the film includes many shots of sprung leaks and hull breaches, adding to its authenticity.

"I love being able to have a blueprint, and be able to say, 'That happened,' because then there's something to work off of," said co-star Matthew McConaughey. "We had Admiral Patrick Hannifin on the set, so there was always somebody that you could ask, 'What was it really like?' Here's the script, but what was it like there? What's the attitude there?"

The story of U-571 starts off simply a German U-boat finds itself off the Eastern Seaboard, replete with a functioning Enigma code machine, the key item needed for the Allies to crack German codes and therefore turn the tables of the war in the Atlantic.

The Navy sends an elite submarine crew, headed by Lt. Commander Mike Dahlgren (Bill Paxton) and his second-in-command, Lt. Andrew Tyler (McConaughey), to the U-boat. Disguised as a German rescue squad, they hope to fool the sailors long enough to get on board the disabled vessel and get the Enigma machine. Unfortunately, while the crew is there, their own submarine is sunk by a German destroyer, leaving them in the

OF ALL THE MAJOR RELIGIOUS LEADERS, ONLY ONE CLAIMED TO BE GOD.

"ANYONE CAN make claims. There have been others who have claimed to be God. I could claim to be God, and you could claim to be God, but the question all of us must answer is, 'What credentials do we bring to substantiate our claim?'

In my case it wouldn't take you five minutes to disprove my claim. It probably wouldn't take too much more to dispose of yours. But when it comes to Jesus of Nazareth, it's not so simple. He had the credentials to back up His claim.

He said, 'Even though you do not believe Me, believe the evidence of the miracles, that you may learn and understand that the Father is in Me, and I in the Father.'

What were Jesus' credentials?

First, His moral character coincided with His claims. Many asylum inmates claim to be celebrities or deities. But their claims are belied by their characters. Not so with Christ. He is unique--as unique as God.

Jesus was sinless. The caliber of His life was such that He was able to challenge His enemies with the question, 'Can any of you prove Me guilty of sin?' He was met by silence, even though He addressed those who would have liked to point out a flaw in His character.

This lack of any sense of moral failure on Jesus' part is astonishing in view of the fact that it is completely contrary to the experience of the saints and mystics in all ages. The closer men and women draw to God, the more overwhelmed they are with their own failure, corruption, and shortcomings.

We read of the temptation of Jesus, but we never hear of a confession of sin on His part. He never asked for forgiveness, though He told His followers to do so.

It is also striking that..."

Life of Three Doors Down

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

"Kryptonite," the first single from Three Doors Down's debut release, The Better Life is quickly climbing to the top of the hard rock charts and securing the band a place on the map of mainstream music. There is no doubt that Three Doors Down has established steady airplay and confidence among radio stations, but the true question is whether or not the band can survive the success of "Kryptonite," and continue the search for acceptance. After so many bands in the rock era have attempted to persuade listeners that they have what it takes to stand the tests of time, Three Doors Down feels that they certainly have something prove. The Better Life is not only a statement that the band members will try as hard as they can to impress the rock world. It is also a crisp start to a career that could very well become something special.

The originality of Three Doors Down shows right away in lead singer Brad Arnold. Arnold is not only the vocal genius behind the successful band, but much like musical superstars Phil Collins from Genesis and Dave Grohl from Foo Fighters, he's the band's drummer. The idea of a singer/drummer is something that is not unheard of, but is certainly quite rare. It can be a very difficult transition from drums to almost anything else. Arnold's talents are superb. The lyrics stand out on the album, and after learning that he was also the drummer, I gained a little more respect for the drum beats that I already knew were not bad at all. In addition to Arnold, the band consists of Todd Harrell on the bass, and two guitarists, Chris Henderson and Matt Roberts.

The Better Life has some very clear strong points. The album was produced by Toby Wright, who has previously lent his talents to Alice in Chains and Korn. His experience has taught him that the most important aspect to success is to truly make the most prominent portions of the album stand out. This certainly describes where "Kryptonite" comes from. The fact remains that "Kryptonite" is the highlight of the album. It seems that radio stations have been unable to go about five minutes in the past two months without giving the public a hefty dose of "If I go crazy then will you still call me Superman?" There is no denying that it is a terrific song. The catchy tune has moved its way to the number four spot on Billboard Magazine's list of top modern rock tracks. Perhaps the best part about the song is how unusual it is. It's not quite definite what the band is talking about, but the implied meaning of loyalty and truth are hinted. The song has substantially given the band a base from which to work, and there is certainly room for expansion. The song is very meaningful. As with most of the album, the lyrics are very well written. There is a lot of passion in the words that drive the band.

The rest of the album is quite good. The second track, "Loser" has a very Stone Temple Pilots sound to it. It is clear that the angst and aggression from 90's rock certainly proves influential on the entire CD. Additionally, songs such as the title track "Better Life," "Smack" and Duck and Run" are just more support that Three Doors Down is hard rock. This is what the fans will look for if they are expecting more tracks like "Kryptonite."

Songs such as "Be Like That" and "Not Enough," prove that Three Doors Down's talent extends from hard, angry rock, to soft ballads like that of Collective Soul. "Be Like That" is performed in storytelling format, and makes it very easy to listen to. The band should be proud of its many talents because it is always nice to see a group have a wide range of talents. The music world is constantly changing and, in order to stay alive, you must be able to adapt. The truth remains that if a band cannot keep delivering the goods to cater to what the fans want, it will cease to exist. Since The Better Life is an original piece of art by itself, Three Doors Down has already demonstrated that it has the talent to keep the hits coming. It is just essential that the band members do not run dry of ideas and become hackneyed. It seems as though Three Doors Down will certainly have the capability to stick around.

The Better Life by Three Doors Down is certainly worth a listen. The only problem that I see developing is the band becoming stuck in a world of over exploitation. If "Kryptonite" becomes the next "Smooth" by Santana, it will hurt the band's Integrity. Let's hope that WAAF in Boston understands that. There have been so many cases that a band had so much potential, and were simply ruined by overplaying one song. After speaking to one rock fan last night, we both agreed that Marcy's Playground was a victim of this. People were so sick of hearing the debut song "Sex and Candy," that no one was even interested in hearing what else the band had to say. I recently heard an acoustic version of "Kryptonite." I think it is definitely time for the radio stations to move on, and exhibit some more of the good material on the album, before extreme boredom causes the listeners decide to move on.

For the most part, the album is a solid debut for a band that should be able to sustain the tests of rock stardom. If nothing else, The Better Life has a song that mentions the man of steel. That can't be bad. B+

Three Doors Down is riding high on instant success. If they go crazy will you still call them Supermen?

The director strikes back

By Francis C. Thompson
The Diamondback (University of Maryland)

(U-WIRE) A crowd of about 130 University of Maryland students watched a screening of The Empire Strikes Back and had a discussion with the film's director, Irvin Kershner, Wednesday night in the Art-Sociology Building.

Kershner, who also directed Robo Cop II and The Eyes of Laura Mars, answered students' questions on the film and on the subject of digital narrative. The lecture was the third in the Maryland Institute for Technology in the Humanities Distinguished Lecture Series.

Students expressed excitement at the opportunity to discuss the film with Kershner, who directed Episode V of the series. Richard Marquand directed Episode VI and George Lucas directed Episodes IV and I.

"The whole Star Wars trilogy has been a big part of my life and I was very young when it came out. Now it's been with me forever and just to see someone who has been behind it is just amazing that it has come to campus," said Don Ayres, a senior communication major.

Others wanted to learn not only about Kershner but his new concentration in the film industry.

"I'm going to talk about how modern film making is done with digital technology and I want to know how movies are made today with the new technology that is out now," said Rahul Rahman, a junior computer science major.

In an interview before the program, Kershner said that he would try to focus his discussion with the students on the impact of digital narrative. He explained that digital technology had replaced the old way of putting special effects in film. Kershner told the audience that instead of using such techniques as "blue screen" and animation, new technology has cut the time it takes to edit and is more cost effective.

"The difference now is that you can make immediate decisions, try it out, see it, and say that's it and you've got it. Digital is immediate, that's the difference. The old processes took days and sometimes weeks to get together. Then if it didn't work, you had to start all over again," Kershner said.

Kershner pointed to the movie The Matrix as an example of how digital technology has changed the film industry and pulled in audiences.

"The story was nonsense, the acting was stupid, but the special effects were so good people loved it and went to see it," Kershner said. Martha Nell Smith, director of the Maryland Institute for Technology in the Humanities, said she hoped that students would take advantage of having the opportunity to talk with and learn from Kershner.

"One of the things that we're doing at MITH is we're getting students involved in producing resources, artistic works, and critical resources. They'll be able to learn from him because this is the very best Star Wars film, in my humble opinion," Smith said.

middle of hostile waters on the deck of a foreign, and broken, submarine.

The film is the brainchild of fellow screenwriters Sam Montgomery and David Ayer from an original story by Mostow. The filmmakers and actors involved in the project strove for the maximum level of authenticity, from details in the art direction to the personalities and relationships of the men operating submarines during the World War II.

"These guys really wanted to do a true-to-life World War II submarine movie," Paxton said. "What's fun about doing these kind of movies is that you get to learn some cool history. It's supposed to just be a thrilling experience for the audience, and it sort of picks up where 'Das Boot' left off."

"Das Boot" was director Wolfgang Peterson's 1981 groundbreaking German-made submarine film. Coincidentally, that movie's production designer Gotz Weidner, along with American art director William Skinner, joined forces to give U-571 a similar feeling, while adding more modern effects and design techniques.

The entire effect does give the feeling of a living history of sorts, despite all those warnings that it's just a made-up thriller. "I know the British are upset," Paxton said. "But, it's always just been a work of fiction. It's just a fun ride."

U-571 opens in theaters nationwide today.

If Pavlick and Naber acted the proverbial knife in the Hawks' back, then Sara MacNabb certainly did much of the pushing. The Baldwinsville, NY native not only scored the game's first goal, but tacked on four assists on the afternoon.

The defensive effort will be faced with the daunting task of controlling an ambitious Temple unit that put an 18-spot in a convincing victory against the Hokies a week ago.

Virginia Tech, on the other hand, was not equipped with stalwart netminder Jen Nardi, who is ranked at the top in the Atlantic 10 amongst her position. Nardi and her stingy defensive mates, senior co-captain Lynne Young and seniors Jessica Passanese, Melissa Miele and Colleen Wales, as well as junior Denise Brey, are part of the second coming of women's lacrosse at UMass – a generation of stick-handlers that needs a victory over the Owls for validation.

In 1991, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse program was disbanded, only to be reformed after a two-season absence. The break in the action left the Minutewomen starting from scratch once again, unable to ride on the legacy, one with a 1982 NCAA National Championship, that UMass once had.

"In the mid-80's, Temple and UMass were among the top five of women's lacrosse teams in the country," Barnes said. "Since the reinstatement of the program, last year was about as close to beating them as we've come."

Martin is Jets' real "Key"

By Bob Glauber
Newsday

Contrary to popular opinion, the Jets did not lose their best player when two-time Pro Bowl wide receiver Keyshawn Johnson was traded to the Tampa Bay Buccaneers for two first-round draft choices.

In fact, they didn't even lose their second-best player.

Just ask Vinny Testaverde.

The Jets quarterback, speaking publicly for the first time since Johnson was dealt last week in the controversial trade, said yesterday that tailback Curtis Martin, not Johnson, has been the team's best player the past two seasons. And the second-best player, according to Testaverde? Linebacker Mo Lewis.

"Johnson has certainly done a lot of things to be called the best player, but to me, Curtis Martin is our best player," Testaverde said during a conference call with reporters. "Mo Lewis is probably our next best player; guys who are doing it down after down. Keyshawn touches the ball maybe an average of six or eight times a game, where Curtis is getting it 25 to 30 times a game. To me, Curtis is certainly more valuable than Keyshawn Johnson.

"The thing we'll miss about Key is his physical play, no question," said Testaverde, whose rehabilitation from an Achilles' heel injury is progressing and will not prevent him from playing this season. "He went after every ball you threw."

Johnson did not return repeated phone calls.

While Testaverde is disappointed Johnson won't return and is concerned about his replacement, Testaverde also believes the Jets can be a playoff team.

If the Jets do pick up a veteran receiver, it is likely they will wait until players are released June 1, when teams pressed by the salary cap waive those with high salaries. The Jets will take a wait-and-see approach about Cincinnati Bengals wide receiver Carl Pickens, who may be released in the wake of the team's selection of first-round wideout Peter Warrick of Florida State. The Jets are not expected to make a trade offer to Cincinnati for Pickens, because they don't want to give up any draft picks as compensation.

"Each time I sat down with the coaches and we talked about a possible trade, the same thing kept coming up that there's a possibility Keyshawn was going to be traded," Testaverde said. "And if he was going to get traded, we needed to get some help on the defense. They don't want shootouts. I've been on teams that have scored a lot of points, but the defense couldn't stop anybody. One way to do that was to trade Keyshawn."

As for Pennington, Testaverde said he understands the reasons behind it, but admits he was initially disappointed the team didn't draft a player who could have helped immediately. A player such as a big-time wide receiver, perhaps?

"Selfishly, my first thought was, 'Well, Chad's not going to help me right now win games,'" Testaverde said. "But thinking from management's point of view, you have to prepare for the future because you don't know what's going to happen with injury or, if you're going for a championship and I decided to leave, we have to prepare for that."

Morency hopes to put Vic in victory for men's track

By Jen Cormier
Collegian Staff

Every successful team needs a leader. A go-to guy. A Mr. Dependable. And for the members of the Massachusetts men's outdoor track team, its leader comes in the form of a 6-foot-5-inch senior named Vic Morency.

"We always count on Vic," coach Ken O'Brien said of his star thrower, who was recently selected as a 2000 National Strength and Conditioning Association All-American Athlete. "To have someone like him on your team lifts everybody up when you go into a big athletic competition."

This weekend, Morency once again will have the responsibility of hoisting the team on his back as he leads the Minutemen into their toughest meet of the season. On Saturday, the Maroon and White will travel to Hartford, CT to lock horns with UConn, Brown, Princeton and Providence.

"For us to roll up our sleeves and come up on top would be almost impossible," O'Brien said, noting that UConn and Princeton were ranked second and seventh in the nation, respectively, during the indoor season. "Our hope is that we can squeeze some points out here and there and make it an interesting battle."

Morency, who will compete in javelin, discus and shot put, will be the team's best chance to put points on the board. His most foreboding opponent will come during the shot put event, when he will test his skills against Princeton's Scott Denbo, who was a national qualifier during the indoor season.

Although jumping remains the Minutemen's Achilles' heel, rookie Tony Ortega has emerged as a solid performer in the long jump. Senior Ben Baraldi should be a threat in the hurdles, while sophomore Kevin Curtin and seniors Matt Ely and Sean Murphy are the squad's strongest distance runners.

The squad will compete without the services of sophomore mid-distance runner Mike Howell, who incurred a hamstring injury during the first meet of the spring campaign. Although there are no other serious injuries, O'Brien feels that the team's current physical condition is far from ideal.

"We're showing small signs of wearing down, with aches and pains and nagging injuries," he said. "Our goal these next couple of weeks is to back off some of the kids so that we can freshen them up and come up with some championship meet performances when the time comes."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Vic Morency

Due to the relative youth of his team, O'Brien attributes the wear-and-tear to the fact that many of the rookies are unaccustomed to the daily grind of the long season. Thus, the coach prefers to emphasize experience over winning for this weekend's meet, which he views as a tune-up for the upcoming championship meets.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Ben Baraldi

"I don't want to go into this weekend with expectations to win, but we've got to have the best meet we can and walk away with something positive," he said. "The opportunity to play two tough opponents will prepare up better for the championships."

A relationship on the rocks

By Jon Heyman
Newsday

NEW YORK – This mistake wasn't Bobby Valentine's. He was just being himself when he gave fancy answers to a bunch of college kids. And that's what they were, kids.

Maybe it wasn't even entirely the fault of Steve Phillips, like Valentine the victim of an untenable situation.

Maybe this one is on Fred Wilpon, who turned Flushing into Lame Duck City.

Perhaps the only solution now is to do what Wilpon should have done months ago, extend through next season the contracts of both his high-ranking, high-performing lame ducks, Valentine and Phillips. Wilpon must do what he can to force them to put aside their battles, to make them stop focusing on who's to credit and who's to blame. The solution is to tell them they're both returning. It's part reward, part punishment; they get to keep their jobs but have to live with each other.

Despite their transparent kissy-face session Tuesday, Valentine and Phillips only share a deep distrust of one another. The Mets' dirty little secret is out. In some ways, their front-office family is as dysfunctional as Steinbrenner's ever was. Factions and feuds divide their hierarchy. Wilpon and in-the-background co-owner Nelson Doubleday aren't chums. Nor are Phillips and Dave Howard, the club's senior VP for business and legal affairs. And so on.

Yet, none of this matters if the team wins, and Valentine and Phillips give them their best chance. Putting aside who says what and who trusts whom, they both deserve to keep their jobs. Fact is, Wilpon should feel indebted to them. The reason he can tell Cablevision $400 million won't cut it is because Valentine and Phillips helped make the team a winner after six straight years of losing. In 1996, before they came aboard, the Mets were the Brewers.

Reached at his office Wednesday, Wilpon declined to say whether he believed the lame-duck statuses of Valentine and Phillips exacerbate their already tough relationship. What he did say was, "I am hopeful, and certainly would like it at the end of the year, if we have a successful year – and that doesn't necessarily mean winning the World Series or being the last team in the playoffs – I would like to see both these guys stay in the organization. My hope is that we can all pull together and have a successful season."

At this point, there's no guarantee either man takes a one-year extension to remain with the Mets and each other. Phillips is extremely popular around baseball, so maybe he thinks he'll do better elsewhere now. Valentine might assume he can have Davey Johnson's job if the Dodgers falter again.

But who knows, they might stomach each other another year. You should have seen the acts they were willing to put on Tuesday. Even after the cameras were off and the reporters had walked away, a peek back revealed them smiling at each other and giving each other hearty hand-shakes after the 10-7 victory. Yes, they're fine actors.

"Steve and I have been a really good team," Valentine said, "and I think we're going to continue to be a good team." While true, the shocker was him managing to say it without appearing pained.

As we got caught up in the tangled web of Brad34, the overzealous schoolboy Internet poster, who now says he exaggerated what Valentine told Wharton students, we forgot winning is what matters. The year Valentine finished up for Dallas Green the Mets won 71 games.

So Valentine has trouble keeping his trap shut, even after being told to do so. That's not news. The news was the inquisition. The fact Met bigwigs discussed firing Valentine over nothing spoke volumes, way more than even Valentine, who said nothing incendiary as it turns out. Mets people say Phillips' anger was over Valentine's answers to him not jibing with his public remarks. Yet, the real question is, why did it any of it matter? Phillips should have reacted as Mets players did, with laughter. The team won three out of four after Brad34, just as it won after every "crisis" last year.

Valentine can't be easy to manage. And yet, the fellow who now manages him shouldn't get to decide his fate, not if he's going to go to Pittsburgh seeking trouble. Should Phillips be allowed to replace Valentine with someone more malleable, more manageable? For whose benefit? Phillips' own off-field indiscretion should not have cost him his job. And neither should Valentine's minor indiscretions.

Where's proof that Phillips ally Dave Wallace is managerial timber? Or Wallace's chum, Kevin Kennedy? Or Bruce Benedict, who raised suspicion in players by standing nearby when they discussed something juicy? Or even Tom Seaver, who's hinted to some he'd like to manage someday and showed more interest this spring than last in tutoring pitchers?

Phillips' overreaction has cost him the right to judge Valentine. Wilpon should take control, ending this foolishness with strong offers to ensure that the two men most responsible for the Mets' recent successes keep their focus on what's important.

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) Others may be doubtful, but you know what you're talking about and you believe in it quite strongly. You needn't abandon your ideals.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Play no pranks today, and don't stoop to behavior for which you would punish or criticize others. You must play it straight at this time.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Take time out of your otherwise busy schedule to treat yourself to something you only get to enjoy rarely. It needn't cost a lot of money, either!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – The people you encounter today are likely to be impressed by something rather unusual about you – and it's likely to remain a mystery to you, too!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – You may not want to accept an invitation of involvement today, as personal issues are requiring a great deal of private thought and introspection.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – You're not being honest with a loved one, and he or she may know it! Now is no time to be selfish, but be open and honest. You can make amends.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – A chance to enjoy something for the sake of a friend or loved one must not be ignored today. It's a good time to be a little selfless.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – A long-term friendship may be giving you difficulty today, as you are met with demands you cannot fulfill with a clear conscience.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – Awkward social situations may be unavoidable today, but you can make the best of them by remaining honest and open in conversation.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – Don't lose your cool today. It's important that you keep your emotions in check and that you look at problems from a rational viewpoint.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Don't skip anything that has been assigned to you today, or you risk permanent damage to your reputation. Somebody has his or her eyes on you.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Take care that you don't explain yourself a little too much today; after all, there are some things best left to the imagination!

The Massachusetts baseball team lock horns with Fordham this weekend before swinging through Boston for the Beanpot Tournament early next week.

Baseball picks up pace

Minutemen ram heads with feisty Fordham

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

Coming off a strong 8-2 victory over Vermont on Wednesday, the Massachusetts baseball team is once again poised to take control. Having struggled with an inconsistent offense all season long, the Minutemen are looking to savor their latest taste of success as the Fordham Rams visit Earl Lorden Field this afternoon to kick off a three-game weekend series.

The Rams (11-21 overall, 1-8 Atlantic 10) are a team faced with an identity crisis and no solution in sight. Although the Rams have a roster spotted with individual talent, both on the mound and offensively, Fordham has yet to find a way to translate that success to the entire team. Whatever the troubles may be, UMass Head Coach Mike Stone says the last thing he expects is for the Rams to shy away.

"I expect them to be ready to play," said Stone. "It's a big series for both of us. We haven't dominated a series yet, so we have to have a great series here to make progress in the A-10. Everybody gets pumped for conference games."

Although it's never safe to put all your money on one horse, the Minutemen will once again turn to sophomore catcher Chris Morgan to lead the team through the weekend. Morgan, currently pacing all Minutemen hitters with a .390 batting average, has been one of the key stabilizing elements all season for UMass. His game on Thursday, in which he went three for five and scored the winning run, was just a microcosm of how his effort and talent has paid off since game one. Stone says the pressure of shouldering the load and hitting in the No. 4 spot is something Morgan enjoys.

"He does a great job, he's a real player," said Stone. "Offensively, he's our best hitter. He's good at calling pitches, catching pitches, and he's strong defensively. He's one of the guys we can count on, and he can handle that."

With Morgan as the focal point of the offense, a good deal of attention is being paid to senior Shaun Skeffington as well, for different reasons. The second baseman was expected to lead the team this season, but has yet to produce the numbers that were expected of him. His effort is unquestionable, but unfortunately there are no statistics for hustle. As of Thursday afternoon, Skeffington was batting .289 with no home runs and only eight runs batted in.

"He's played hard," said Stone. "Maybe in his situation he's trying too hard. Sometimes you put too much pressure on yourself, and that affects your performance. He just needs to stay with himself and everything will be fine."

To gain that all-important ground in the A-10, the Minutemen will have to play around some key members of the Fordham roster. Sophomore Jason Walker is currently leading the Rams with a .345 batting average. Although the outfielder has yet to hit a home run, he has collected 20 RBI and has scored 17 runs. Directly behind Walker is junior Anthony Vega, who is putting up numbers that nearly mirror those of Walker's. The catcher/designated hitter is hitting .342 with no homers, 16 RBI and 18 runs scored. Senior shortstop Dan Colonna and freshman Robert Kingsbury are tied for the team lead in home runs with four apiece.

Two bright spots on the mound for Fordham have been senior Rob Agger and freshman Anthony Santopolo. Agger is 2-1 with an ERA of 2.79, good for first on the team. In 42-plus innings of work, he has struck out 31 batters and walked another 24. Santopolo carries a higher ERA at 5.38, but has yielded only two home runs on his way to compiling a 3-0 record. The remainder of the Fordham staff falls somewhere in the middle ground, with no other pitcher carrying a record over .500.

The first pitch of today's doubleheader is scheduled for noon.

Minutemen looking to capital-ize

For the time being, there's a pep in the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's step. Down and out in the Pioneer Valley after a three-game slide, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's melancholy spirits received a much-needed jolt on Wednesday by way of a 10-9 victory over No. 13 Harvard.

That, however, was only a quiz. Tomorrow, in the nation's capital, the Minutemen will tackle arguably their biggest test of the season thus far.

PREVIEW

The schedule pits UMass (5-5, 1-3 Eastern College Athletic Conference) against fifth-ranked Georgetown (9-1), who has already wrapped the first ECAC title ever, thanks to a 4-0 in conference, including a 14-10 victory over Navy that gives the Hoyas all tiebreakers for the NCAA automatic bid handed to the conference winner.

Momentum was on the decline heading into Wednesday's tussle with Harvard, but a steady offense paired with a stingy defense sunk the Crimson in the second half. Trailing 7-6 at the half, senior Mike Janowicz heated up, scoring the team's final two goals, including the game-winner in the opening minute of the fourth quarter. With over 14 minutes remaining, Harvard had plenty of time to knot it up, but the UMass front wouldn't give.

A victory indeed, perhaps even an upset, but the Maroon and White take a step up when visiting Georgetown's lair. Six have tried and six have failed in trying to beat the Hoyas at Harbin Field. Georgetown's only loss came at the hands of No. 6 Duke, a 13-12 decision.

"You need to play intensely for 60 minutes and what we did with Harvard we can hopefully do tomorrow [against Georgetown]," Head Coach Greg Cannella said.

"Their experience and athleticism along with their game sense make for a great team."

A final four team last year, Georgetown is led by a vicious trio of senior attackmen. Andy Flick's 49 points (26 goals, 23 assists) has him ranked sixth in the country, while Scott Urick has netted a team-high 28 scores in his final season. In the middle is Peter Velepec, who has come on as a senior to become the team's second-leading scorer.

The scary thought is that the Hoyas have a more potent offense than the Greyhounds of Loyola, who pusted a blackjack on the Minutemen last Saturday. And even scarier is that Georgetown's defense is almost as good, yielding 8.20 goals per game, about half a goal better than UMass. However, take away Loyola's 16-goal explosion in the second half against the Minutemen and the fort has been guarded quite mightily.

"It was great," Cannella said, after Harvard came out strong in the first half. "I think those guys understand that they have the abilities to play that way all the time."

UMass came out with a vengeance on offense, with an attitude that has been lacking in recent past. The Minutemen tallied the game's first three goals, also notching the final two. Four players had multi-goal games, led by Janowicz's late surge.

"I thought our guys really dodged to score, dodged to create. We went hard to the cage," Cannella said. "I think that [Harvard goalie Keith] Cyrar is as good a goalie as we'll see."

The Minutemen, however, may not have the opportunities they had in Wednesday's mid-week melee. UMass outshot the Crimson 46-22, but even with that advantage, the Maroon and White managed just a one-goal surplus in the scoring column.

"Our ability to create against Harvard was excellent. I would have hoped for some more scoring. We dominated that side of the field," Cannella said. "We're going to have to take a lot of shots and we'd like shoot a higher percentage."

Senior attackman Rich Kunkel was held to one goal in Wednesday's 10-9 win over Harvard, but his 19 scores are still good for the team high.

Cross makes triumphant return, sweeping Fordham

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Like that BMG package that takes two months to arrive, the Massachusetts softball team must be pleased with what came yesterday... even if it turned up a bit late.

After a 0-9 start, a few bat streaks, and many a bout with mediocrity, the Minutewomen eclipsed the .500 mark for the first time this season yesterday, sweeping a pair of games against host Fordham, 12-1, 5-1.

In the first contest, UMass (20-19, 6-2 Atlantic 10) spotted the Rams (11-12, 1-7 A-10) their only run in the first inning, and responded with 12 unanswered scores. The hitting barrage was led by freshman first baseman Brandi Cross, who had missed the team's previous four games due to a death in the family.

Cross made a triumphant return, hitting two home runs and adding a double against Fordham pitcher Courtney Collins, who was tagged with the loss. The California native finished the opening contest with three RBI and three runs scored.

While Cross did the damage from the plate, pitcher Kaila Holtz, the team's other standout freshman, dominated from the mound. Holtz, who has settled comfortably into the top UMass pitching position, went the distance for the Minutewomen, allowing only one run. She improved her season record to 10-6 with the victory.

Another freshman with promise, shortstop Emily Robustelli, continued her hot streak at the plate, going 2 for 4 with three RBI. In the team's previous game against Temple, Robustelli belted a grand-slam home run over the fence of the new softball complex.

Sophomore third baseman Cherra Wheeler regained a bit of her old form yesterday. In game one, finishing two for two from the plate with two RBI of her own.

UMass	5

Fordham could manage only two hits against Holtz. The lone Ram run was scored on a fielder's choice by Fordham senior outfielder Megan Georgvich.

Riding the laurels of their dominating performance in the first contest, the Minutewomen cruised to victory in game two behind the arm of sophomore pitcher Jen Hadley (6-6). After a shaky start to begin the 2000 campaign, Hadley has pitched extremely well in her last three outings, allowing only two runs. In the first of those three, Hadley, a co-captain, tossed a no-hitter against Central Connecticut.

It seems as though the entire UMass pitching staff has come around as of late. The other Minutewoman starter, junior Carrie Jeffries, did not pitch against the Rams, but threw strongly in her last outing against the Owls. Jeffries went the distance, allowing only one run.

Totman hosts A-10 tangle as No. 18 Owls fly north

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

In the world of "big games," today's match-up between the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team and Temple at Totman Field at 3:00 p.m. is about as gargantuan as they come.

Not only do Temple and UMass have a long history of a heated rivalry, the teams finished one and two in the 1999 Atlantic 10 regular season. Right about this time a year ago, on April 16, the Minutewomen went to Philadelphia and suffered a heartbreaking 6-5 loss to the Owls that would turn out to be the difference in their conference records. Temple finished the season 5-0, and Massachusetts was a step behind them at 4-1.

This time around, the Owls bring with them an equally unblemished 5-0 A-10 mark, while the Minutewomen have prepared for their arrival with a nearly clean 5-1 slate. If there was a better time to become a fan of women's lacrosse, UMass coach Phil Barnes doesn't know of it.

"It's the biggest A-10 game of the year," Barnes said. "They're the top team in the conference and ranked at 18 in the nation.

Fay Naber

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Traditionally the games are very tight. It's going to be a war."

Playing against a team that boasts super-star Kelly Ruch, who ran away with the league Player of the Week honors after scoring 25 points in a four-game span, a large, vocal crowd might be just the edge UMass needs.

Kelli Kurtz

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

"We're playing the Owls – bring your John Chaney masks," Barnes joked.

Ruch's seven-day output is particularly intimidating because it is one point more than the Maroon and White's leading scorer, Stephanie Pavlick, has all season.

Pavlick, however, is hitting her stride at just the right time. The senior midfielder is hot off of two straight four-goal games, against reigning A-10 tourney champ Virginia Tech and conference rival St. Joseph's. Also peaking as Temple comes to town is junior Fay Naber, who welcomes the Owls on the heels of a six-point performance against the Hawks.

"Steph's playing very well," Barnes said. "[Senior co-captain] Rebecca Minaker and Fay Naber also had fantastic days Wednesday. It'll take a total team effort to beat Temple. For the defense, we're looking for them to play at the top of its game."

SGA, GSS continue SLSO debate

Funding questioned

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

In a Senate meeting last Wednesday, when the Student Government Association (SGA) announced that they would fund the Student Legal Services Office (SLSO) 100 percent, excluding graduate students from its services, the Graduate Student Senate (GSS) walked out.

Jon Zibbell, executive officer of the GSS rebuked the SGA, stating that the SGA "has a real inflated ego if they believe that they have the power to kick graduate students out."

Amy Pellegrino, chair of the Ways and Means Committee, said based on the graduate students' usage of the SLSO office and the complexity of their cases, they should be funding for 25 percent of the total budget.

According to her, she arrived at this calculation that indicate that while graduate students use the SLSO much less than undergraduate students, the legal reasons for using the SLSO are usually much more complex. Some of the cases include custody battles and divorces. Considering that these kinds of legal suits involve more time, she said that SGA considered 25 percent contribution by the GSS "quite reasonable."

"We weren't going to accept anything less than 25 percent, and until they are willing to pay that, undergraduates would be paying their bills," Pellegrino said. "If undergraduates refuse graduates, and fund it solely by ourselves, we'd be getting all the service."

However, Zibbell said that the GSS has not been able to fund the 25 percent of the SLSO budget for the last five years because this amount of funding is 30 percent funding is 30 percent of the GSS budget. According to him, GSS has an annual budget of $275,000 dollars, whereas the SGA has an annual budget of $1.6 million. The 75 percent of the SGA funding towards SLSO makes up approximately 12 percent of their total.

"It's not fair that we're paying 30 percent of our budget and they're only paying 12 percent," Zibbell said. "The way they give their statistics is screwed."

Zibbell went on to explain that most of the cases graduate students bring to the SLSO do involve a lot more time than undergraduate cases, but he stated that most of the custody battles and divorce suits get resourced out from the SLSO, to another lawyer independent of the office.

Zibbell said it is unfair that the SGA is basing the amount of funding on a service model in which the consumer pays for the individual service they get, when this in fact goes against the mission statement of SLSO.

According to Zibbell, the SLSO Advisory Board bylaws state that under indigent law in a public institution, the office should provide service to all individuals in need of it, regardless of how much money they can provide.

"A 'you get what you pay for' model of Legal Services in which each organization pays a rate proportional to the size of the student body it represents, is not only unfair and unethical, but it replicates the consumer fee-for-service model that we desperately need to abandon."

The GSS votes not to fund the SLSO at a meeting last month while members of the SGA look on

"The SGA are all a bunch of white, middle-class students who think they have all this power because of their unquestioned privilege," Zibbell said.

During last Wednesday's meeting, GSS proposed to the SLSO Advisory Board and SGA that instead of differential funding based on the use of the office, which he said is loosely defined, it was suggested that an equal percentage of the SGA and GSS budget be allocated to fund Legal Services.

"The Graduate Student Senate would give 16 percent of its annual budget to the SLSO and we asked the SGA to do the same," Zibbell said. "If the SGA and GSS both give 16 percent of their total budget, Student Legal Services will be fully funded."

Pellegrino and SGA said they wouldn't accept only 16 percent of GSS's budget, stating that their decision is a reflection of their priorities towards child care, which increased more than $50,000 dollars." Pellegrino said.

"If we give SLSO 16 percent and graduate students only use it two percent, then that's fine because it's not about the money," Zibbell said. "It's about providing legal services to people who need them."

The SLSO has been focusing on increasing the amount of service available to students by creating a fourth lawyer to work directly with students in the office. Pellegrino said this addition would cost SLSO close to $47,000 dollars. She said that even with this expense, the graduates are interested in the fourth lawyer, but are not willing to pay for it.

"We're not getting a fourth lawyer, but getting the same increased service we'd be getting with a fourth lawyer by getting rid of the graduate students," Pellegrino said.

Zibbell, likewise, stated even with equal funding at 16

Elian reunited with father; Federal agents forced to break into relatives' home

By Karen DeYoung
The Washington Post

Eight helmeted, SWAT-equipped federal agents broke down the front door of the Miami home of Elian Gonzalez's relatives before dawn Saturday and removed the boy, avoiding serious incident but sparking a day of sporadic violence and demonstrations in Little Havana. Four hours later, Elian's Cuban father walked alone onto a government jet at Andrews Air Force Base, and emerged cradling his 6-year-old son.

Miami's Cuban American community erupted in outrage in the wake of the surprise raid by more than 130 Immigration and Naturalization Service agents, who arrived in a convoy of white vans about 5:10 a.m., fanned out around the house, and used pepper spray to push back demonstrators gathered outside.

The agents corralled the frightened family inside at gunpoint. Elian was found in a bedroom, halfway inside a small closet, in the arms of one of the Florida fishermen who had rescued him from the Atlantic Ocean on Thanksgiving Day.

Elian was handed to a female agent who bundled the boy into a blanket, and rushed him out the door and into a van that quickly backed away from the home. The officers were in and out of the house in three minutes.

Those up early enough to witness the astounding scene on live television soon saw Attorney General Janet Reno emerge from her Justice Department office, with INS Commissioner Doris M. Meissner at her side. "The most important thing," Reno said, "is that Elian is safe and that no one was seriously hurt."

The raid came after hours of last-minute efforts to get the two sides of the family together failed. Long past midnight, the last proposal had Reno, herself, determining the conditions under which the two sides of Elian's family would stay together.

President Clinton said the relatives' intransigence had left Reno no alternative but to "enforce the decision of the INS and the federal court" that Elian must be returned to his father. Reno, he said in a brief morning statement outside the White House, had done "the right thing, and I'm very pleased with the way she handled it."

But others, including the boy's Miami relatives and others who want Elian to remain in the United States, thought the government action was too strong-armed.

"They took this kid like a hostage in the nighttime," said Donato Dalrymple, the fisherman who was holding Elian when federal agents cornered him.

Elian was already in the air before the stunned, pepper-sprayed crowd around the relatives' home seemed to know what had hit it. Marisleysis Gonzalez, Lazaro Gonzalez's 21-year-old daughter, ran outside and fell to the ground in tears. Ramon Saul Sanchez, leader of the exile Democracy Movement, who for weeks had organized the demonstrators in a round-the-clock vigil, seemed initially in a daze that he said resulted from a blow delivered by an INS agent's rifle butt.

Later, Marisleysis Gonzalez erupted in anger as thousands awoke to the news and began to fill the Little Havana streets that were already manned with riot-outfitted police.

"She's lying," she said of Reno's insistence that the agents had used minimal force. "They acted like dogs. . . . They could have done this in good faith. I told her personally . . . I didn't want violence."

Although Elian was clearly seen crying out in fear as he was carried into the van, agents reported that he was calm as the vehicle raced to a U.S. Marshals Service helicopter at a nearby staging point. The only thing he said, they reported, was that he didn't want to go to Cuba. Speaking in Spanish, they told him not to worry; they were taking him to his father.

After the helicopter delivered them to Homestead Air Force Base, Elian was examined by a U.S. Public Health Service physician, pronounced fit and put aboard a Marshals Service jet along with the doctor, a psychologist, and the female agent who had carried him out of his great-uncle's house. After one refueling stop, they landed at Andrews at 9:20 a.m., where he was reunited with his father, his stepmother, and his 6-month-old half-brother.

The family was taken to a small house on the base where they are expected to stay for several days before moving to Wye Plantation, a secluded conference center on Maryland's Eastern Shore. Elian got down on the carpeted floor and began playing with his baby brother.

The Miami relatives flew to Washington in the afternoon and went to Capitol Hill to meet with Sen. Bob Smith, R-N.H. As they did, other leading Republicans condemned the federal use of force, comparing the predawn raid to the tactics of Cuban President Fidel Castro. "The chilling picture of a little boy being removed from his home at gunpoint defies the values of America, and is not an image a freedom-loving nation wants to show the world," said Republican presidential candidate George W. Bush.

The worst of it, family representatives insisted, was that the raid had occurred at the very moment the relatives were talking on the phone with mediators in Washington, trying to negotiate a solution. Just before the agents blasted through the door, however, Reno told them that time had run out.

At midnight Friday, three groups of people were gathered around telephones and fax machines, trying to arrange a last-minute deal that would avoid what all felt would be an unfortunate – and some feared would be a violent – end to the standoff over Elian.

In Washington, at least seven senior officials were gathered in Reno's fifth-floor office in the Justice Department's gray headquarters at Ninth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, including Reno, Deputy Attorney General Eric H. Holder Jr., and INS Commissioner Meissner.

The officials had divided themselves into two teams – one to talk to the father, one to the Miami relatives. Holder was the main conduit to Gregory B. Craig, the attorney for

'Naked Mile' turnout small

By David Enders
Michigan Daily (U Michigan)

(U-WIRE) ANN ARBOR, Mich. – They sang "Hail to the Victors" as they reached the Cube sculpture in Regents' Plaza. They encouraged the crowd to make noise. One rode a unicycle. Another was in a wheelchair.

And none of them were wearing clothes.

Estimates are that no more than 400 people participated in this year's Naked Mile – down from last year's number of 400-800 – but they did not lack enthusiasm. The 14-year-old run that celebrates the end of winter classes drew a crowd of about 10,000 spectators, similar in size to last year's.

"The number of runners was down dramatically," said Department of Public Safety spokeswoman Diane Brown.

That could be because the Ann Arbor Police Department made good on a threat to arrest runners this year for indecent exposure – something they have never done in the past.

In a written statement, the AAPD said their officers made four arrests – three for indecent exposure and one for malicious destruction. There were also a "number of potential participants" who cooperated when officers told them not to disrobe, according to the statement.

Brown said DPS officers made ten arrests for "various alcohol violations" and one for a concealed handgun. But officers said the crowd was more subdued than it has been in past years, despite its size.

"It's bigger," said DPS Lieutenant Joe Piersante as he stood near the cube in Regents' Plaza. "It's Friday night, nice weather, but for the most part, (the crowd's) pretty good."

The runners started around 11 p.m. – later than usual. Security volunteers said the later start was possibly due to traffic on South University Street. But drivers were forced to find an alternate route when safety volunteers took it upon themselves to block traffic.

"If we don't stop cars from going through, someone's going to get hurt," said Bill Wahl, a third-year Engineering student as he stood in the middle of South University Avenue near Church Street. Traffic was also stopped on South State Street, where the run's route crosses the street in front of the Michigan Union.

Other safety concerns, particularly the groping of female runners, seemed to be eased by this year's Naked Mile. There appeared to be a smaller percentage of women in the run this year, and DPS received no reports of sexual misconduct.

"A number of people going by said 'No one touched me,'" Brown said.

The women that did run said they took precautions against both groping and people filming the event, which has become a major concern over the last few years.

"The students that were on either side made it totally safe," said one senior girl. "I'm disappointed that more people didn't run. I squirted the cameras and people cheered."

Another senior girl ran with two of her best male friends on either side.

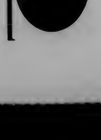
"One person slapped my ass," she said. "But I felt safe for the most part."

Despite the crowd, the event had an overwhelming sense of jubilation to it, contradicting the debate that has surrounded the run's safety and the manner in which laws would be enforced.

"I feel great," said Engineering senior Damon Brunson immediately before turning cartwheels in front of the crowd on the lawn in front of Angell Hall. "Invigorated and liberated. But I need some clothes."

"I think it's all done in good spirit," said a California man who was visiting campus with his son, a prospective freshman. "I saw all these people. Only when I got here, I saw people running butt naked."

Others agreed that the run is a more harmless tradition than some say.



"I would hope [the police] have got better things to do than arresting students," said a 1958 University alum and Ann Arbor resident. "If anyone here was going to be offended they'd go someplace else. We do have real crime problems in Ann Arbor, and this isn't one of them."

percent, the GSS is committed to working with SLSO in finding other funding sources to hire the fourth attorney, furthering litigation rights and maintaining pay increases for the workers.

At the same time Pellegrino and the SGA are concerned that by having the SGA and GSS fund the SLSO at an equal contribution of 16 percent, the amount of service used by both students will not be equal.

Zibbell acknowledged this concern, adding that he does not have a problem with using the SLSO less than what they actually pay for.

"If we give SLSO 16 percent and graduate students only use it two percent, then that's fine because it's not about the money," Zibbell said. "It's about providing legal services to people who need them."

Zibbell went on to explain that most of GSS's funding goes towards providing money to underrepresented populations such as queer organizations, people of color and low income student parents. According to him, GSS is giving $45,000 dollars next year to the child-care system, whose funding many graduate students rely on.

"The only way some of our grnly way some of our graduate students go to school is with GSS child vouchers," Zibbell said. "By saying that we're funding child care in the context of under-funding legal services, what they [SGA] are saying is we should lower our child care, fund more me kicking kids out into the street and parents out of school."

Another meeting of the SLSO Advisory Board has been announced for May 6, in which Pellegrino said they may reconsider a GSS proposal to fund the SLSO at a full 25 percent.

"You can give a sign."You can give a significant increase to child care and at the same time come up with more funding for the office," Pellegrino said.Student Trustee Seth Avakian agreed with Pellegrino and stated, "It is a shame what has happened." "I would absolutely lothing to assist in having graduate students fund the previously agreed upon percentage, and I truly believe it's a vital service for graduate students," Avakian said.

However, Zibbell stated that there is no indication on GSS's part to fund more than 16 percent of their budget towards the Legal Services Office. He stated that even if the SGA refuses this level funding, he is not concerned that it will remain an "undergraduate only" legal services.

"This has to go to the Board of Trustees and they don't even want to go there," Zibbell said. "It would be a public uproar and would put them in the public light."

According to Zibbell, the SGA doesn't have the power to limit the SLSO to undergraduate service anyway, and they are de-limited in the motions they pass.

"The SGA are all a bunch of white, middle-class students who think they have all this power because of their unquestioned privilege," Zibbell said. "If the SGA doesn't want to do equal funding allocations, we'll have to come up with additional funding sources to enhance our condition."

NJ ordinance bans public nudity

By Michelle Bergamo
Daily Targum (Rutgers U.)

(U-WIRE) NEW BRUNSWICK, N.J. – Television cameras and rows of residents waited for the final decision: no more public nudity.

An ordinance to amend Chapter 212, banning nudity in all township establishments, was passed unanimously Monday night at the council meeting held in the Municipal Complex on Hermann Road.

The ordinance prohibits public nudity even in establishments where alcohol is not permitted.

The ordinance defines nudity as "the showing of male or female genitalia, pubic area, and buttocks, with less than a fully opaque covering."

This law is New Jersey's first, considering state law allows for full nudity in dry establishments.

The township is following in the steps of the United States Supreme Court, which ruled last month that the city of Erie, Pa. had the right to prohibit nude dancing in clubs by demanding that dancers wear clothing covering their genitalia, officials said.

"I would like to thank the council of Erie," Mayor David Spaulding said. "The timing was extremely good for us."

Council members said residents have been supportive of the ordinance.

"We heard what the residents were saying," Council President Peggy Scarillo said. "This is designed to protect them."

Spaulding said the township's decision is a result partly in response to complaints concerning Virgo's, a nude entertainment establishment located on Route 130. Virgo's was closed down because of crime and tax debt, and reopened with a new owner about two weeks ago, Spaulding said.

The township denied a transfer of liquor license to the new owner, Paul Golden, and Virgo's was reopened as a dry, nude entertainment establishment, Spaulding said.

The ordinance does not prohibit dancing, only nude dancing, he said. As long as dancers comply with the clothing requirements, stripping is still allowed in establishments.

"This is an issue between the want of an individual, and the rights of residents to live peacefully," Council member William Goldstein said. "We cannot stick our heads in the sand."

Some residents questioned whether this ordinance was a violation of their First Amendment rights.

"I want to make sure you're not limiting freedom of expression," township resident Gloria Grier said. "If you don't like what you're watching, turn off the TV."

Spaulding said the council is only limiting what is being exposed, and that these establishments have negative secondary effects that outweigh these concerns.

"If this law says that no nudity can be shown, what about breast feeding?" said College of Nursing junior Janice Louro. "This raises a new issue. Are there going to be exceptions to the nudity law?"

College couples try sharing rent before sharing vows

By Ann Marie Bronowski
Indiana Daily Student (Indiana U.)

(U-WIRE) BLOOMINGTON, Ind. – Senior Owen Mundy might not always put the seat down, but his girlfriend, Rasma Vitols, learned to deal with it during the past two years.

When most students' parents were born, living together was a social taboo. In 1960, there were about 400,000 unmarried couple households, but now the number has soared to more than four million according to the U.S. Census Bureau. This year, Haverford College in Pennsylvania will join two other East Coast colleges or universities in allowing men and women to share dormitory rooms.

A social stigma no longer, cohabitation is on the rise, and proving to be a fantasy for some couples and a nightmare for others.

Some sociologists regard cohabitation as a modern day "courtship ritual," said Patricia McManus, an assistant professor of sociology.

"Overwhelmingly, most people are still getting married; however, there is a slight drop in the proportion of people relative to the '50s and '60s," she said.

She said as a society we have high expectations that marriage will be personally fulfilling, so many are approaching marriage with more caution.

"We cook meals together, which is so fun," Mundy said. "We name our plants."

"If he kills them, it's over," Vitols said.

More important than mac and cheese and house plants, Mundy said, "We've learned each other's quirks."

"We're comfortable with each other," he said. "We talk about everything. If we have an argument, we're definitely going to see each other and talk about it."

But being in the same house can be a challenge. Vitols has a full time job and Mundy is a full time student, so sometimes their schedules conflict.

"We have to be each other's constant form of entertainment," Mundy said. "When I want to work, I want to work, and then I'll hear this voice 'Don't you wanna hang out with me?'"

"I'm a distraction," Vitols said. She took up painting on Mundy's suggestion. Now she has a hobby to keep her busy while he works.

Elian's father, Juan Miguel Gonzalez. Craig and Gonzalez sat in Craig's office at 12th and G streets NW. One of Craig's colleagues at the law firm Williams & Connolly, Oliver Garcia, was there to serve as interpreter for Gonzalez.

Squashed into their two-bedroom Little Havana home more than a thousand miles away were Lazaro Gonzalez, his wife Angela, and daughter Marisleysis, and several other relatives. Also there were Dalrymple, several of the relatives' attorneys, and a group of Miami civic leaders who had arrived Friday afternoon and volunteered to help mediate a solution to the fast-deteriorating situation. Elian and a five-year-old relative were sleeping, on and off.

By early that evening, the mediators had sent Reno a proposal – not yet completely cleared with the relatives – offering a reunion in which both sides of the family would participate, held at a neutral site. The meeting of Elian and his father would be followed by an unlimited period in which they all would live together until Elian was comfortable transferring his primary affections back from the Miami relatives to the father who along with Elian's mother had cared for him during the first six years of his life. Mental health experts would be in close attendance.

The proposal did not provide for the immediate transfer of custody that the father had demanded. Just after 11 p.m., Craig sent Reno a counteroffer for the relatives, insisting on an immediate custody transfer, and limiting the amount of "transition" time for them all to be together to one week.

At around 12:30 a.m., Craig sent Juan Miguel Gonzalez home, to the Bethesda residence of a Cuban diplomat where he had been staying since arriving from Havana two weeks earlier. "He was getting so depressed and so angry that it was distracting," Craig recalled Saturday. "It was not good for him and not good for us."

At least two more versions of the proposal went back and forth from Miami to Reno to Craig and back again. By 2 a.m., Craig had wearily agreed to what he said were conditions practically imposed on him by the attorney general's office. They stipulated that once the custody transfer took place, Reno herself would determine the conditions under which the family would stay together, how much visitation time the Miami relatives would have, what mental health experts would be involved, and how much weight would be given to their views.

Reno sent the terms to Miami: The reunion would take place at Airlie House, a conference center near Warrenton, Va. The transfer of custody would be immediate and unconditional. The transition period would be open-ended. If they agreed, the relatives were to bring Elian to the federal courthouse in Miami at 3:30 a.m. Saturday.

"The attorney general was trying to push both sides into something that neither side was very happy with," Meissner readily agreed Saturday afternoon. "If there was going to be agreement, it was going to be with each side giving on something they were dug in on for the sake of preventing enforcement action that we did not want to ultimately have to do."

If Juan Miguel Gonzalez had repeatedly balked at any custody transfer that was not immediate and unconditional, the Miami relatives felt the same about meeting with him anywhere but on their home turf. As Craig cooled his heels and the clock inched toward the 3:30 turnover time, the officials in Reno's office told the relatives that the Airlie House venue was non-negotiable.

Meanwhile, "we heard nothing" from the Justice Department, Craig said. "About 3:45, I called Eric and said 'Come on, man, I'm going home.' We'd had complete silence for an hour and 45 minutes. . . He said, 'Look, hang around for just an hour more. We may be able to make some serious progress.'"

What only Justice knew at that point was that a deadline already had come and gone. Earlier last week, federal law enforcement officials had told Reno that the optimum time for a raid would be Saturday morning at 4 a.m.

Reno and Meissner, already dreading the possibility they would have to take Elian by force, had resisted a nighttime raid on grounds that the "optics" – what the television cameras trained on the house 24 hours a day –would see were already likely to be bad enough. But law enforcement personnel had told them that was the time when the crowds were lightest and least alert, and when the traffic conditions were optimum for fast entry and exit from the neighborhood.

Traffic signals in the area around the house were set to blink yellow during the early morning hours until 6 o'clock, they said.

By early Saturday morning, the raid awaited only Reno's go-ahead. There had been major concerns about security, with numerous different agencies involved, but there were no leaks.

The U.S. attorney's office in Miami had obtained a search warrant allowing federal agents to enter the house. Local Border Patrol, INS, and U.S. Marshals Service officers who were to participate directly in the operation had their orders. The U.S. Public Health Service, which provided the doctor and psychologist to examine Elian, had been notified. Senior officials in local police agencies had been told, although police on the ground near the house were not informed.

As the faxes and phone calls went back and forth between Justice and Miami, Meissner said, "we had operationally until 3 a.m." to make the decision. "They needed between an hour, and an hour and a half" once the operation was set in motion. But at 3 a.m., she said, "negotiations were proceeding in a way that the attorney general felt maybe with a little more time, it might come to a successful outcome."

Reno put law enforcement on hold. "We knew we had a little leeway on the ground, and we asked (law enforcement) how much more time they could squeeze out," before they would have to cancel the operation, Meissner said. The attorney general was told it was too risky if it came after 5 a.m.; if she didn't give the order by 4, they would have to stand down.

The sticking point with the Miami relatives, all sides agreed, was the question of where the meeting would take place. They still insisted that they could not come to Washington. The phones fell silent.

At 4 a.m., Reno gave the order to move. Clinton was notified through his chief of staff, John Podesta. At around 4:45, when the operation was well underway, "another call came from Miami," Meissner said. "We actually held the operation for five minutes to see whether there was perhaps a final last-ditch possibility of agreeing, but it just was not there. By about ten to five, when the final team," the eight agents who would actually enter the house, was ready to leave the operational staging area, "it just was not there," Meissner said.

Reno, Meissner said, told the mediators "this cannot succeed." She did not tell them the raid was underway. Later, when the sun came up and it was all over, the mediators, the Miami relatives and their attorneys would insist there had been a possibility of agreement, and that Reno had given the order too soon.

As the Miami mediators made their final call, and were put on hold by the attorney general's office, there was a knock on the door. INS officials later said they had identified themselves, three times – "We are United States federal agents. We are here to collect Elian and bring him to his father."

But on television, it did not appear the family inside had much time to respond. Using a battering ram – a long, solid metal tube they had brought with them – the agents pushed in the door.

MOVING IN FOR DIFFERENT REASONS

Vitols stayed at Mundy's house occasionally starting in the summer of 1998, but by that fall she began to stay regularly. She war working full time, and rather than staying at home with her parents, she stayed with Mundy. They have signed a lease for a townhouse for next fall.

"We consider it a stepping stone for a life for just the two of us," Mundy said.

Mark Erdosy, a pastoral associate at St. Paul's Catholic Church, said most cohabiting couples coming for marriage preparation at St. Paul's initially say they moved in for financial reasons.

"For the most part cohabiting couples are saving one person's monthly rent, but it's almost like they are mortgaging the long term for short-term gain," Erdosy said.

He said during the rite of marriage, when the priest asks the couple, "Have you come here freely and without reservation to give yourselves to each other in marriage?" they cannot answer a 100 percent "yes" because they are financially dependent on each other.

Other couples said it was "the next logical step" or they were just going to test it out.

"I've yet to have a married couple who had cohabitated tell me that they're glad they lived together," said Erdosy, who counsels around 50 couples in marriage preparation each year. "I have had couples tell me they wish they had spent that time apart."

He said cohabitation can push a couple into a lifetime commitment they do not want.

"It's not uncommon for a cohabiting couple to get married because its what's expected of them," he said. "One or both of the partners may not feel ready for the lifetime commitment, but because of obligation they go through with (marriage)."

While Erdosy said he does not think cohabitation is a good idea, Carol McCord, assistant dean of the office for women's affairs and clinician at the Kinsey Institute, endorses this idea. McCord said cohabitation is a time to agree and negotiate if living together works.

She said cohabitation is an important step in choosing a mate.

"It's a really healthy way of practicing the skills of daily living and a further step toward adulthood than living with a couple of buddies," she said. "Some women want to see if a partner is going to be equally supportive. Getting married solely because you want to have sex is not a good reason."

PARENTS JUST MIGHT UNDERSTAND

Vitols' mother initially worried she cared more about her boyfriend than her family, she said. Other than that, her parents did not have a problem with her living situation.

"My parents did it, my brother did it, my sister did it," she said.

Some parents might not be so accepting of cohabitation. Often the parents' disapproval of cohabitation puts a strain on the parent-child relationship, McManus said. If these bad feelings persist into the marriage, the couple lacks the social support that keeps relationships together.

Our Opinion

Healthy cigarettes?

Talk about jumping through hoops! R.J. Reynolds Tobacco will soon expand the test-marketing region for its new product, Eclipse – a new brand of reduced smoke cigarettes – is "a cigarette that responds to concerns about smoking related illnesses," as RJR is quoted as saying in a CNN.com news article.

Healthy cigarettes??

The new Eclipse cigarettes heat the tobacco instead of burning it, which supposedly lowers smokers' risk of cancer, chronic bronchitis, and possibly emphysema according to tests conducted by the company. But the jury is still out on this one since it remains to be seen whether or not consumers are really interested in the product, and whether independent scientists obtain similar test results that confirm that these cigarettes are indeed safer than regular cigarettes.

However, RJR plans to begin test-marketing these cigarettes in the Dallas-Fort Worth area and on the internet in the near future. The company has been marketing this product in Chattanooga, Tenn., Atlanta, Ga., and Lincoln, Neb. since 1996, but due to recent events in the battle between the U.S. government and the tobacco industry, the ad campaign has changed its tune.

The ad campaign runs something like this: If you really are concerned about your health, you'd better quit because the government has finally forced us to say that smoking causes adverse health affects, but if you want to keep smoking, try this product. The company believes that the Eclipse smoking alternative "significantly smaller doses of carcinogens, thus removing many of the truly dangerous compounds in cigarettes.

But the Clinton Administration and the American Cancer Society are both skeptical about the safeness of these cigarettes. After all, RJR cannot prove that these cigarettes will indeed reduce the risk of cancer for smokers, and a scientific study that compared long-term Eclipse smokers with regular cigarette smokers would take several years to complete.

In the meantime, it is the Collegian's opinion that if smokers like the product and wish to use it, they should do so, but consumers should be aware that this product may not live up to the company's health-preserving expectations. These cigarettes may still cause cancer, and people should not take the RJR scientists at their word since they have a track record of lying about the danger of cigarettes.

If the Eclipse cigarettes improve the odds of dying from cigarette related illnesses, the new cigarettes will be touted as a success. But even if they still cause some smaller number of people to become ill and contract cancer, are they better than today's cigarettes? Are they meant only to prevent today's young smokers from contracting smoking related illnesses in the future, or are they meant to addict another generation of smokers to "safer" cigarettes?

The proof will be in the pudding, but the Collegian remains skeptical about the future success of this product in decreasing the risk of smoking related illnesses.

Just because they're not guns...

The Second Amendment of the Constitution states that, "The right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." Regardless of whether you're a proponent of the amendment or support weapon control laws, I think I've found something that we can all agree upon. "The Knife Show" is a very bad idea!

I watch a lot of television. I'm sure you already knew that. Television rarely teaches me anything, but I did learn a very valuable piece of information last week while watching late night TV. Never trust a man whose "life long companion" is a knife called the Galactic Star-Fighter 2000. Yes, please go back and read the previous sentence again. I'm not sure if you've ever seen "The Knife Show," (that's not the actual name, but they sell knives on the home shopping channel, so therefore, I call it "The Knife Show") but if you haven't then you're truly missing out.

Ryan Benharris

The knife show highlights the one great element of American society: the fact that for only three easy installment payments of $89.99 you can buy enough knives to kill the entire population of Uzbekistan in less than five minutes. Yes, the good old U.S. of A. the only place in the world where you can use your credit card and your phone to buy knives. I'm not talking about regular knives that you can cut a steak with. No, I mean knives that you can cut the actual cow with. We're talking bowie knives shaped like battle-axes and even medieval swords that would make King Arthur jealous. It only takes five minutes of viewing to realize that the one male and one female hosts of the show worship the gods that created anything that slices.

The kinds of weapons that they sell are simply unheard of. One of the swords is called "the Dragonslayer." Are dragons really that much of a problem that we need to sell swords over the phone to stop their pesky rampage? Or, how would you like a knife called Prentiss the Menace? Hey Mr. Wilson, got your spleen! You have to wonder who the target audience of this show is, and why they're not in prison.

The fun doesn't stop at large swords. The knife show gets creative. You may think a shark is a fierce creature that swims in the water. Nope, it's a 15-pound killing machine, made of pure stainless steel that cuts through bone in half the time it cuts through brick. The female host on the show said, "One of the reasons that it is selling out so fast is because of the color combination." Yeah, because psychopaths are really concerned about how pretty their slaughtering devices look. "Hey dragon, prepare to die – in style!" And, for those of you that think you have no desire to buy these things, she said, "Those of you that are not even knife collectors, I encourage you to purchase these knives. Especially if you are finishing a room with a sports motif." What sport is this? She made sure to point out that the knife simply known as Glory is "a conversation piece." I can imagine the conversation that would surround that sword.

"Hey John, that's a great piece of hardware you got there."

"I know Bob, you should see how fast it can lop a man's head off. That reminds me, remember that kid who used to pick on me in high school? I think the swipe was so clean, that he didn't even feel his head being detached from his neck."

As if selling the knives is not enough, the knife show has contests. If you send a post card to the address in Tennessee, you can be chosen at random to win an entire set. Can we just discuss how very illegal it should be to win a knife called "the mother of pearl" in a mail-in contest?

I'm certainly not trying to persuade anyone to change their mind about the right to bear arms, or even to spark a debate about it at all. What I'm simply saying is that the fact that we even have something as blatantly awful as the knife show is wrong. Just for kicks, my friend and I called the toll free 800 number. You don't even talk to a real person. You enter your credit card number along with the number of the item that you want to buy, and it's automatically shipped to you. We certainly cannot do that with guns, but apparently with knives it's okay.

We just suffered through the first anniversary of the horrible massacre at Columbine High School. Who's to say that a teenage boy could not pick up the phone and use his credit card to purchase some very dangerous items? I know that I don't want some 13-year-old monster with a sword walking into the junior high school that my sister attends. Just because they're not guns does not mean that knives such as these are not weapons. What makes the entire situation all the worse is that they are so easy to buy.

I'm very sure that we don't need the knife show or any of the things that it sells. I'm even more certain that we don't need the option of buying knives at home. I guess that the best way to question it is by asking why it is legal to shop for medieval assault weapons at home? If you're going to buy 14 Spanish swords, at least get off the damn couch, lardass.

There has been quite a bit of conversation going on about pornography recently due to the censoring of a professor's website that contained images of a pornographic nature. However, the discussion has been a little one sided, so please, allow me to be the sole voice of opposition.

If there is one thing that I am sure of, it is that when the framers of the constitution added the sections about freedom of speech and press, they didn't have pornographs on their mind. Not even a little bit. To suggest that any of the other Founding Fathers demanded freedom of speech and press so Americans could be free to look at naked people is not only ridiculous but rather offensive. I'm fairly positive that, as with most great philosophical works, we have taken what they meant totally out of context. We all know what they meant.

Eric Hedges

And that is disturbing considering that there are dozens of countries that are not allowed the same freedoms as we are. We have these rights, and what do we do with them? Do we critique the condition of the country? Rarely. Do we offer criticism about the job that our "elected" officials doing? Hardly ever. No, we squander it on sordid porn and dirty magazines.

But that isn't even the real issue, is it? Since, it seems unlikely that our "right" to observe pornographic materials will be revoked any time in the near future. No, I believe pornography is indicative of a far greater problem. The real issue is that our sexual appetites have overcome us.

As human beings, we have a sexual drive and a hunger drive. They are not exactly the same, but a fair comparison, nonetheless. Now, it is easy enough to get a group of men together to watch a girl undress, but what would you say about a group of men who got together to watch someone slowly reveal a pork chop? Or even have a multi-million dollar industry showing just pictures of well-cooked food? You would have to admit that their appetite for food had gotten out of control. Anyone from another culture would think their desire for food had become perverse. The same can absolutely be said about us.

People will tell you that sexuality has become a mess because people don't speak about it. Well, people have been far louder about it in the past 50 years then ever before. And here we stand, in a time that has as many rapes and child molestations as any other time in history. And the not surprising truth about that is that the large majority of sexual offenders admit to viewing pornography on a regular basis. We live in a time when we have let women believe they have made progress, but by viewing pornography, we are telling them that we still view them as little more than sexual objects.

Sex and the human body are things that should be discussed openly. No one should be ashamed of themselves or their sexuality. What we should be ashamed of is the state of depravity to which sexuality has turned.

If the University thinks that what that professor was displaying was beyond the limits of good taste, so be it. The limits of good taste need to be drawn more clearly, and I firmly believe that an institution of higher learning should play a part in that. As far as we are concerned, Pythagoras said, "No man is free, who can not command himself." My rule is, if I'd be embarrassed to discuss it with my mother or my pastor, I probably shouldn't be doing it. Think about your own sexuality, then consider, what side are you on?

Eric Hedges is a UMass student.

So what is pornography?

I have no idea what pornography is. I don't. I don't claim to know it when I see it, know who makes it, or how much money it pulls in. I wish I knew. I've participated in the production and publication of what some people would call pornography. I'm also an educator about what some people would call pornography. One thing I'm sure of is that as soon as public discourse erupts about naked women's bodies on display for all to see, the vice squad jumps out from under the bed, and anti-porn rightists and feminists jump on the scene and keep all of us from having the good time the First Amendment supposedly ensures.

Glancing at English professor Richard Burt's website over a year ago, I remember being delighted that a professor at no-so-left-wing-as-you-think-UMass had met such feminist luminaries as Annie Sprinkle (a former porn star and now outspoken performance artist, whose work examines her both problematic and pleasantly pervy past in porn) and Nina Hartley (a feminist and actress in educational porn that focuses on heterosexual couples). I felt a little uncomfortable at the semi-clad photos of his wife on his site, along with the exhortations of how hot she was and how cool she had been with selecting the pictures there herself. I presumed that Burt had worked with Sprinkle and Hartley as part of his academic work at UMass, but it was unclear to me what his wife had to do with that work.

Melissa Grant

Now, with The Boston Globe (4/5/00) and The Daily Hampshire Gazette (4/5/00; 4/6/00) exposes (and a pathetic comment from Ollie North), the good old boys are wondering again if their free speech is being eroded by "left wing feminists" and "rightists." It has been stated that Burt took his site down voluntarily after an inquiry by OIT about acceptable use, and that it may re-appear once a ruling is made about acceptable use on the Web. In the past, the rule applied to only email and unsolicited materials. This leaves me to wonder: who are the real anti-pleasure-monsters, boys? Before this website put Burt's name in the headlines, would any of you have lauded him as a forerunner in your quest to keep all "whack-off material" free and accessible to all? Would you really stand by Burt, who has taught a course in Renaissance literature that uses romance novels as secondary texts? Doesn't sound like the sort of old school white boy's canon that many folks would stick by in my opinion. Would any of you come out in favor of someone who uses queer theory in his examination of Shakespeare if that were questioned at this University, as queer theory books and courses have been censored at other institutions? I'd hope so.

The truth is, any time we debate about pornography as a free-speech issue, somehow this shaky, imaginary alliance of feminists and right-wingers is evoked, as some sort of shadowy enemy just waiting to keep any of us from having an orgasm between now and the Rapture (or the first female President, pick your personal ideological eschaton). The truth is, not all feminists are anti-porn. Not all feminists are anti-sex. Some feminists make porn. Some want to come show you porn. Some want to show you how the porn you have is lame and boring at best, and degrading and abusive at worst. These are some of the women Burt has on his website.

The truth is, what we see on Prof. Burt's website is only classified as "pornography" because it has images of half-naked women eating breakfast. The fact that some of these women are porn stars was cited in the Gazette article as possible reason for removing the site – as if even being a porn star is obscene. But nudity in and of itself is not porn. Sexual content, in and of itself, is not porn. Of course, we have the right to produce all kinds of self-expression in America, involving nudity and sexuality. That's the only reason we sometimes fall back on the First Amendment to protect porn – it is manufactured and sold in the same ways as all sorts of other kinds of protected speech. Another reason we may look to the First Amendment is because there are lots of people in the country who want to restrict our access to any sexual information, especially if it involves nudity. But in my experience, these people are usually not feminists.

Pornography, as most of it exists today, is not sexual information I want to model myself after. What most porn teaches us is that the only sexualized bodies are women's, and that the only people who look at a body sexually are men. There is so little women-produced, women-centered porn out there, and so little that shows men's bodies the way women's bodies are almost always shown. The fact that Burt's censored site showcases two women who want to expose this inequity, and holds accountable the mainstream porn industry for its narrow, male-dominated images of women by producing their own work is especially ironic.

Annie Sprinkle's performance piece, "Post Porn Modernist," was forced to change venues at the last moment when it came to Northampton in 1997 in the same sort of atmosphere, which views talking about porn to be pornographic. Not only is porn obscene and to be censored, but discussing porn (or naming yourself a porn star) would also put you at the risk of censorship. The slideshow I use to educate about pornography would be deemed completely obscene if I were to post it on my OIT website. It's often crazy-making, as a feminist, to live with these complications. Why would feminists blindly crusade to censor all porn everywhere all the time when it means we are at risk ourselves for censorship, pro-porn or anti-porn, if we bring it up? This may have been a tactic in the late 70s, but it has declined in favor of critical examination of images in their context, along with discussions about violence against women in the industry.

The content of Richard Burt's site, by any of these definitions, is not at all pornographic – did he portray women as sexual objects, things, or commodities? As experiencing pleasure from rape? Tied up, cut up, bruised, or hurt? In postures of nonconsensual servitude of servility? As only parts, shown as reduced to only their body parts? (This definition comes from a proposed amendment to the Civil Rights Ordinance of the Minneapolis City Council.)

The only reason Burt's site is being called pornographic is because some people have no other words to refer to sexual speech we don't like, either because it's abusive, harmful or obscene, in any of our opinions. Some people might call his site erotica, although I don't believe it contains much eroticism. Some might call it educational. What is problematic here is that most people have no way to talk about pornography without talking about censorship, and there are supposedly rules telling us how to censor "pornographic" speech. These rules do little to promote free expression of any sort of sexuality, or to support survivors of the porn industry or porn addiction – the sorts of people anti-porn types say they'd really like to help. These rules usually target unpopular speech, and create such a media circus that the censored speech becomes even more popular.

The solution I propose for now is to use this opportunity to talk about the women in those pictures. What do Annie Sprinkle and Nina Hartley do, anyway? Next time you find some satisfactory jack-off material (or jill-off material – got to be inclusive of the girls, women, and ladies), consider what the women in those pictures might do in their spare time. Who knows what their lives are like after you put them back under your bed. Do you want to know? Or would you rather only talk about how you have the right to access them, to jerk-off to them whenever you want, whether or not they actually consented to be photographed, or to have their photos published or presented the way they are, whether or not they get a dime from your orgasm. Richard Burt is no Larry Flynt, but he did put these women and their website links on his site for a reason. Whether that was for you to get off to them, or to be educated about them (or both), is up to you.

Parmar documents the righteous babes

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Correspondent

We've all seen them before. Another feature article on "Women in Rock" plastered over the cover of Rolling Stone or Spin. A cursory look at several female artists that rarely scratches the surface of what messages these women are trying to convey, and hardly ever develops a unifying link between them all. With acts like the Spice Girls gaining popularity in mainstream culture, touting feminism just for show, one can only seriously ponder, "Has feminism suffered its final blow?"

Of course not. Despite this fact not being made very apparent by the music industry — especially with all the testosterone fueled rock that dominates commercial radio. The strong female role models are indeed out there in the music world, although one might have to look way beyond MTV to find them.

Filmmaker Prathiba Parmar's 1998 documentary, The Righteous Babes (screening today at 2 p.m. in room 101 in the Campus Center as part of the 7th annual Multicultural Film Festival) explores the theme of women in rock and takes the superficial cover stories to the next level. Featuring collaborations from Skin (of Skunk Anansie), Sinead O'Connor, Shirley Manson (Garbage), Chrissie Hynde (the Pretenders), and Ani DiFranco, the hour long documentary explores the cusp of popular music and feminism, and how these extraordinary women serve as an influence on modern women.

Prathiba Parmar will screen her film The Righteous Babes at 2 p.m. today in the Campus Center

Esteemed video director Parmar has made a name for herself on the film festival circuit — winning several awards at festivals in Paris, New York and San Francisco among others — and with several documentaries produced for BBC and broadcast worldwide. In addition to being an acclaimed filmmaker, Parmar is also the author/editor of several published books and essays on feminist and gay/lesbian theory. Her other films include Khush (1990), A Place of Rage (1991), and Warrior Marks (1993), the latter of which being a collaboration with Pulitzer Prize winning author Alice Walker (The Color Purple). The making of Warrior Marks was made into a book co-authored by Parmar and Walker.

Parmar will be present at the screening for a discussion, and will be conducting another discussion/screening at Smith College in the evening.

The Righteous Babes also features collaborations from authors such as Camille Paglia and Gloria Steinem, and includes performance footage and interviews with DiFranco, Hynde and Tori Amos. Other featured artists include Queen Latifah, Neneh Cherry, Madonna, Courtney Love and the Spice Girls. With critical observance from music journalists from both the U.S. and the U.K., The Righteous Babes proves to be an insightful look at the resonance of pop music and feminism on women and young girls today.

The Righteous Babes will be shown at 101 Campus Center at 2 p.m. today. Prathiba Parmar will be present for the screening and discussion. Parmar will discuss/screen her past work, and work in progress tonight at Wright Hall Auditorium, Smith College at 7:30 p.m. All events are free and open to the public.

MC5's big bang!

MC5
The Big Bang! Best of the MC5
Elektra Records

By Josh Krauter
Daily Nebraskan (U. Nebraska)

(U-WIRE) LINCOLN, Neb. – Though Detroit's current music scene is famous for clowns such as Kid Rock, Eminem and, well, the Insane Clown Posse, it hasn't always been this way.

Once upon a time, in the late 1960s, Detroit had a couple of vibrant music scenes that continue to inspire today, one aboveground, one underground.

Motown was, of course, the mainstream face of good Detroit pop, producing legends such as Marvin Gaye, Stevie Wonder, the Jackson 5, and the Supremes.

But across town, there was a grittier, grungier, uglier sound going down. It was the sound of gears grinding, assembly lines marching forward, dirt getting caked under fingernails. It was a soundtrack for misfits, stoners, nihilists, outcasts, speed freaks, and blue-collar workers.

Ten years before punk, 20 years before grunge, a couple of Detroit bands invented a primal, dirty, monstrous (but that moved rock forward while simultaneously reverting it to its garage beginnings.

These two bands, The Stooges and the MC5, are long gone, having only released three albums apiece to indifferent audiences who didn't care that they were ahead of their time.

The Stooges were the better of the two, producing a real-life rock star in singer Iggy Pop, and releasing three classic albums, "The Stooges," "Fun House" and "Raw Power" that still startle, sounding unlike anything before or since.

The unreleased song, "Thunder Express," continues in the same vein with a decidedly more classic rock beat, sending The Big Bang! out with a bang, too.

Anyone who's into late-'70s punk or the better grunge stuff, such as Nirvana and Mudhoney, should check out where some of it came from by picking up The Big Bang. You won't be disappointed.

The MC5's first album, "Kick Out the Jams," The album has been profoundly influential, but suffers from muddy production and several weak songs. The Big Bang snatches the four best songs from that album, showing how chaotic and outrageous the band's music could be.

That's followed by a whole bunch of tracks from Back in the USA, the second album. The music from this period is a lot cleaner, the songs are shorter and the production kicks up the treble and lowers the bass. These particular songs were produced by Jon Landau, a former rock journalist who later managed Bruce Springsteen.

With titles like "Teenage Lust," "High School" and "Shakin' Street," and pop hooks to match, this section of the album is the catchiest on first listen and often sounds like pure power pop. Imagine a more accomplished Ramones or Monkees composed of serial killers to get an approximation of the sound. For this part of the band's career this only tags have been discarded for an actual Chuck Berry cover and a more radio-ready sound.

The next segment of the album features songs from High Time, the band's last album. These songs are once again long, feedback drenched and guitar heavy, but with better production values. Guitarist Wayne Kramer compares a lot of this stuff to jazz musicians like John Coltrane and Sun Ra, but don't believe him. It all sounds like loud rock 'n' roll.

The unreleased song, "Thunder Express," continues in the same vein with a decidedly more classic rock beat, sending The Big Bang! out with a bang, too.

Anyone who's into late-'70s punk or the better grunge stuff, such as Nirvana and Mudhoney, should check out where some of it came from by picking up The Big Bang. You won't be disappointed.

National Highway board studies safety of sports utility vehicles

By Cindy Skrzycki
The Washington Post

National Highway Traffic Safety Administration officials think figuring out the likelihood of a sport-utility vehicle's tipping over is a matter of math, and that height and width are good predictors of stability.

Another kind of math is driving their work on the "rollover" issue: NHTSA reported 10,857 rollover deaths in cars, vans or trucks last year, up from 9,771 in 1998. Sixty-two percent of SUV fatalities involved rollovers, compared with 22 percent for cars. Almost invariably, occupants who are unbelted do not survive a rollover. Those wearing seat belts stand a 75 percent chance of survival.

The regulatory approach is also important because of the growing popularity of SUVs, which many American consumers have substituted for a station wagon or minivan.

NHTSA is likely to propose for comment in a few weeks, after almost three decades of deliberation, a test that manufacturers would use to rate the rollover potential of SUVs, pickup trucks, and cars. It essentially would take half of the tire-track width of a vehicle, and multiply it by the height of the vehicle's center of gravity. Tall trucks with narrow wheelbases would do worse than wider vehicles with lower centers of gravity.

The results would be added to the government's New Car Assessment Program, which rates cars and trucks for their safety in front and side collisions. Another five-star column would be added for rollover.

"It's as good, much more repeatable, less expensive, and there are no driver safety issues," said a source at the agency, explaining why the formula is as good a predictor of rollover propensity as a road test.

Sources in the agency said the Office of Management and Budget and Transportation Secretary Rodney E. Slater are reviewing the plan, which should be announced within a month.

Consumer groups and auto manufacturers are unhappy with the NHTSA's math test solution, for different reasons. Safety groups say math alone can't inform owners about their vehicles' stability. Only a real-world test that puts the truck through its paces swerving, turning and stopping abruptly at fairly high speeds can mimic how vehicles will perform on the road, they say. They had hoped the agency would propose, and then issue a standard that every manufacturer would have to meet, much as it does for air bags and other safety equipment. But they realize that a tough standard likely would enrage automakers and disqualify some of their products as unsafe.

Consumer information is fine, but it's no substitute for a standard that prevents rollover," said Jackie Gillan, vice president of Advocates for Highway and Auto Safety.

Consumers Union, which uses a driver and a dynamic test to rate

SUVs for its monthly magazine, Consumer Reports, said the approach

NHTSA is contemplating is "better than nothing because it gives consumers a baseline" for judging SUV performance, said Sally Greenberg, senior product safety counsel. But the group still prefers a dynamic test.

In 1996, it petitioned NHTSA to consider an emergency-handling test for SUVs and a rating system like the one it used to judge the Isuzu Trooper as "unacceptable." Isuzu Motors sued the magazine, and a Los Angeles jury decided this month that while Consumer Reports made false statements about the Trooper, they were not made with malice.

Car manufacturers say no system, static or dynamic, is a reliable predictor of rollover because tests don't take into account the driver's individual behavior, road conditions, or differences in tires and suspension systems.

"The static stability factor is geometry, and it treats every vehicle the same even though they may have different electronic stability systems and suspension systems," said an auto industry source critical of the approach NHTSA is expected to take.

Automakers also worry that consumers will interpret the ratings as an absolute, steering them away from SUVs to another vehicle that may have low rollover scores but poor ratings on frontal crashes. "You don't know the overall fatality risk of that vehicle," said Scott Schmidt, manager of vehicle safety regulations for the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers.

Brian O'Neill, president of the Insurance Institute for Highway

Safety, agrees. He thinks a rating system that uses static tests won't reflect new safety mechanisms, such as electronic stabilizers, that are being added to SUVs. Stabilizers are computer systems that help drivers recover from hazardous driving situations that might lead to instability and tipping.

NHTSA officials have changed their mind about using a mathematical formula. In 1987, the agency said in response to a petition that it "does not agree ... that the stability factor alone is an accurate predictor of rollover involvement."

"Thus," it said, "the agency does not believe that this information will prove instructive to consumers."

What changed?

In the interim, the agency ran a dozen vehicles through more than 1,000 tests using a dozen different maneuvers. It found the results were very similar to results from its stability formula.

NHTSA's hope is that SUV manufacturers will respond to publication of the government's consumer rating system by trying to design vehicles to get the best score, much as they have done to get high marks for front and side crash tests.

In a separate but less controversial move, the agency is expected to propose that brake performance be added to the New Car Assessment Program rating. The agency has been testing a variety of vehicles at 62 mph, applying the brakes and measuring the distance it takes them to come to a full stop. It found that doing the testing on the same test track produced vers repeatable results.

NHTSA plans to hold a public meeting on brake testing this summer, then issue a proposal for adding it to the consumer information program.

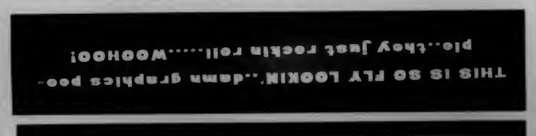
Through the eyes of a Polaroid

By Kristi Ceccarossi
Collegian Staff



This weekend the New WORLD Theatre opened their final production of the season with a unique exploration of street life in Naomi Iizuka's "Polaroid Stories." The play, a poetic re-interpretation of ancient myths inspired by Ovid's Metamorphoses, tells the story of eight characters who have found themselves homeless and in despair for different, emotionally charged circumstances.

Iizuka's concept is, creatively, a brilliant one. She calls on literary foundations for stories, dynamics, and characters to address contemporary situations and lifestyles, and does this constantly well. Her writing is rich with florid metaphors, flowing language, and on occasion, very real conversational tone. Herein, however, lies a somewhat tricky paradox. While her characters struggle to be both relatable and true they are also intended to represent gods and demi-gods. In that double effort they fail to fully engage the audience. The inconsistency in the script, though original, doesn't always transfer as well to the stage as it does to the page. For a piece of literature, "Polaroid Stories" is beautiful but not so successful as a play.

Still, the production was tight. Director Gil McCauley did as strong a job as one could with the nature of Iizuka's work. The entire artistic team, too, deserves praise. Richard Vanzini's multi-layered and subtly surreal cityscape scenic design perfectly highlighted Brendan Murray's fantastic lighting. Tellicia McNeill's costuming, and Janet Kalas' sound.

The acting was just as impressive. Dinora Walcott, as Philomel, who retold her story in wordless songs, filled the theatre with gorgeous, soulful vocals throughout the production. Angelica Castro as Eurydice was exceptional and handled the balance between unnaturally floral language and street language better than anyone in the cast. Michael Walton had a remarkable presence as Dionysus. And Tasha Pierce as Persephone and Matthew Kurilloff as Narcissus both handled what could have been extreme attitudes with a sincere and smooth delivery.

"Polaroid Stories" lacks the far-reaching impact that layers in a straightforward, more traditional script can have. But its approach to theatre, like all of the New WORLD Theatre's endeavors, is novel and for that reason, if nothing else, worth seeing. Its emotions are timeless and its performers and creative teams wonderful. The play runs through next weekend in the Rand Theatre and tickets are available at 545-2511.

Georgetown got on the board first, when Scott Urick netted his team-leading 29th goal of the season a mere 27 seconds in. The blistering shot beat UMass goalie Chris Campolettano over the left shoulder for a 1-0 lead. The lead would be the only one that the Hoyas would have until the :14 mark of the first half.

The Minutemen answered right back. Freshman Kevin Leveille tied the game at one when he beat Georgetown goalie Scott Schrueder. The goal was the result of a perfectly executed set offense. UMass would add to its lead when midfielder Alex Racioppi tallied the first of his seven goals on the afternoon to give the Maroon and White a 2-1 lead.

But back came the Hoyas. Trevor Walker scored the first of his two goals on the afternoon to tie the game for the second time in the first four minutes.

Then the UMass offense took over. Dan Little scored to make the score 3-2, but the run was just starting. Mike Janowicz, fresh off his game-tying and game-winning goals against Harvard scored the first of hat trick on the day. Kevin Dell would score on a wraparound to give the Minutemen a 5-2 lead, but Henehan would cut into that lead when he scored with 5:52 to go in the first quarter.

With the score at 5-3, Racioppi would score his second of the day, but after that the Hoyas responded with three consecutive goals of their own to tie the game yet again. Scott Urick would then net the first of his three and Steve Dusseau would score the first of a pair on an extra man opportunity before Mike Kanach's goal made the score 6-6. The quarter would end with another Racioppi goal, this one coming just one second before the horn sounded.

Racioppi's goal would be the first in a string where he netted three consecutive. His third tally gave the Minutemen a 9-6 lead.

"That's a tremendous effort," Cannella said. "He really brought his A-game today, which I'm very happy and proud of him. You don't see that in the midfield quite often, a guy scoring seven, so that's a really big day. That's got to be our biggest midfielder day since I've been here."

Dusseau scored two minutes later to cut the lead to 9-7, but Rich Kunkel scored his team-leading 21st goal of the season to extend the lead once again. The next six minutes saw the Hoyas storm back to tie the game at 10 apiece with goals from Walker and two from Urick. But it would be Jaime Sharpe's goal with 14 seconds remaining that would be the dagger in the heart of the Minutemen. After playing so well on the offensive for the entire first half, they still went into the half trailing 12-11.

The second half would be much of the same, with neither team being able to pull away. They traded goals for much of the fourth quarter with the eventual game-winner coming on a shot that skipped past Campolettano.

Despite giving up 19 goals, Campolettano, who was pestered with shots all day long, made 16 saves in the losing effort.

"There were three or four times in the game when our team could have folded," Cannella said. "I was pleased with their effort. In my book that was a victory."

Georgetown

fielder Alex Racioppi. After having scored five goals in the previous two games, Racioppi erupted for seven scores against the Hoyas, which included chalking up his second career hat trick – this one spun before the end of the first quarter. His fervor was contagious, as the Minutemen began believing that a shake-up was in the works.

"That's unbelievable out of the midfield," Cannella said. "We really went to Alex a bunch."

Georgetown matched UMass' intensity and resiliency, falling down by three goals on two occasions in the first half, the latest a 10-7 deficit that turned into a 12-10 halftime lead. Trading hooks for the duration of the second half, the Hoyas delivered the knockout punch with under a minute to play. But even then, the Minutemen nearly answered the standing eight, eventually dropping to their knees as the final gun sounded.

Without a doubt, Syracuse will be looking over its shoulder this Saturday at the Carrier Dome. If there's any time the high-octane Orangemen are vulnerable, it is now. And if there's any team they'd rather not face, it might be UMass, who is that team with nothing to lose in storming upstate NY. After this weekend, the question of whether or not the Minutemen can play with the big boys has been answered with an emphatic yes.

UMass now has its chin in the air, its shoulders pulled back and its stride with a majestic look to it. After a loss, it can say that. Now the Minutemen are hoping it pays dividends in the universal indicator of success – the win column.

situations enough," said Stone. "I felt real comfortable with Nick, he's got that changeup that reacts like a splitfinger. It's an out pitch, it's a great out pitch. It was great to have him out there at the end of the ballgame."

Montano worked a full nine for the Rams, giving up five runs on four hits and seven walks.

Persistent rain washed out the doubleheader scheduled for Friday, pushing the first pitch of the weekend to Saturday afternoon. In the opening contest, UMass pitcher Travis Veracka tossed his fifth straight complete game, but received little run support as Fordham prevailed, 4-2.

Fordham jumped out to a 3-0 lead in the first game after the top of the second inning. The Rams used three hits, including a Boyle RBI-double down the left field line, to score three in the second frame. Dan Colonna moved to third on a sacrifice bunt after reaching base, and scored the first run of the game moments later on a groundout to second by former Minuteman Nate Lang. Justin Walker scored the second run of the inning in the next at bat, driven home by a Boyle double to left. Boyle closed out the scoring when Chekmayan singled to right, scoring Boyle to make the score 3-0.

The Minutemen tallied their first run in the bottom of the second, on some aggressive base running by O'Connell. After reaching base, the senior stole second and advanced to third on a throwing error. Senez hit a sacrifice fly to right, scoring O'Connell to pull UMass within two.

The Minutemen scored their last run in the bottom of the third. Senior Skeffington walked, and with Kulak at the plate stole second and came into score on another throwing error by Chekmayan.

Veracka took the loss for the Minutemen, allowing seven runs on seven hits and striking out five.

In the nightcap, UMass stormed back from a 2-0 deficit after three innings to nail down a 3-2 victory. Junior Craig Szado spread out four hits over seven innings en route to his second win of the season.

Trailing 2-1 in the bottom of the fifth, UMass used a Ram error to lead off the inning and scored two uncarned runs to go ahead, 3-2. Kulak singled in freshman left Altieri with two outs in the inning, tying the game at two apiece. An infield single by Gorneault loaded the bases with Morgan due up. Morgan ran the count full, then took ball four, forcing in freshman Matt Boulanger for the game winning run.

The Minutemen are in action this afternoon, as they travel to Pawtucket, RI to face Boston College in the opening round of the Beanpot Tournament.

engine driving the team, delivering clutch hits and demonstrating a strong defensive prowess behind the plate. Morgan belted his team leading fifth homerun of the season on Easter Sunday, a shot over the right-centerfield fence that put UMass ahead of Fordham for good. Heading into this afternoons game against the Eagles, Morgan is batting .387 with a team leading 27 runs batted in.

Also looking to expand on their recent success are sophomore Mike Kulak and junior Nick Gorneault. Kulak heads to Rhode Island batting .341, second only to Morgan. The outfielder has also hit two homeruns and knocked in 16 RBI. Gorneault is hitting .299, and is tied with Morgan for the team lead in homeruns with five. The centerfielder also has 26 RBI.

Aaron Senez, whose bat has quieted as of late, has been a defensive force in the infield for UMass. On Sunday against the Rams, Senez made three sterling throws from the corner to first that kept Fordham off base in key situations. Playing in a similar situation is senior Shaun Skeffinton, whose strong defense at second has helped to cover any shortcomings at the plate.

On the mound for UMass today will be freshman Patrick Reedy. Reedy got his first collegiate start on April 13th against the Northeastern Huskies, in which he pitched five innings and received a no decision. His ERA stands at 2.79, for just over nine innings of work. Having shown promise, Reedy is still an untested commodity in the starters role, and head coach Mike Stone may have to dip into his pool of relief early to help the young pitcher.

The Eagles have a roster filled with talent and power, both at the plate and on the mound. Senior Michael Gambino has paced the team offensively all year. The second baseman will step up to Reedy this afternoon with a .384 batting average, coupled with two homeruns and 21 RBI. Behind Gambino is sophomore Brian Durkin, batting .345, but with only nine RBI. Leading the longball race for the Eagles is senior Eric Olsen. The third baseman is only batting .292, but has collected seven homeruns and 20 RBI's this season.

The Eagles bring in a number of capable pitchers, including senior Andy Sullivan. Sullivan brings with him a 4-0 record, and a miniscule ERA of 0.66. Also strong on the mound is junior Paul Knapic. Knapic has an ERA of 2.47, and is one game over .500 at 2-1.

Following today's game, the Minutemen will head to Fenway Park in Boston to compete in either the title game or consolation game, a decision hinging on the outcome of today's contest with the Eagles.

was the greatest game I have ever had the privilege to play."

The Minutewomen have a 2-16-1 record versus Temple, with their only previous win occurring in 1980, two years before then head coach Pam Hixon led UMass to a perfect 10-0-0 record and the NCAA Championship.

Barnes prepared the team for this game: "We talked to the kids about going out, enjoying, competing, and doing something no UMass team had ever done before, since the reinstatement of the program, beating Temple." [UMass Women's Lacrosse did not compete in the 1991 and 1992 seasons.]

"It's a great win for the program, it's great for our seniors, it's just a tremendous win, all around," Barnes said.

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Home affairs may suddenly become more complicated today, as you realize that the rules have been changing lately and you have not!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Once you've rehearsed, you'll be eager to perform – and your audience today is likely to be a very special one. Be ready to give it your all.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Something that seems to you to be a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity may be, to a friend, a little too dangerous to trust. Discuss issues openly.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – What you don't know can indeed hurt you, perhaps not today, but soon! It's important that you get every bit of available and pertinent information.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Your ability to stick to plans that have been made in the past will serve you well today. You don't want to let things happen accidentally.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You're not going to get on well with those who try to manipulate you today. Indeed, you will prove quite a formidable adversary if you are pushed.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – You may be in for something unusual where romance is concerned. You must be ready to address an issue usually kept under wraps.

Minutewomen end 20-year drought in downpour

Ingraffea, Nardi shine in victory over rival Temple

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

There is the Seven-Year Itch and the seven years of bad luck that one receives breaking a mirror, but nothing is supposed to last twenty. But losing streaks, that is another story, altogether.

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse [6-6, 4-1 Atlantic 10] team has been on the losing end of this twenty-year drought; on the winning end have been the Owls of Temple [7-6, 4-1 A-10]. But every streak must eventually end. And it did Friday afternoon.

The Minutewomen clashed with the Owls for the first time in the new millennium, and came away on top 5-3, thanks to two goals from junior midfielder Rachel Ingraffea and 14 saves from junior goalie Jen Nardi. The win moved the Maroon and White into second place in the conference, percentage points behind leader Virginia Tech.

"Big game, the kids played fantastic, everyone played well. It was amazing. We just did some great things, and it was super," head coach Phil Barnes said.

Temple	3

A purely defensive game was played by both sides, as goals were tough to come by in this matchup of rivals. Stephanie Pavlick, a senior who has been finding the net in bunches recently, was the first to tally for the Minutewomen. She received a pass from fellow senior Rebecca Minaker, and found the back of the net again. The goal pushed her season total to 21.

Minaker also came up big in the first half, when the Minaker-Pavlick tandem paired for UMass' second goal. This time Minaker finished off a feed from Pavlick.

The first goal off the teaming of Pavlick and Minaker came at 21:03, when after playing solid defense for almost nine minutes, Temple broke down and Pavlick found the hole.

The second of the pair of Pavlick-Minaker goals came almost thirteen minutes later at 8:32, when Minaker found the hole in the tough Temple protection, and launched the sphere past senior goalie Iris Alvarado.

Temple got on the board late in the first half when senior attacker Kelly Ruch slipped the ball past Nardi, with the assist going to freshman midfielder, Patience Synnestvedt.

Both goalies were wall-like, with Nardi stopping six of Temple's 14 first half shots, and Alvarado saving seven of the 11 first half shots UMass fired at her.

The second half opened with both teams scoring early goals.

Ingraffea tallied twice in the first nine minutes of the half, putting UMass ahead 4-1.

The Minutewomen scored within the first two minutes and never looked back as Ingraffea tossed her 15th goal of the season through the pipes at 28:41. She repeated herself seven minutes later, putting up her 16th goal at 21:17.

The Owls responded quickly, when sophomore midfielder Jen Jefferson put the biscuit in the basket ten minutes into the second half. Jefferson's goal, her 21st of the year came at 20:15.

UMass struck once more before the game closed, pushing its lead to 5-2.

Senior defender Sara MacNabb blasted the ball past Temple's Alvarado, after accepting a pass from senior midfielder Fay Naber.

The Maroon and White assaulted Temple one more time before the close of the game, when Naber hit MacNabb, who took the pass and put it in the hole for her seventh goal of the season at 12:04.

Temple's response was a slow dribbler of a shot taken by Ruch that squeaked by Nardi at 6:09.

The Owl's Ruch struck back in the final minutes of the game, taking a pass from freshman midfielder Liz Frengs, and tallied her 48th goal of the season.

For the next ten minutes the defense was stoic. UMass did an incredible job at keeping the ball at their rival's ends, and Alvarado did an equally incredible job with three key saves.

"We were out to do something that we hadn't done in a long time, and that was beat Temple," Nardi said after the game. "We wanted it and I don't think there was anything that was going to stop us." Nardi finished the day with 14 saves.

"Everybody played awesome, I can't even think of one bad thing in this game today," Nardi continued. "It

UMass foams at mouth as Hoyas score late goal

WASHINGTON, DC – Coming off an impressive 10-9 win against No. 13 Harvard on Wednesday afternoon, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team had another challenge at hand. But while the opponent was a little better, and the field was a little less friendly.

The Minutemen traveled to the nation's capital for an Eastern College Athletic Conference game with No. 5 Georgetown. Unlike in the home victory over the Crimson, UMass [5-6, 1-4 ECAC] had the daunting task of trying to beat the Hoyas on Kehoe Field, a field that they had not left in losing fashion all season.

Georgetown [10-1, 5-0 ECAC] had already wrapped up the inaugural league title that gives the team an automatic berth into the NCAA tournament, and was playing for nothing more than a better seed. Maybe it was the dreams of fairing better than last year's national semifinal loss to Syracuse that allowed UMass to keep pace with GU, but whatever it was, the Maroon and White realized that its game can be as good as anybody's in the country when the players come together as a team. They did just that, but unfortunately the fell were unable to capitalize.

With momentum on their side, the Minutemen smelled blood and came up just short of taking down the Hoyas, losing 19-18 on a Mike Henehan goal with just 58 seconds remaining in the game.

Trailing 19-18, the Maroon and White had an opportunity to tie the game with under 10 seconds to go, but just as a shot was about to be taken, the whistle blew. The whistle did not signal the end of the game; it was for a Minuteman violation. And with it the idea of an upset faded just as the sound of the whistle did.

"We had a little bit of transition and the official called us with too many men on the field," head coach Greg Cannella said. "I'm not going to talk about his judgment or anything like that."

It was a back and forth game throughout, and it seemed as though whoever had the ball last would be the winner, but this proved not to be the case.

The entire game as suspenseful as the final few seconds, with each team countering on the other's runs. At no point in the game did either team have more than a three-goal advantage.

With neither team holding more than a three-goal lead in the contest, it meant that every possession and every shot had to count. How had more in them? Who would be the one to come out standing in a game that was as faced paced as the Indy 500?

Both sides battled with grit and

UMass captures moral victory against Hoyas

By Brett Mauser

WASHINGTON, DC – For 60 minutes, Massachusetts men's lacrosse looked fun again. For 60 minutes, the Minutemen played like each minute was their last. Fifth-ranked Georgetown undoubtedly feared for its life, dodging bullet after bullet before finally gunning down the upset-minded Maroon and White.

It was how lacrosse is supposed to be played, with a candle's flame spreading like wildfire with each goal and each hit. The game marked the inaugural meeting between the two schools, but they played like grass-roots rivals. Until the clock struck zero, victory was still up for grabs, the crown eventually fluttering onto the head of battle-wearied Georgetown.

But if there's such thing as a moral victory, the Minutemen claimed one. One hates to distribute something of the kind with frequency because, after all, a loss is a loss is a loss. UMass (5-6, 1-4 Eastern College Athletic Conference) still leaves with a sub-.500 record heading into next week's showdown with No. 2 Syracuse and it still hovers ever so close to the ECAC cellar, but the effort put forth Saturday at Kehoe Field was unparalleled.

Everything was seemingly working against UMass, aside from the momentum built in its 10-9 mid-week mashing of No. 13 Harvard at Garber Field. With only a few days to prepare for a road game against a returning Final Four squad, the Minutemen also fought off a 12-hour delay in the airport that landed them in their hotel in the early hours the morning of the game. In addition, Georgetown was undefeated at home and celebrating the commencement of a slew of seniors in Hoya lacrosse. Numbers certainly favored Georgetown, a team that scored more goals and gave up less than the Maroon and White.

But for four quarters, those numbers were put on the mantle, letting heart and desire take center stage in what was a back and forth battle all afternoon.

The game "gives our guys confidence, a bunch of confidence that they can beat anybody if they go and play their hardest," head coach Greg Cannella said of his team's effort. "I told them to walk off the field proud here."

Those in attendance hadn't expected a high-scoring affair, but the first quarter's tempo immediately pushed the Hoyas' panic button. A defensive front, which had yielded just over eight goals a game heading in, all of a sudden let up seven in the first quarter alone. The Minutemen were charged and certainly not raising the white flag based solely on the Hoyas' acclaimed ranking.

"We just told our guys, 'lets go at it,'" Cannella said. "It worked against Harvard. We felt that Keith Cynar for Harvard was a much better goalie than this kid [Scott Schroeder], and we had a lot of shots. We had 46 shots on Wednesday and today we said we're just going to get at them and shot the ball."

Beans in pot for UMass

There isn't a person in New England, young or old, who at one time or another hasn't heard or dreamed of it. It marks the true entrance into spring for many college baseball players and fans, and culminates in Fenway Park, the most hallowed of all professional fields standing today. Its hockey counterpart may garner more attention, but in essence it's still the same: an intimate battle between four teams, all equally hungry for bragging rights.

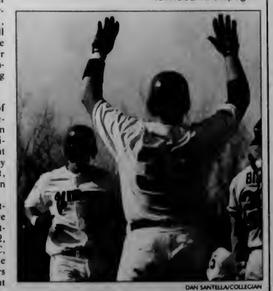
It's the Beanpot.



The University of Massachusetts baseball team will begin play in the 2000 edition of the tournament this afternoon, as they travel to Pawtucket, RI to face the Boston College Eagles in round one.

The first round pairing with the Eagles, who defeated UMass last year in the championship game, will give the Minutemen a chance for redemption. After outlasting Harvard in the opening round last year, 13-12, UMass simply couldn't come up with an answer for BC, losing the title game 4-2. Previous to the loss, the Minutemen had been 6-0 in Beanpot play. This years meeting in the opening round pits two very different clubs against one another; one with 27 victories and a roster full of offensive threats, and one riding a two game winning streak with revenge on its mind.

The Minutemen gained some important momentum this past weekend, taking two games from the Fordham Rams at home, and will look to carry as much of it as they can to Pawtucket with them.

Morgan's homer paces UMass

By Matthew Despres

For the Massachusetts baseball team it was yet another rainy weekend of waiting to play, but this time around there were no dampened spirits as the Minutemen took two out of three games against the Fordham Rams to improve to 16-15-1 (6-5-1 Atlantic 10).

UMass closed out the series yesterday, pulling away in the homestretch to take a 5-3 decision over the Rams. Catcher Chris Morgan snapped a 3-3 tie in the bottom of the eighth with his team leading fifth homerun of the season, giving the Minutemen the lead for good. Head coach Mike Stone again praised the efforts of Morgan, whose consistent performance has paced the UMass club all season long.

"He's legit, he's somebody you can count on to do something most of the time," said Stone. "He could be the best catcher we've ever had here, and we've had some good ones. He throws well, he calls a good game, he's always working hard. He's a gamer; it's great to have him here."

The game was scoreless through three and a half, with pitching and defense dictating most of the early play. Second basemen Shaun Skeffington and third basemen Aaron Senez tied up the infield, each making strong defensive plays that saved potential runs. UMass starter Brian Hourigan kept things under control as well, allowing only one run in five and one third innings of work.

The Minutemen broke the silence in the bottom of the fourth, aided by a pair of errors from Ram shortstop Tim Boyle. Senior Kevin O'Connell reached base on a throwing error, and moved to second on an overthrow. O'Connell then scored from second with two outs on Boyle's second error of the inning to give UMass the 1-0 lead.

After the Rams tied the game at one apiece, the Minutemen took a two run lead in the bottom of the fifth. With two outs, Mike Kulak walked and was driven home in the next at bat when junior Nick Gorneault ripped a double into left-center field. Gorneault then scored on a wild pitch to give UMass a 3-1 lead.

The Rams came clawing back in the seventh, scoring two runs to again tie the game. Hourigan hit catcher Shawn Chekmayan to lead off the inning, and then yielded back to back doubles by Bob Kingsbury and James Cisco that resulted in two runs and, at 3-3, a whole new ball game.

Morgan soon made the game his, though, taking the first pitch of the UMass half of the eighth over the right-center field fence and giving the Minutemen a 4-3 lead.

"I felt I was swinging the bat pretty good all day," said Morgan. "He [Fordham pitcher Mike Montano] threw me a first pitch fastball every at bat, so I was just waiting for it."

Junior Gavin Clark added some insurance to the UMass lead by hitting a single to left with two outs, scoring brother Connell Clark for the fifth and final UMass run.

Junior Nick Skirkanich, the fifth UMass pitcher of the day, picked up the win in a strong relief job, retiring each of the batters he faced in two plus innings of work. With the win, Skirkanich improves to 3-2 on the season.

"It was a tough situation, and we tried to get by with a couple other guys, but they just haven't been in those

"UMass has always been a good secret"

Candidate gives platform

By Brian Lohnes
Collegian Staff

An informational session was held yesterday in the Campus Center with Leon Braswell, a candidate for the position of Director of Admissions at the University of Massachusetts.

Braswell is a UMass graduate from the class of 1983 currently working at Tufts University as an Admissions Associate. Following his graduation from UMass, Braswell proceeded to work at the University of Vermont and at Bowker College before attending Harvard for his graduate studies.

Braswell said while private schools have an easier time dealing with the issue of race in admissions, he understands the conflicts that currently face public institutions. He stressed that he was committed to having a diverse campus community.

"Education is not just what you read," he said. "It seems like the exact same issues that were going on when I was here."

He also feels that race should be a factor in admissions. "Race is the experiences that one brings to the table," he said while arguing against diversity in admissions becoming a standardized practice. "People say the community should look like X."

Braswell expressed the need for this university to be more committed to publicizing itself.

"The university needs to publicize through guidance counselors, parents and schools," he said. "You need to be visible."

His other ideas centered on using the immediate area surrounding the university as an attractive selling point with internships and opportunities.

"There are two cities nearby that should be used as resources for internships and opportunities," Braswell said, stressing the need for the implementation of early learning strategies.

Braswell added that "The state and the University need to have some early learning strategies, if you've only taken geometry and it's your junior year in high school you will be at a disadvantage."

He also felt that several specific areas of the University also needed to be targeted. "Target engineering, sciences and computer science, there is a need for these things," Braswell said. "Everyone needs software developers."

He went on to assert that probably the most significant issue affecting the university now is a public perception problem. "We need to change the public perception of this university. UMass has always been a good secret," he said.

Braswell spoke about the bias that many prospective Massachusetts college students have toward private schools. "There is a strong culture toward private education in this state," he added. "There are 57 schools in and around the metro Boston area."

Also emphasized was the distinct leadership role that the Amherst campus needs to take over the other UMass campuses. "Our responsibility as the flagship, should be to set the pace, there are new variables that need to be looked at."

When asked about the effectiveness of the current measures to raise the public perception of the university by lifting admission standards and implementing the Commonwealth College, Braswell was a bit hesitant. About raising the admission standards he said, "It may scare some people off, but to the people it doesn't, they know what they have to do and work for that level."

On the Commonwealth College Braswell said, "It is so new that I really don't have too much information on it, but it is a new program and I expect it to be a bumpy road."

Braswell was also asked about the importance of SAT scores in the admission process. "The SATs are a data point, it gives us some information but not all, the rigor of the curriculum is a better gauge of a student."

He also described the various biases that come with the SAT's. "Different income groups test better then others, men and women test differently, the test is a biased test."

Braswell summed up his major goal as administration director by saying, "We need to prepare for a changing world and understand different perspectives, when you graduate the workplace is an incredibly diverse setting."

Professor discusses effects of media violence

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Staff

What is the government doing to account for violence in the media and its subsequent effects on children?

Erica Scharrar, assistant professor of Communication at the University of Massachusetts focused on this topic in her discussion, "Of Violence and V-chips" at Thompson hall, at noon yesterday as part of the Center for Public Policy and Administration's Colloquium Speakers Series.

Scharrar is working with 6th graders and parents in assessing the consequences of television violence and what can be done to control what children view in the often violent and graphic world of television.

The v-chip has been the government's latest technological answer as part of the FCC Telecommunications Act of 1996. As a result of this legislation the v-chip is installed today in all televisions 13 inches or larger manufactured in the U.S. in the effort towards protecting children from the effects of negative television images.

"Findings have been overwhelming in real life, lab experiments and meta-analysis [with violent television having] negative and anti-social consequences for young children. Testimonies by researchers concerning television violence reveal negative anti-social outcomes such as learning aggressive behaviors. These acts inspired children to go out and copy this type of act," Scharrar said.

Another negative effect cited was "thinking of aggression as normative; what it means to be male is intertwined with physical reactions to things instead of an emotional reaction" Scharrar said.

The v-chip provides ratings in the corner of the screen bearing letters and combinations of letters like "V" for violence, "S" for sex, "L" for language, "B" for brief, "N" for nudity, and "L" for language. Age-appro-

Earth Day panel to address pressing issues with forum

By Erica Mattison
Collegian Staff

In recognition of the 30th Earth Day, a panel of environmental experts will speak at a forum tonight in Mahar Auditorium. The UMass Office of Waste Management and environmental sciences program are co-sponsoring the event.

The forum will be held at 7 p.m. and is free and open to the public.

"The Future of Our Global Environment: What We Have Done, What We Must Do" will feature biologist Barry Commoner. The forum is part of Give-Your-Car-a-Break Week that is taking place in Amherst in honor of Earth Day.

Barry Commoner

According to John Pepi, director of the Office of Waste Management, Commoner will speak about why environmental problems are occurring and what we can do.

One of Commoner's main concerns is the biotechnology industry, said Pepi. Three weeks ago there was a biotechnology industry conference held in Boston; meanwhile, at a counter-conference nearby, Commoner spoke of the environmental concerns associated with biotechnology.

In a statement to the press, Commoner said that "In the last 50 years the petrochemical industry has produced thousands of synthetic chemicals that have massively invaded the environment and have made people sick and die... Now this basic mistake is being repeated by the same corporations; reincarnated as biotechnology companies. This time the industry is based on genetic plagiarism; the technique of transferring DNA genes from one species into a wholly unrelated one."

Commoner has received praise from a variety of publications over the years. "Time magazine covered a story on him in 1970, calling him 'the Paul Revere of ecology," said Pepi. From a selection of people all over the world within the last 50 years, "Earth Times, in 1995, called him one of the 'hundred who made a difference.'"

After working as the director of the Center for the Biology of Natural Systems, Commoner is now working at Queens College of the City University of New York. An environmental activist for decades, Commoner has authored many books.

According to Pepi, choosing Commoner as a speaker at this forum was an obvious choice, thanks to a class Pepi had taken at UMass. "When I was a student at UMass in the 70s, I was in an economics class that looked at the connection between environmental problems and economic systems. [It was there that I read a book by Commoner.] I was extremely impressed by the sophistication of his analysis. He is an amazing thinker," said Pepi. "I think he will have some very interesting things to say."

Other speakers will include William Manning, of the UMass department of microbiology; Christine Lindstrom, the campus programs director for MassPIRG's student chapters; UMass geosciences department head Raymond Bradley; lens Christiansen, a Mount Holyoke College professor of environmental studies and economics.

"This year, with our [the Office of Waste Management] recycling efforts, I am trying to communicate to the student body how vital it is for them to take recycling seriously," noted Pepi.

He continued, "We can talk about what the government can make the corporations do, but we also have to look at what we are responsible for through our daily actions."

After five months, SGA to revisit appointed seats debate

ALANA Caucus nixes support for motion

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

After a five-month layoff, the Student Government Association is preparing to revisit a topic of heated debate last semester: appointed seats.

Tomorrow night's meeting will feature three motions that would gradually phase out the seats by the 2003-2004 academic year. The motions would also create a new cabinet position that would look at issues of diversity, a sticking point for at least one senator, and a committee that would examine diversity from the perspective of the senate. Add to that the withdrawal of support for one of the three proposed motions by the ALANA Caucus and Wednesday's debate should be heated.

The seats, which comprise both those of the Asian Latino African and Native American caucus, and area government seats, are 15 percent of the entire senate. However, this Wednesday's motion, unlike others before it, has been written by SGA President Jeff Howe and supported by the ALANA Caucus. However, after discussing the motions with their constituents, the ALANA Caucus withdrew their support for the motion supporting a gradual removal of caucus seats.

Howe worked with James, and Jon Laubinger, the SGA Attorney General, on the motion. Neither was available for comment.

Both supporters of and opposition to appointed seats seemed to feel that the legislation would pass, and sounded pleased that the issue was coming to a possible end.

Mikale Billard, the speaker of the SGA Senate, was satisfied with the legislation, saying that he expected all three motions to pass and described the motions as a "solution."

"Hopefully, to combat the reduced seats in the SGA, the Senate body can still be diversified," Billard said.

Some senators that have comprised the main opposition to the appointed seats felt that the compromise, pending a decision by the Senate Judiciary about the legality and constitutionality of the appointed seats, was acceptable.

Zachary Spilman, a commuter area senator-at-large, said that he's "all for getting rid of appointed seats. Those seats are unconstitutional and that's pretty straightforward. President Howe is finally recognizing that."

Spilman said that the compromise sounded fine to him, saying that if that's what Howe wanted to do, that was fine with him, although he added that the compromise won't remedy underlying legal issues. His only other issue was with the proposed titles of the new cabinet member and the new committee. Spilman said that "diversity is a much bigger issue than he [Howe] is attempting to address. He wants to address the concerns of ethnic minorities on campus, and those are cultural concerns, not diversity ones."

Spilman said that he would vote for the measures if the names of the new committees were changed to "cultural" or "cross-cultural," adding that, otherwise, the motions have his support.

For Spilman, the issue of the appointed seats is simply a constitutional one. He said that as long as the seats were eliminated, he had no problem voting for and accepting a time frame for their gradual removal. He discounted fears of some unnamed senators, saying that he wasn't too worried that if the motions pass tomorrow night, they could simply be nullified by future SGAs.

However, he was still waiting for a decision from the Senate Judiciary, which he expected later in the week.

"If we lose the case at the end of this week, but the seats will still be phased out, then great, that's a compromise, and I have no problems with a compromise," Spilman said.

Ken Campbell, the Central Area Governor Elect, said that he'd support the motion because he doesn't see any problem with it, "as long as the appointed seats are gone."

He described them as "unconstitutional" and "undemocratic" although he added that his main sticking point wasn't with the ALANA Caucus seats, but rather with Area Government seats.

Microsoft stock in freefall

By Jube Shiver Jr., Stanley Holmes and Joseph Menn
Los Angeles Times

Microsoft Corp. shares plummeted on Monday as investors confronted a double-barreled threat to the company's growth prospects: its first quarterly sales disappointment in more than a decade compounded by fears that the federal government will call for a corporate breakup in its antitrust case.

Microsoft shares fell 15.6 percent, to $66.38, mostly on news of the company's glum assessment for the current quarter and the coming year in one of its biggest single-day declines in the company's history.

The drop placed the stock44 percent below its record high of $119.94, reached earlier this year, as more than 156 million shares changed hands in trading on the NASDAQ Stock Market. That was a record volume for Microsoft and the third-biggest single-day total for any stock in history.

Wall Street professionals largely attributed the scale of the sell-off to the company's earnings announcement last week, when it reported that earnings for the quarter ended March 31 rose by 23 percent, exceeding estimates, but that revenue also rose only 23 percent, less than investors expected.

Even more damaging were projections by the company's chief financial officer, John Connors, that revenue growth would fall dramatically to the mid-teens from the mid-20 percent range in the 2001 fiscal year, which begins in July.

"Microsoft last missed a quarter (that is, fell short of investors' expectations) 11 years ago," said W. Christopher Mortenson, an analyst for Deutsche Bank in New York. Because the securities markets were closed for Good Friday, Monday was the first chance investors had to react to the news.

The lower-than-expected revenue results prompted several influential Wall Street analysts to downgrade the stock on Monday morning.

Goldman Sachs technology analyst Richard G. Sherlund cut his rating to "market outperform" from "buy" and remarked that the company's reliance on personal computer software might limit its growth, as businesses and consumers embrace new computing devices that don't require that software.

"There is an increasing risk that Microsoft might atrophy on the PC platform as IBM did on the mainframe platform, while robust growth shifts to hand-held and wireless devices," Sherlund wrote.

Microsoft, which controls 90 percent of the market for PC desktop operating systems, is struggling to make the transition from the desktop to the Internet, where it faces more competition and a threat from alternative operating systems.

The Internet is pushing the personal computer from its dominant position to just one of a growing constellation of digital devices, such as mainframe servers, game machines, hand-held personal organizers, smart cell phones and interactive pagers.

Adding to investor anxiety about the company's growth prospects are indications that federal officials favor breaking up Microsoft as a penalty for its antitrust violations.

Sources in Washington said Monday that the Department of Justice not only favors such a breakup, but wishes to impose some sanctions, such as forbidding discriminatory pricing of Microsoft's Windows software, even before the software giant appeals a federal court finding that it violated antitrust laws.

The tougher-than-expected proposal, together with the falling stock price, could increase pressure on the software giant to return to the negotiating table to settle the landmark antitrust case.

Joel Klein, head of the antitrust division of the U.S. Justice Department, telephoned entertainment, computer and financial industry executives over the weekend to ask their opinion of the government proposal. Attorney General Janet Reno also has been briefed, sources said.

priate numbers like "7" for age seven are also listed. These symbols have received mixed reactions from parents.

Scharrar reported parents finding combinations of letters such as "FV" meaning, brief nudity, and "MA" meaning mature audience, confusing and difficult to remember. Often this has resulted in the lack of parents acknowledging these symbols altogether. Another short falling of the v-chip is that "the ratings appear 15 seconds only. Most parents don't know about the v-chip.

"Parents also expressed concern that kids would be exposed anyway in other settings," Scharrar said.

The Kaiser Family Foundation's study on media revealed that 70 percent of parents say they do not plan to buy a television to get v-chip technology while 54 percent of parents with v-chip technology report using ratings to guide children's television viewing.

Another problem with the effectiveness of v-chip technology is that it is inconsistently applied.

"NBC is refusing to do content-based labeling at all, transmitting only age-based ratings without the content portion," Scharrar said.

Holdouts include NBC and among cable networks, Black Educational Television, QVC, and Home Shopping Network refuse the labeling based on their first amendment right.

"News and Sports channels are exempted and have no plans to encode their programs" Scharrar said.

The v-chip is seen as particularly important now as, "the amount of time we (adults and children) spend with mass media is growing. Most people spend four hours a day with television," Scharrar said.

She went on to explain that because of growing television exposure, "More regulations are needed with television. Content regulation needs to be more understandable with [perhaps] whole words instead of letters. Institutionalize media literacy efforts. Do not allow first amendment knee-jerk responses to quell any and all policies. Limit children's time spent with media. (Kaiser Foundation reports a total of 7 hours per day), and attempt to curb the immense power enjoyed by the media industry. (e.g. anti-trust laws)" Scharrar said.

Dental student from University of Iowa jailed for racial threats

By Sky Eilers & Zack Kucharski
The Daily Iowan (U. Iowa)

(U-WIRE) IOWA CITY, Iowa – Following a three-week span of threats and intimidation aimed at minorities in the University of Iowa College of Dentistry, students and staff members at the school said Thursday's arrest leaves them with a sense of relief –and concern.

Now, the UI's focus turns to reaffirming its commitment to diversity and getting back to the regular routine, said Ann Rhodes, the vice president for university relations.

UI Public Safety charged 23-year-old Tarsha Claiborne, a second-year dental student, early Thursday with six counts of third-degree harassment, criminal trespass elevated to hate crime status and threats in violation of individual rights.

Claiborne, originally of Baton Rouge, La., is being held in Johnson County Jail on a $52,000 bond. A preliminary hearing on the charges has been scheduled for May 1.

Claiborne, 2427 Bartelt Rd. Apt. 2A, spoke with several local media outlets following the initial e-mails, saying she was concerned for her safety and questioning the level of security at the college –even before the threats.

Julie Farrell, a second-year UI dental student, had a class with Claiborne and said she didn't seem any different from other dental students.

Claiborne's father died last year, and she was "pretty upset over that," Farrell said.

"It was a complete shock," she said. "We were all hoping it wouldn't be a dental student, but nobody suspected it would be a minority student. I think it is sad that it was Tarsha."

Rhodes called the e-mails "extremely disruptive" and "terrifying for minority members of the community" and said it will be important for members of the community to work together.

"How we react will say a lot," she said.

Investigators determined the first two e-mails were sent from the Pathology Learning Center Instructional Technology Center, approximately three blocks from the Dental Science Building. Following that determination, investigators then searched the hard drive of the computer and placed the area under video surveillance, Rhodes said.

The e-mail containing a bomb threat was sent from a different e-mail address but it was traced to the same ITC. Claiborne was seen on videotape leaving the ITC, Rhodes said. A member of the dental faculty identified Claiborne on the surveillance video Wednesday, she said.

Authorities believe that Claiborne acted alone, Rhodes said

Claiborne was arrested at her apartment at 12:30 a.m. Thursday by Public Safety with the assistance of Iowa City police, Rhodes said.

During her interview with police, Claiborne admitted to sending the racist e-mails, leaving a plate of ramen noodles on the doorstep of a third-year minority dental student and threatening to blow up the dental building, court documents said.

Authorities have no motive for the e-mail incidents, Rhodes said. She could not speculate on Claiborne's academic performance and was unaware of any hostile feelings on the student's part toward faculty and administrators, she said.

While searching Claiborne's apartment, investigators recovered ramen noodles, red dye and the same type of paper that was believed to be used to write a note saying "Dead Black Man's Brains" that was left on the doorstep of the third-year minority dental student, whom Claiborne knew and who lived in an adjacent building, said Iowa City police Sgt. Bill Campbell.

Authorities also seized computer equipment and information related to the e-mail victims from the apartment, Campbell said. There were no weapons or explosives found inside Claiborne's apartment, he said

In addition to the state criminal charges, Claiborne also faces UI sanctions, which, because of the severity of the case, may mean an immediate suspension from the UI, Rhodes said.

The Johnson County Attorney's Office plans to meet with investigators from Public Safety and the FBI sometime soon to review whether to file additional state or federal charges, said Johnson County Attorney J. Patrick White. He would need to consult with the U.S. Attorney's Office before filing any federal charges, White said.

Court rules on same-sex benefits

By Lisa Grzyboski
The Pitt News (U. Pittsburgh)

(U-WIRE) PITTSBURGH – The wait is over. In a late-afternoon ruling Thursday, the city's Court of Common Pleas ruled that the University of Pittsburgh's health benefits plan, which does not provide coverage for the domestic partners of homosexual employees, is legal and non-discriminatory.

The decision comes 3 1/2 years after Deborah Henson and six other complainants filed a lawsuit against Pitt, alleging that the University discriminated against them in employment benefits because of their sexual orientation.

It also comes after a year filled with rallies, a hunger strike, swirling controversy over homophobic comments made by Pitt's trustees chairman, "stealth legislation" in Harrisburg and a constant battle between University administrators and faculty members over the same-sex issue.

Saying Pitt "is gratified that the judge has come to this decision," University spokesman Ken Service said administrators were not terribly surprised at the court's decision.

"I think we felt we had a good position," Service said, adding that as far as Pennsylvania law is concerned, the extension of benefits can lawfully be based on marital status.

Pitt stipulates a couple must be married or have obtained a common-law marriage in order for an employee's domestic partner to receive University-provided health insurance coverage.

"There has never been any intent to discriminate against individuals on the basis of sexual orientation," Service added.

There are plenty of groups that would beg to differ.

Organizations as varied as the Equal Rights Alliance, the Feminist Collective, the Rainbow Alliance and Students in Solidarity have joined forces in past months to protest what they consider the University's discrimination. Holding rallies, the most recent on April 5, the groups protested Pitt's stance on the issue and entreated that it follow the direction of such academic institutions as Harvard University, Stanford University and the University of Chicago in providing health benefits to homosexual employees' partners. Carnegie Mellon University is also considering offering benefits to the domestic partners of its homosexual employees.

Aside from the rallies, the ERA also staged a hunger strike late last spring that continued into May 1999 in protest against Pitt's same-sex benefits policy.

In a prepared statement, Service wrote that there are "individuals who continue to attempt to make the availability of same-sex benefits the only measure of institutional humanity. Fortunately, most people realize that there is far more involved in establishing and maintaining an environment of inclusion and diversity."

Common Pleas Judge Robert C. Gallo prepared the 20-page decision after hearing arguments from both sides and reviewing the extensive case record. If Gallo had ruled in favor of the plaintiffs, the action against the University pending before the Pittsburgh Human Relations Commission would have proceeded. Henson and the other plaintiffs alleged the University violated the Pittsburgh Human Relations Act, which includes a 1990 gay-rights ordinance that bans employment discrimination, including the allocation of benefits, based on sexual orientation.

Editorial/Opinion

Our Opinion
Politics over family

Early Saturday morning, over a course of three minutes, federal agents armed with machine guns plucked little Elian Gonzalez from his house. The purpose of the raid was to return Elian to his father.

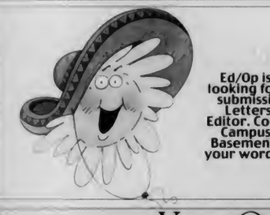
The only controversy about the issue surrounds Elian's native roots. Born a Cuban and brought to America by a mother that died during the journey, Elian was fought for by Cuban exiles and Republicans who maintained that he should never be forcibly returned to Communist Cuba.

Hogwash.

Although Saturday's raid led to a photo sure to be famous for years, an agent grabbing for Elian while holding a machine-gun, and trauma for those that experienced it, the act was a necessary one: Elian had, by all definitions, been held illegally by family that refused to return him to his father.

In an embarrassing display of "unity," Cuban exiles again and again prevented the boy from being turned over to Immigration and Naturalization Service officers and Juan Gonzalez, Elian's father. The boy was continually prevented from leaving a house that originally served as his American sanctuary before becoming his American prison. The boy, originally a victim whose mother had died, later became nothing more than a, as Jesse Jackson put it, "Cold-War trophy."

That what was best for the little boy would be forgotten in some sort of attempt to exact revenge on Cuba's Fidel Castro is shameful, and that the Cuban-exile community would be more interested in harming Cuba's aging leader than helping the boy is an embarrassment.



And, because the issue became immediately political, groups lined up on either side, staking out their plot of ideology. President Clinton was right to stand up to the exiles, supporting all attempts to get the boy back to his father. However, as good as his effort was, the opposite side was downright embarrassing in their behavior.

Supposed pro-family values politicians, the right-wing took (or at least should have taken) a major hit as far as their credibility is concerned. Long standing for the rights of fathers, as well as the need to keep families together, Republicans came out against returning Elian to his father in a shameful display of two-faced politicking.

These are the same Republicans that have proposed everything from more armed guards to a fence between the United States and Mexico to keep foreigners out of our nation. Their decision to double back on their rabidly anti-immigrant policies is equally embarrassing; they should have stuck to their ideological guns and encouraged that the boy be sent back immediately.

The Daily Collegian can only hope that this sordid affair is done with, now and forever. The boy has been returned to his father, and any attempts to again separate them will be more harmful than good for all involved.

The only issue that should be considered, that should have ever been considered, is what is best for Elian Gonzalez and his father; the politics surrounding their issue should be irrelevant. Why politics have suddenly become so much more important than the general well-being of a family-beyond us; we believe that those politics should now be forgotten.

Wrestling with Njoki Njahu

Boomer Pinches

It's been just over a week now since "A16" and the question still remains: what exactly did the protests in Washington accomplish?

When I arrived in Washington last Saturday, the day before delegates from the IMF and the World Bank were to meet, the general feeling among the protesters was that they had the power to shut down the meetings, as had happened in Seattle. The convergence center had been raided the day before, and everybody kicked out due to "fire code violations." The charge was obviously bogus. Certainly it couldn't account for why the cops had confiscated all of the puppets and medical supplies that were stored in the building. It was unconstitutional and there was nothing anyone could do about it. This was Washington, after all - The Man's home turf.

I was there to see how it would all go down. Would it be Seattle II at the protesters hoped? Or would it be an over-hyped failure?

There was a public debate scheduled at the Jewish Community Center that afternoon between representatives of both the IMF and the World Bank, and their detractors. It seemed like a good enough place to start. Perhaps if I was lucky a brawl would break out - chairs flying everywhere, dirty hippies mixing it up with anarchists, journalists being torn limb from limb. But when I arrived I found that the debates were being held in an amphitheater far too small to accommodate the large crowd which had gathered to take part. The line out the door was longer than John Holmes. There was no way I would get in if I waited my turn.

Up at the front of the line, members of the international press were flashing credentials and trying to negotiate entry. That would be my play. Surely I could be considered a journalist in some tangential sense of the word. But of course I had no credentials. Even if I had thought to get some, it's doubtful that the Daily Collegian would have carried much weight when they were turning away reporters from The Guardian in London. There was simply no more room inside, the woman at the door told everyone, even the card-carrying journalists. Hardly seems fair, I thought. Wasn't the whole point of this protest to make sure that every voice was heard, that no one would be turned away from the negotiations table? How draconian. The hypocrisy of these people sickened me. It was my duty as a red-blooded lover of truth and justice to find some way in, or die trying.

I managed to furtively slink past the woman at the door. But before I could enter the amphitheater proper, I was intercepted by an enormous Kenyan woman in a purple muumuu.

"What are you doing?" she demanded.

"No, no, it's all right," I assured her, giving her my friendliest grin. "I'm press."

I patted her on the shoulder to let her know everything was okay. Surely this situation could be resolved without violence. But she seized my arm, looking very pissed.

"There's no more room. You have to get out."

"I'm a journalist, dammit!" I said, struggling to get free. "Don't you understand? I must get in there to cover this debate! How else will the good people of Massachusetts know what's going on down here in the nation's capital?"

We were practically wrestling at this point, neither of us willing to give an inch. Suddenly, and for no good reason it seemed tremendously important that I attend the debate. Was I really grappling fiercely with a rotund woman in a purple muumuu? How had I arrived at this absurd moment? I was on the verge of biting her arm or kicking her in the shin when some ruffian tried to barge past her on the other side. She let go to deal with him, giving me just enough time to squeeze past into the amphitheater.

The room was filled with reporters and protesters from six of the world's continents (Antarctica, sadly, was not represented). There was nowhere to sit. I ended up sitting atop the balustrade in the mezzanine, feet dangling over the edge, hoping to Jesus that some careless photojournalist angling for a clear shot of the debaters wouldn't shove me off and send me crashing into the contingent of anti-capitalists from Zimbabwe fifteen feet below.

After about ten minutes, the debaters took the stage. To my horror, I saw that the woman in the purple muumuu was one of the speakers. The woman I had been struggling with was international human rights activist Njoki Njahu. It turned out she was an important member of 50 Years Is Enough, an organization dedicated to the cancellation of Third World debt. She was obviously an intelligent woman who had devoted her life to the downtrodden and oppressed, yet minutes earlier we had been locked in mortal combat - me trying to get in and find out what was going on, and she determined to stop me by any means necessary. She was a voice for the oppressed - but to me, however briefly, she had been The Man . . .

Inevitable, perhaps. Even revolutionaries have to have some sort of hierarchy, and independents like myself, reluctant to sign on with any specific agenda, were at the bottom of the food chain. It raised the question: even if, at some improbable future date, the "grassroots" spirit of the D.C. protesters were able to overthrow American capitalism, would they be able to successfully implement the affinity group, "by consensus" model for group decision-making on a national and international scale? Or would it be corrupted by simply trying to meet the challenge, becoming just another system of socio-political control? If Njoki Njahu's crusade was triumphant tomorrow and she were elected President of the United States, it seems that she would still be keeping me out of public debates: we would still be wrestling in some antechamber somewhere.

But my political paranoia has gotten ahead of itself. No time for far-flung fears. Better to focus on the enemy of the moment: imperial capitalism, American-style. That was the reason we were all there. That was why I found myself roaming the streets of downtown Washington at 6 AM Sunday. Those first predawn moments were charged with possibility. Parades of protesters armed with drums and kazoos converged on the cordoned-off blocks around the World Bank building, where the pigs waited with their gas masks and billy clubs. Bands of black-clad anarchists were running all over the place, keeping in contact with each other via radios in their hoods. George Washington University, in the center of all this madness, had been shut down. Even the Ute Lemper concert scheduled for that night had been cancelled. It was tragic. I never wanted a revolution where the people couldn't dance to Ute Lemper.

I spent five hours as part of a human blockade along 21st Street. Every five minutes we received contradictory reports: there was a riot on Eye and 19th, or there wasn't; the cops a block behind us had put on their gas masks and were preparing to tear gas us, or they weren't. Meanwhile my fellow protesters were belting out an assortment of really annoying "power of the people" chants. It was driving me mad. I've always felt that acts of civil disobedience like our own would be much more impressive if everyone involved remained silent and poker-faced. Better yet, arm them all with shotguns and machetes. No international finance expert would dare come within a hundred yards of such a line, much less try and cross it.

At any rate, there would a good number of hard-core, disciplined protesters among us. But there were also a lot of people who seemed to have merely tagged along for the ride, eager for some excitement. How would these kids hold up when the pigs closed in, I wondered. I pictured tear gas, tanks, snipers, cops bashing human beings like piñatas. Tiananmen Square right here in the U.S. capital . . .

The irony of course, as we all know now but didn't then, is that by the time the protesters were in place Sunday morning, the cops couldn't have cared less about our blockade. It was useless. The cops had mobilized early and shuttled practically all of the delegates in by the time any organized blockades had been secured. The real fascist action had gone down the night before, when 600 non-violent protesters (and quite a few people who weren't at all involved in the protest) were rounded up by cops in riot gear and shipped off in buses. They were not told they were arrested. They were kept on the buses, handcuffed, for up to 15 hours without food, water, or access to a restroom.

But we had no way of knowing this on Sunday morning. We thought the cops might attack at any moment. But they never did, and at times things were so dull and static I started to wish they would. The only excitement came from a handful of lunatics who would charge headlong into our line without warning, trying desperately to break through. For some reason, most of them targeted me and the people immediately around me as the best starting point for their kamikaze assaults. One of these lunatics turned out to be a GWU student trying to get home to his fraternity house down the street behind us. When we asked why he had charged into us instead of simply explaining his situation, he claimed that he had already been refused peaceful entry several times. I could picture the headlines: HEROIC YOUNG PROTESTERS SUCCESSFULLY SHUT DOWN DELTA CHI FRAT HOUSE. "WICKED AWESOME KEGGER" NARROWLY AVERTED.

At around 11:30, CNN announced what we all sensed: the delegates were already inside. Ah well. Maybe next time. By 6 PM Sunday evening, I was too tired to care. I passed out for an hour in the park at Dupont Circle. When I woke up, one of my loyal companions was talking to homeless guy who had been a protester back in the '60s. The man needed a shower and a new pair of shoes and a little more practice at forming complete sentences. Was this poor vagrant the future awaiting today's protesters? Dazed and confused in city parks? No, I realized; only the truly devoted ones. For the rest, the future would likely be more depressing: a lifetime of dot-com startups and online stock portfolios, all their youthful ideals sucked up into the vortex of bottom-line profits.

Police forces have not intervened because of the hundred year old tradition of collecting money.

A small plane crashed in the mountains of New Zealand yesterday, killing all six passengers, including a 14 year-old boy.

The Cessna 206, a single engine plane, collided into the Dunstan Range in southern New Zealand, almost 400 miles from the capital of Wellington, police said.

Three men and two women were killed instantly. The 14 year-old boy died in the helicopter en route to the hospital. According to rescue helicopter pilot Dave Taylor, the crash seemed to have occurred as the plane was turning around to return to the airport.

All six people were from New Zealand's North Island.

French Prime Minister Lionel Iospin warned hunters Monday that violence would not be tolerated in the protests over the reform of France's hunting laws.

Vincent Peillon, a member of French parliament, was overwhelmed by a group of 300 protesting hunters, Saturday, and had to be airlifted out of the building he was cornered in.

The hunters are angry about the possible reforms, which would make shooting on one's own property illegal and ban hunting on Wednesday's, when French schools are closed after noon.

Protestors in Saudi Arabia fired shots at the home of a member of the royal family, killing one police officer and wounding three others, according to a statement released by the Interior Ministry yesterday.

The protesters were at the home of Najran governor Mishaal Ibn Saud, protesting for the release of a man arrested earlier in the day on charges of sorcery.

Other sources stated that the protesters were actually protesting the closing of their mosque. Another police officer was critically wounded during the raid on the suspected sorcerer's house.

The trial of the seven members the Serb Liberation Army charged with planning to assassinate Yugoslav president Slobodan Milosevic began yesterday.

The septet was arrested in December and has also been charged with planning an assassination of Yugoslav Army Chief of Staff Nebojsa Pavkovic.

The group denies any terrorist plans.

Setting the record straight

I am writing in response to an editorial article by the Collegian, in the April 13, 2000 issue entitled, "Our Opinion: Lopsided Spring Concert." It seems as though the person who actually wrote this article does not want to step forward. So, I will just have to address this letter to the Collegian as a whole, since they do not want to reveal the identity of the person. I would like to set the record straight because the Collegian has the facts mixed up about the line up of the Spring Concert.

First of all, there is one hip-hop act, Method Man and Redman. Yes, they may be two separate artists, but they have released an album together, and will be performing together as our headline act. Obviously, the Collegian is mistaken if they believe the Spring Concert is slanted towards one type of music. There are more rock acts in the lineup than any other genre of music. The Long Beach Dub All-Stars are a ska/rock band. FuzzBubble is a rock band. Antigone Rising is a rock band, consisting of females. Bruce Bass is a funk jam band.

Beenie Man is a reggae artist, not hip-hop. Biz Markie, is a rapper and D.J. now, but is hosting the event and and keeping the crowd entertained between performances. So the Collegian is mistaken once again. Maybe is a little research was done the article would not have been so... false, and it would have known that there are actually five types of music being represented.

As a member of University Productions and Concerts (UPC), I know I can speak for myself as well as the other members when I say I am proud of the line up. We have worked extremely hard to present this show to the UMass campus, and for someone to criticize the work and effort we put into this show is upsetting. I know we will no be able to please everyone, but I believe a pretty good job has been done. I hear nothing but enthusiasm about the show when people stop by or call the UPC office to find out information about the show. A great turnout is expected at the Mullins Center on May 7, 2000, for the annual Spring Concert, presented by UPC and the SGA.

The facts need to be found out before such an untrue article is presented in a paper that draws so many readers. If the Collegian believes UPC made such a "wretched mistake." than they are once again mistaken.

Armed terrorists took 22 people hostage Sunday night on a small resort island off the coast of Borneo. According to Malaysian officials, the hostages included some foreign tourists from the U.S., France, Germany, and South Africa. The kidnappers, who reportedly were armed with AK-47's and rocket launchers, allegedly spoke a form of a Philippine language.

Malaysian police say they now know precise location of the hostages and their captors, and are organizing rescue efforts.

Guatemalan students have invoked a new Easter tradition: the stripping and severe beating of suspected criminals.

The students, who have customarily dressed in the red and black attire of executioners, have panhandled during the countries 103 year old Easter celebration parade to help pay for it.

Last year, the students encircled men whom they thought were guilty of crimes. The students, mostly male, then stripped the men to their underwear and publicly beat them.

The U.N. has knowledge of 108 attempts at hangings by the student mob, 40 of these attempts ended in the deaths of suspected felons.

Police forces have not intervened because of the hundred year old tradition of collecting money.

A small plane crashed in the mountains of New Zealand yesterday, killing all six passengers, including a 14 year-old boy.

The Cessna 206, a single engine plane, collided into the Dunstan Range in southern New Zealand, almost 400 miles from the capital of Wellington, police said.

Three men and two women were killed instantly. The 14 year-old boy died in the helicopter en route to the hospital. According to rescue helicopter pilot Dave Taylor, the crash seemed to have occurred as the plane was turning around to return to the airport.

All six people were from New Zealand's North Island.

French Prime Minister Lionel Iospin warned hunters Monday that violence would not be tolerated in the protests over the reform of France's hunting laws.

Vincent Peillon, a member of French parliament, was overwhelmed by a group of 300 protesting hunters, Saturday, and had to be airlifted out of the building he was cornered in.

The hunters are angry about the possible reforms, which would make shooting on one's own property illegal and ban hunting on Wednesday's, when French schools are closed after noon.

Protestors in Saudi Arabia fired shots at the home of a member of the royal family, killing one police officer and wounding three others, according to a statement released by the Interior Ministry yesterday.

The protesters were at the home of Najran governor Mishaal Ibn Saud, protesting for the release of a man arrested earlier in the day on charges of sorcery.

Other sources stated that the protesters were actually protesting the closing of their mosque. Another police officer was critically wounded during the raid on the suspected sorcerer's house.

The trial of the seven members the Serb Liberation Army charged with planning to assassinate Yugoslav president Slobodan Milosevic began yesterday.

Lebanese prisoners released after 14 years
Israel's supreme court begins to shift its security policy

Israel and its neighbors

COURTESY NG MAPS

By Steve Berg
Collegian Staff

Israel recently released 13 Lebanese prisoners who had been detained without trial for 14 years. This exemplifies the beginning shift in Israeli security policies that have been so oppressive towards the Palestinians and Lebanese that are within their occupied territories, and so criticized by the Arab World.

Life for the Arabs in the West Bank, Gaza Strip, Golan Heights, and the Southern Lebanon Buffer Zone, has been one of constant hardship. Their standard of living is extremely low compared to the Jewish settlements established in the West Bank and Golan Heights, and human rights abuses in the name of national security often occur outside the rule of law.

House demolitions and detentions without trial are commonplace for the Arabs under Israeli rule. Torture has also been a common practice for obtaining information by the Israeli security agencies.

Only recently has this trend been repealed by the intervention of Israel's Supreme Court. Torture was outlawed last September, while the release of the Lebanese prisoners occurred last Wednesday.

However, the issue is still controversial. The position of the Israeli government has always been that security is the priority concern for a nation facing very real threats to Israeli lives and livelihood. Prime Minister Ehud Barak has said that the courts should not be interfering with matters of security. The decision to release the prisoners also goes against the strong pleas by many to use the prisoners to bargain for the release of an Israeli pilot that has been held in Lebanon since 1986.

The harsh policies Israel has taken are a direct result of the turbulent 52-year history of the nation. From the very beginning, Israelis have been fighting for their existence against an Arab community that refused to recognize the Israeli State and took every opportunity to remove the nation from the Middle East, first through all-out war and then terrorism. Throughout it all, Israel has faced tremendous adversity, and managed to not only survive but prosper and build a great nation.

The underlying reason for their success, has been a strong military. Now, that focus on security is being forced to make concessions for peace, just as the Arabs are being forced to overlook past injustices for the same goal.

This peace process has been making steady progress since the Camp David Accords between Israel and Egypt in 1978. Egypt was the first of Israel's Arab neighbors to recognize the state and sign a peace agreement. Next was Jordan in a 1994 treaty.

Now, with the opportunity for a Palestinian State and peace with Syria, the region has its best chance yet for stability. The last snags holding up any deal are significant but workable.

To make peace with the Palestinians, Israel needs to offer a contiguous Palestinian State in the West Bank and all or most of the Gaza Strip. Prime Minister Barak has hinted that this is possible and has even conceded that Arab suburbs of Jerusalem could be included in such a deal. Compromises on both sides are necessary, but an accelerated effort is expected to meet the deadline for a final agreement by September.

Peace with Syria is tied to many concerns, from water demands to the Lebanese pullout. Israel has occupied a security buffer zone inside Lebanon since 1985. Iranian-backed Hezbollah guerrillas and the Syrian-dominated Lebanese government have fought their occupation. Now Israel has agreed to withdraw unilaterally from the zone by July. This move was at first unexpectedly criticized by the Syrian government, but it should remove one impediment to the Israeli-Syrian negotiations that were halted in January.

The next major obstacle for peace with Syria is the Golan Heights. The area was taken from Syria in the 1967 war. Israel has agreed to withdraw from the majority of the Golan to a 1923 border that maintains Israel's possession of the Sea of Galilee. Syria, however, has demanded the return of the entire Golan to the 1967 border that gives a portion of the Sea of Galilee's northeast shore to Syria. Israel's opposition to such a border stems from the fact that one third of Israel's water supply comes from the Sea of Galilee, and they wish to protect their water rights, and the watershed that feeds this all-important reservoir.

A top mediator between Syria and Israel has suggested that a compromise is possible. Syria's demand is for the land, not the water supply, which would be uneconomical to pump into their own lands. If Israel would concede land up to the Galilee shore, special arrangements may be possible to protect Israel's water supply.

With peace within reach, both sides must be willing to make compromises to end the conflict so detrimental to the region. No solution will be ideal to all parties, but a genuine agreement could work towards eliminating the violence and establishing beneficial relationships. Through mutual cooperation, great advances could be made to the prosperity of the countries involved, in particular toward a future Palestinian State. Both peoples should be able to appreciate the importance of a nation of one's own, and the dedication needed to see it grow.

The alternative is continued hostilities damaging to all sides. This possibility is still highly likely as Palestinian negotiators are calling for a return of the entire West Bank to include East Jerusalem and Israeli settlers continue to pressure the government to refuse any land concessions that they believe to be their right. The years of hatred and mistrust may even be justified, and land demands are invaluable to those who claim them, but a choice must be made to compromise rather than continue fighting.

Taiwan trapped in security dilemma

By Bryan D. Smith
Collegian Staff

Chinese people are up in arms after the stunning election of Chen Shui-ban. Taiwan's new President. They feel threatened by his Democratic Progressive Party's pro-independence stance that could possibly re-ignite the 51-year-old Chinese civil war. Chinese leaders say that they will wait to see what Chen does, but also have warned that they will attack if Taiwan declares independence.

The problem arises because China declares Taiwan as a province. With Taiwan being a province of China it falls under the rule of the mainland. This age-old war of words (threats of secrity) has come to a head with the election of Chen as ruler of the Taiwanese peoples.

The issue of China and Taiwan brings about the notion of the right to be sovereign. Not sovereign in the sense that WalMart or Nike may be, rather the idea that Taiwan functions as a nation-state. It incorporates many of the same political and social issues that are occurring in Palestine, a war that has been going on for quite some time now with no apparent sign of ceasing.

What gives Taiwan the right to be sovereign? A stable government? Years of Chinese oppression? A separate economy from China? All of these things and more give Taiwan the option to be sovereign, but not the right.

Taiwan must take into account how powerful of a nation that China is and decide whether or not it is in their best interest to declare independence from the 'mother land.' Although Taiwan functions as if it were a separate entity from China it has not had to endure any major outside threats because of its ties to China. It has always been known to other states that the island is protected by China and it would not be wise to invade had the opportunity risen.

This brings us to the issue of the security dilemma. If Taiwan does declare its independence, China has already threatened to attack. Its security ways in the wings of whether or not China will actually follow through with its plans for attack. Not only does it raise the issue of the security dilemma, it brings forth the idea of the prisoner's dilemma as well. Both the prisoner's dilemma and the security dilemma bring forth the notion of whether Taiwan, as a sovereign state, will be able to survive threats from the interior as well as from the outside.

The island has to decide whether to leave its protectorate and face the threat of attack, which could lead to a devastation of much of its resources and people or to remain oppressed and suffer under Chinese rule. It also has to decipher if it will not be invaded by other states since it would no longer be protected by the most populated nation in the world.

Can Taiwan survive on its own? Only time may tell if it can or cannot, but by electing Chen to office it is a step in the direction of forming a stable government in hopes that it will be able to survive as a separate entity. With all of the threats of its security and its oppression by China for years Taiwan has the incentive to declare its independence. The question now is only if and when they will do it.

Iran's Government Bans Newspapers

By Matt Foster

The current Iranian government, under the leadership of Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has banned 14 reformist newspapers and effectively shut down the free speech stance taken by current president Mohammed Khatami.

The 14 newspapers included such largely circulated papers as Fath, Asr-e Azadegan, Aban, Arya and Aftab-e Emrouz.

The country's news service, IRNA, released a statement stating that the papers printed articles that "disparaged Islam and the religious elements of the Islamic revolution." according to an article released by Reuter's news service.

The statement went on to say that the stories printed "brought smiles to the faces" of Islamic reformers and that they "hurt the feelings of devout Muslims at home and even the leader of the Islamic revolution."

Three journalists have also been arrested for alleged anti-Islamic writing. Mashallah Shamsolvaezin and Akbar Ganji were both imprisoned following convictions of defamation against the Islamic religion and the Iranian government.

Latif Safari, director of the pro-reform newspaper Nehat, was also arrested, according to an article published by the L.A. Times yesterday.

According to the article, president Khamenei has the support of the people, but because the conservative anti-reform group holds power in certain tactical areas, such as the state run television media, the police force, and the military.

Last week, the head of Iran's Revolutionary Guards released a statement in which they said would dole out "blows to the skull" to any revolutionary, writer or otherwise who would try to endorse "American-style reform" in the country.

Hope for the reformist party lies in the fact that the new parliament will be ushered in on May 28. The parliament is expected to be upwards of 70 percent reformers.

There still are, however, 65 seats in the parliament that have yet to be decided, and the Guardian Council, a conservative group responsible for controlling elections, among other things, has not set a date for this election.

The council also states that there is to be a revivifying of the previous elections votes from Tehran, where 29 of 30 seats went to reform candidates.

In a letter given to a fellow reporter shortly before his arrest, Safari states: "I choose to go to prison and serve an illegal sentence in order to unmask those who incessantly break the law," according to the L.A. Times article. He also stated that he wished "the true face of the court and its judge, where verdicts are decided in advance, will be denounced."

Today's global security: Are nukes necessary?

The history of international relations in this country is long and wrought with conflict. From the Boston Tea Party to the Spanish American War to the World Wars all the way to the Gulf War, the United States has dealt with some major ideological and economic dilemmas.

The difference between the problems of the American Revolution and today's conflicts go far beyond just the technological advancements of the industrial and information revolution. The biggest difference between the wars of today and the wars of yester-year is the fact that today we have the possibility to destroy the entire planet.

We're talking about nuclear weapons. Today's college community does not come from the generation of the Cold War. We are the children of the McCarthy generation. We do not have fallout shelters in our basements. We do not have the fear of the communists. We were all watching in youthful amazement the destruction of the Berlin Wall and the dissolve of the Soviet Empire.

Catherine Turner

However, though the interests driving foreign affairs have matured from independence to stability and globalization, there are remnants of a more irrational stance in foreign policy. Nuclear weapons have not followed the rest of the Cold War trends by disappearing into the proverbial sunset, but have in fact continued to thrive and reproduce. Now more countries than ever possess the power to completely annihilate the human race, and all other species of the Earth as well. Is there something wrong with this picture? Yes.

Just yesterday, the U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan spoke in a conference of nations on the importance of reducing nuclear stockpiles. Many treaties have been passed, yet not followed regarding the existence of these devastating missiles.

Plenty of non-nuclear countries have expressed their concerns with nuclear armament. Plenty of nuclear states have also responded to the call for anti-ballistic missiles and warhead stockpiling. But it seems that the more cries there are to get rid of nukes, the less is being done about it.

How can steps be taken to disarm when countries as powerful as our own United States won't even step up to lead in disarmament?

Though it is a goal of the Clinton administration to reduce nuclear possession and cease nuclear testing in other countries, it is blatantly supporting a security dilemma that has been the foundation for plenty of conflicts or potential strife for years by not agreeing to unload some of its own weapons.

Basically the U.S. is once again telling the world that there are different rules for the U.S. than there are for everyone else.

Organizations such as the International Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War and The British-American Security Information Council have long campaigned for the United Nations to put pressure on nuclear states to control their arms. And though everyone can agree that disarmament doesn't happen overnight, critics are right on with their complaints that it is taking too long and there are too many double standards within the United Nations.

Clinton and newly-elected Russian President Vladimir Putin have begun talks to reduce warheads, but refuse to agree to completely destroy nuclear weapons. Meanwhile, countries such as India and Pakistan are jumping on the bandwagon, not only testing the bombs, but racing to aquire more. Where has this left the state of the world?

There are certainly wars waging in the world today, and we're lucky that we're not too close to another World War, but who knows when the next time the U.S. will step on toes and we'll have a nuclear warhead will be pointed at the Heartland. And don't forget that it doesn't take a nuke landing on American soil to murder the human race-if a nuke falls somewhere in the world, eventually we will experience the consequences. Perhaps it is time to rethink our ideas on "global security." Does stability really require nuclear weapons? No.

Your Guide to all that's going on in the Pioneer Valley

Bosstones' Carr makes himself heard

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

On May 2, 2000, the Mighty Mighty Bosstones plan to release the follow up album to 1996's incredible Let's Face It. I recently had the great fortune to talk to Ben Carr, a member of the Mighty Mighty Bosstones regarding his views about the new album, preforming live, and of course the true meaning of playing in New England, where the band calls home. It came as no surprise that the crazy dancing member of the Mighty Mighty Bosstones had quite a bit to say.

The Mighty Mighty Bosstones have a very strong fan following in the New England area, especially in Massachusetts. I asked Carr what it was like to play in Massachusetts as opposed to the rest of the country. Last year, The Mighty Mighty Bosstones headlined the Spring Concert, the biggest show of the year at UMass. Carr said, "Playing in Mass is great. Anywhere in new England is great. Playing Umass is fun. I had a lot of friends who went there. I'd go party and catch the spring flings as an audience member." He said that besides New England, he just loves to play in the United States. He really likes to play larger clubs "where people have the room to dance if they want to, but if they want to sit down and enjoy the show, they can do that too."

Carr said that some of the Boston bands such as Fishbone, Madness and The Flys have had a very big impact on their music. He said that they grew up listening to, and supporting the Massachusetts hardcore scene, which has helped produce the music that the band creates today.

Carr was asked if the band was moving away from ska and punk, because much of the new album is very much pop. He said, "As we get older and better as song writers, the pop-rock stuff comes out more. There's a lot of ska and real hardcore songs. We wrote thirty songs and put the best sixteen on the album. I don't think that we had a conscious effort for things to go that way (towards pop). It just happened."

The band is apparently very proud of the new album and what it has to offer. Carr was even bold enough to proclaim that it is better than Let's Face It. He said he loved the first album, but he truly thought that the new one was better. He said that the songs on the new albums are much more cohesive, and more thought was put into them, so they were done right. He touched on the success of Let's Face It by saying, "Especially with the media, with a successful album, you need to back it up. I think the new album does that. We did the best album that we could, and hopefully the fans will still like it. If it goes big that's great, but as long as the people we care about enjoy it, we'll be happy."

He said that with a single as huge as "The Impression That I Get," from Let's Face It, it will be very hard to keep up the momentum that was set. He said "Our ammo has always been, 'do what we do.' We're not the type of band that says, 'this song was huge, we have to copy it."

He said that the fan response has been quite good for the new album. He was asked by another journalist to comment on a show that the band played last week, and he noted that, "Even though it's early, we feel very confident. The set list is limited to stuff that we know very well, but by the end of the tour we'll have our whole repertoire back. The audience really enjoyed the new ones." Besides the album the band is also working on at least one video. Carr said that making videos was not that valuable because of the importance of their live performance. He stressed that they are a live band and their big thing is to tour and play in front of crowds.

He said that the main message on the new album was completely created by lead singer Dickie Barret. "Dickie writes the lyrics, and whatever he's saying and whatever it means to you is what we want you to get from it."

Someone asked Carr, "What's the deal with that guy in the band who just dances around at the concerts?" The reporter apparently didn't do his homework, because he didn't realize that he was speaking to that exact man. Carr said, "That's me! When started out in the mid 80's we were all underage, and I didn't play any instruments. To get into the clubs you had to be 21, so they used to say that I was in the band to get around it. I just sort of ended up in the band as a dancer. Kind of like the English ska bands of the 80's. My main role on the new record is to appear at the live shows. Dancing doesn't really come off on the albums. I don't do song writing, but I'm there during the writing process to lend a hand during the whole thing."

The Bosstones are currently gearing up to play the Van's Warp Tour this summer, which includes a stop at Suffolk Downs in Boston. The extensive tour is highlighted by such acts as Green Day and The Long Beach Duh All-Stars. It should again prove to be one of the biggest tours of the year. Carr is really looking forward to it. He says that "It's much more different than normal festivals. Ticket prices are low, and our main fan base are people that would be going to the warp tour already. It's a lot of fun."

He also noted that the current ska scene is a little bit disappointing. "It's hard to tell because there are always cycles of music. Ska was big a few years ago back and a few bands got a lot of airplay. I don't know where a lot of those bands are now, but I don't think that ska is radio friendly anymore."

The band has had some very interesting aspects to progressing to national stardom. Alicia Silverstone has showed exceptional interest in the band. One of the first places that the country was introduced to the Bosstones was on the soundtrack of the 1995 film, Clueless. The soundtrack proved to be excellent. I asked Carr if he had ever met Silverstone, and what being on the soundtrack meant to their success. He said "At the time neither song ("Where Did You Go?" and "Noise Brigade") were on the radio, so it didn't really do anything for that. It didn't make our presence any bigger or anything. It was a fun thing to be involved with though, and we got to meet her at the shooting of the movie."

Whether they are represented on albums and film soundtracks, kicking it with the Warp Tour, or at their annual weekly Christmas concert at the Middle East in Boston, it's clear that the Mighty Mighty Bosstones are going to continue to make sure that their music is heard. Ben Carr is one of the band's promoters, and he feels very confident that they will continue the huge success that was established with Let's Face It. He has some very positive visions for the new album and the future of the band. However, most of all he wants the fans to realize that regardless of the outcome of the new album, the band will continue to stay close to their roots. There is one thing that is very certain. The people of the New England area, and especially the state of Massachusetts are very proud to call the Mighty Mighty Bosstones our own.

Dreamworks Records

Singer/songwriters in mainstream music are becoming a rare commodity, almost an anachronism, in the face of masses of pop vocalists who write none of their own music and take their cues from greedy corporate stringpullers and producers interested only in replicating the most recent commercial success story. Instances of true, sincere artistry and singular efforts at innovation are blessings, cases even, of musical delight.

Which brings us to Elliott Smith, a singer/songwriter without peer in the landscape of contemporary music. Smith first gained recognition for his extensive contributions to the Good Will Hunting soundtrack, including "Miss Misery," which earned him an Oscar for Best Original Song. That same year (1998), he released XO, his fourth solo album and 14 tracks of meticulously crafted acoustic rock. Smith plays nearly every instrument himself – he began piano lessons at age 10 and received his first guitar at age 11 – and although the acoustic guitar forms the backbone of his music, instruments are layered until a full-band texture emerges.

Smith's fifth and latest album, Figure 8, continues this textural exploration across 16 new tracks. Whereas XO and earlier albums were populated by songs primarily written for acoustic guitar and then fleshed out in the studio, Figure 8 feels more comfortable with its own multi-textural nature: songs using an electric guitar as a centerpiece sound like they were written on that instrument, and not simply adapted from an acoustic composition.

The album opens with "Son of Sam," an energetic song which marries perfectly the bite of an electric guitar with Smith's impressive piano work. Following this is "Somebody That I Used to Know," a quick, clever acoustic song about a relationship gone sour, and an excellent contrast to the relative bombast of the first track.

Smith's songs are intelligently and maturely composed, using unexpected chord changes and rhythmical peculiarities that set him far apart from mainstream pop and its sea of four-chord-wonder bands.

"Junk Bond Trade" returns Figure 8 to the realm of the piano/electric guitar combination, although leaning much more towards the piano end of the equation than "Son of Sam." The variety of songwriting and production styles represented by just the first three tracks is astounding, and the remaining 13 tracks continue to widen the circle of Smith's musical ambition, with barely a weak moment discernible anywhere.

The most problematic aspect of Smith's music is, in fact, his singing, which can be stretched slightly too thin at times. He sings in a simple coffee shop style which brings to mind such notable singer/songwriter teams as Simon and Garfunkle, and Crosby, Still, Nash, and Young. (And Smith often records and layers multiple vocal tracks for a single song, making the comparison even more striking.) The understated flavor of Smith's vocals rarely become a true hindrance to the music, however, and allow the listener to appreciate better the instrumental showmanship at work.

It would be no hyperbole to call Smith a songwriting genius. That he has managed to release a 16-track album of such supreme consistency a mere two years after his last, equally impressive 14 track album is a magnificent feat, to be certain, and I cannot recommend his music strongly enough. It's rock for the discriminating listener. A

Classical music in trouble

By Philip Kennicott
The Washington Post

BMG Classics, once a powerhouse of the classical music recording industry, is being gutted in a major reorganization of the recording labels owned by the German entertainment giant Bertelsmann.

In its heyday a decade ago, BMG Classics – better known in America under its imprints RCA Victor Red Seal and RCA Victor – released several hundred recordings a year, featuring major box-office artists such as Ifutist James Galway and pianist Evgeny Kissin. It also sat upon one of the greatest troves of recorded sound ever assembled, a historic archive that included the recordings of Toscanini, Rubenstein, Heifitz and Van Cliburn. But in recent years it began releasing fewer and fewer recordings and relying more heavily on its archives. With the reorganization, the former giant will be a shadow of its self and even longtime stalwart artists, such as Galway and percussionist Evelyn Glennie, will apparently lose their contracts, according to those close to the company.

The downsizing of BMG Classics is yet more indication that the market for classical music has changed radically over the past two decades. A glut of classical recordings that developed in the late 1980s and early 1990s led to a leaner and more market-oriented approach by the major labels. And those labels that remain in the classical music business today are increasingly focused on their most profitable projects, and no longer willing to subsidize a large stable of artists such as BMG once did.

Industry observers say that as many as 120 employees, including staff at RCA and the New Age/jazz label Windham Hill, could lose their jobs in the reorganization. BMG Classics will cease to exist as an independent label within the larger BMG corporation, and its few remaining artists and corporate staff will be folded into the American-run RCA label, which focuses on popular music. According to one insider, the label could be working with only a handful of classical musicians, with major decisions being made by the company's popular music executives.

That leaves the fate of classical music projects in question. Sources within BMG say that recording projects have already been cancelled – including one by Glennie, but the ultimate fate of the label's core artists – including the King's Singers, conductors Yorin Maazel and Danielle Gatti, cellist Steven Isserlis, Gatway and Glennie – is still unknown.

"We simply don't know yet," says David Kuehn, vice president of marketing for classical music at RCA Red Seal. Kuehn wouldn't confirm details of the reorganization, but sources say he has been struggling to preserve major projects, including the label's critically successful relationship with conductor Michael Tilson Thomas and the San Francisco Symphony.

Label employees and music industry observers say they fear that decisions about projects will be increasingly oriented to the bottom line.

U-571 a gripping WWII adventure with McConaughey's defining role

By Wes Wrighton
Collegian Staff

U-571
directed by Jonathan Mostow with Matthew McConaughey, Harvey Keitel, and Jake Noseworthy
playing at Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield

Man, oh man. This is by far the best film I have reviewed this year. If you are craving edge-of-your-seat suspense, then U-571 is the film for you. This film should establish Matthew McConaughey as a bonafide star capable of carrying an action film.

If you have seen Jonathan Mostow's previous cinematic effort, Breakdown (with Kurt Russell chasing a band of down-on-their-luck hicks who have kidnapped his wife and drive huge semi trucks and communicate via CB radio), then you have the essential ingredients of what type of film U-571 is. Like Breakdown, this film is essentially the same cat-and-mouse idea, only on a larger canvas. There are non-stop emergencies, and plenty of scenarios that have you on the edge of your seat chewing on your fingernails.

The story (in a nutshell) is rather simple. A German U-boat, replete with a secretive code encryption device called The Enigma, is rendered disabled and in need of Axis assistance. The Americans get a hold of this and send a U-boat of their own (disguised as a Nazi U-boat). A team of naval officers are chosen to board the U-boat and get the device in the hand of the Americans. One thing leads to another, and the team assigned to board the German U-boat ends up having to man the submarine and get to safe territory.

The action is non-stop, as McConaughey is always trying to rally his team together in order to avoid the approaching German destroyer. The submarine they command is also beyond repair, as depth charges are unleashed on the U-boat during various times in the film. The movie gets intense. Characters lose their cool. Some forget their place in the chain of command (McConaughey is made senior Executive Officer, much to the dismay of his peers). Basically, these American naval officers are on a boat where nothing is like what they for

The sound in this movie unlike anything I have ever heard. The scenes with the depth charges are loud, and scenes with other explosions are equally loud. You need to see this movie in a great sounding movie theater – the type that has all the digital gadgetry. THX coolness. The sound of the pressure of the ocean pushing down upon the submarine's hull (the creaking and twisting of the metal) is outrageous.

The supporting cast is also very commendable. Especially so is the character played by Jake Noseworthy (Officer Wentzl), he is the glue that binds the team together with his ability to communicate in German (although McConaughey is the official leader). Harvey Keitel does what he can with his role as the Chief-in-Command who has all the respect in the world for McConaughey's Lt. Tyler, and is willing to let him assume the role of the head of the team. All I have to say about Bill Paxton's performance is "wooden." He delivers his dialogue like he has yet to extract the pole from his butt. I'm not something that Paxton does well, and he will forever be recognized as the actor who "is in that movie with all the cool CGI effects" (Twister, Titanic, and Mighty Joe Young). A three-time Regional All-American Lynne Young and a foursome of All-Conference candidates in Melissa Miele, Jessica Passanese, Denise Brey and Colleen Wales.

Responsible for getting the ball in the dark blue net will be Stephanie Pavlick, Fay Naber and Rachel Ingraffea, who was the offensive hero with two goals against Temple. Noelle Gorski and Sara MacNabb are also potentials to score.

"UConn is a very solid team, and we can't worry about what their strengths are," Barnes said. "We have to control what we do as a team, and let our play and style dictate the flow and tempo of the game."

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

With Temple in its wake, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team now turns its head towards archrival UConn, which has never beaten the Minutewomen in their short series.

Harrison, Tillotson pace Minutewomen

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Despite heavy rains, gusty winds and gloomy skies, the Massachusetts women's track team fought to a third place finish in this past Friday's UConn Spring Classic in Storrs, CT.

The Minutewomen scored 120 points as a team, falling well short of winner Connecticut (225 points) and second place finisher Brown (216), but well ahead of last place Southern Connecticut (38).

Senior Sharon Tillotson continued her strong season, turning in a first place finish in the 5,000-meter run with a time of 18:06.88. The Wantagh, NY native came in third in the 3,000-meter run in the opening event of the year at Dartmouth, and finished second in the 3,000 at Brown University last Saturday.

Junior Sharyn Harrison also tallied a victory for the Minutewomen. Her throw of 125' 6" was good enough to hold off her challengers, in what was her first first-place finish this season. It was also her best performance of the season, topping her previous high of 124' even. Her throw was strong enough to qualify her for the New England Championships at the end of this season.

The javelin was undoubtedly the Maroon and White's strongest event, as sophomore Noelle Giffune came in second, while freshman Amy Stilphen's throw was good enough for a third place finish in the event.

Last week Giffune also finished second in the javelin with a throw of 122' 3", which at the time was good enough for second place on the all-time UMass charts.

Other star performers included junior Chrystal Murphy, whose time of 15.10 seconds in the 100-meter high hurdles landed her a second place finish, and Rhianna DeCruz, who missed topping her school record leap by two inches, finishing second in the pole vault with a leap of 11' even.

Last week, DeCruz notched her school record with a leap of 11' 2" last week in the Minutewomen's meet at Brown. That score was good enough for a tie for second place in that meet.

In the first meet of the season, Murphy finished second, again in the 100-meter high hurdles, with a time of 14.80 seconds, slightly faster than this weekend's performance.

The Maroon and White had their Saturday meet, in which they were scheduled to face Brown, Princeton, Providence and UConn, cancelled due to the storms that were left over from Friday.

The team will be in action again this Thursday and Friday, as it takes part in the high-status Penn Relays in Philadelphia.

Devo whipping Dodgers into shape

By Jason Reid
Los Angeles Times

CINCINNATI – Devon White doesn't want the spotlight on himself, preferring to discuss the team's performance.

Others are commenting about the center fielder's strong start, which has helped the Los Angeles Dodgers start well too.

"Devo has been great for me," said Manager Davey Johnson, who gave White the day off Saturday. "I needed him to bat leadoff for me, and he's done a good job. That's been a big part of it (the Dodgers' success)."

White has batted first in 14 of the club's 17 games. He is batting .286 (16 for 54) with three home runs, nine runs batted in and 10 runs.

He has also played well defensively, showing flashes of the form that helped him earn seven Gold Glove awards. But White wants to remain in the background after his tumultuous 1999 season.

The switch-hitter was criticized by Dodger officials and fans for seemingly uninspired play during his first season with the club. The Dodgers tried to trade White during the off-season.

White underwent off-season shoulder surgery, keeping his pain private last season.

In spring training, he had to battle Todd Hollandsworth for playing time.

This season, White has done what the organization has asked of him, accepting that Hollandsworth will play often too. White's teammates are impressed with his performance and attitude.

"Devo is the perfect player to have on a team because his whole concept is about winning," left fielder Gary Sheffield said.

"Some people might not know that about Devo, but the way he goes about his business, it's all about just trying to win."

White was a key member of three World Series championship clubs. He said this edition of the Dodgers has potential.

"The Dodgers are winning this year because of the way the team was constructed," he said. "Our bench is good, our bullpen is good and we've got more balance in the lineup.

"Really, it's never about one player, no matter what people think. One player isn't responsible for the team winning or losing, it's all about the entire team."

Women's crew takes home fifth-straight A-10 championship

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

By no means was it a surprise, but rounding up five consecutive conference championships has got to be rewarded with immeasureable credit.

On Saturday, the Massachusetts women's crew team finally could call it a fistful, that is, a fistful of Bell Atlantic Atlantic 10 championships. The Minutewomen reeled in their fifth straight women's rowing title on the Cooper River in Collingswood, N.J.

Compiling a total of 49 points, UMass easily outdistanced the nearest contender, George Washington, this after the G.W. Invitational was cancelled two weeks prior due to World Trade Organization protests in the nation's capital. The Minutewomen did, however, get their shot at the Colonials, defeating them by over four seconds in the varsity 8 final to secure 10 points.

The Maroon and White won three of nine races, including the quad final, which they took home with a time of 7:54.4, eight seconds quicker than second-place Rhode Island. In addition, the 2nd varsity 8 squad defeated the Colonials by 21.6 seconds, capturing gold by completing the race in 7:16.6.

George Washington stayed close with tremendous performances from its novice squads. The Colonials equaled the Minutewomen's win total, but the novice races carried less weight than the varsity showdowns. One of GW's wins came in the Novice 8-A Final, which allowed the Colonials to pick up just a point on UMass, who finished second with a time of 7:49.1. George Washington also took home top honors in the Novice 8-B and the Novice 4 events.

The lightweight lineup for UMass really did the Colonials in. Despite not having picked up a victory, two of UMass' four second place finishes came by way of lightweight events, the lightweight 4 and the lightweight 8 finals. The Maroon and White picked up two points on GW in the lightweight 4, finishing in 8:40.4, nearly 20 seconds faster than the D.C. travelers.

Temple, who had a miserable day for the most part, found some reward in taking the Varsity 4 final, nipping La Salle at the finish line by under a second. It marked the first time a crew from Temple had ever won a final at the A-10s. Dayton and St. Joseph's also picked up victories, but neither seriously challenged for the title, despite moral victories being scored. Dayton won its first final since 1996 and St Joe's its first since '97, tying for third with 26 points. Meanwhile, the Owls' and Rhode Island brought in 12 points apiece, good for a tie for fifth.

Although no meet records were eclipsed, the Minutewomen captured an unprecedented fifth straight conference title. The ringleader, head coach Jim Dietz, a four-time winner of the Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year Award, was snubbed in favor of George Washington's Steve Peterson.

With Griff, Reds getting rained on in showery April

Instead of inflicting pain, the Cincinnati Reds have seen a whole lot of red themselves. And it's given rise to some commotion in River City.

With the acquisition of Ken Griffey Jr. in the offseason, the Cincinnati Reds immediately made themselves a contender in the National League. Without an ace in the starting rotation, Cincinnati would simply pound the ball until the opponents' pitcher's arm fell off.

Pokey Reese is quickly becoming the Senior Circuit's best second baseman not named Craig Biggio. He's done everything in his power to set the stage for an offensive eruption at the 3-4-5 spots, leading the NL with a .382 average. On top of that, his strikeouts are down, and his seven stolen bases make for immediate run-scoring opportunities.

Major League Baseball

The Reds, though, stand in second place in the Central Division, with much of the blame being directed at the middle of the lineup, which hasn't been producing. Barry Larkin's 3-4 week stint on the disabled list due to torn tissue on the middle finger of his glove hand only makes matters worse. His replacement? Gookie Dawkins, who hit .283 with three homers and seven RBI with Double A affiliate Chattanooga before being called up for Saturday's 16-2 Dodgers rout.

Griffey's banged out five homers, but his .203 average has him battling for position with the infamous Mario Mendoza. Sure, the Kid will come around. But Dante Bichette's Coors Field withdrawal hasn't helped, nor has Sean Casey's lingering pain in his right thumb, which he broke at the end of spring training.

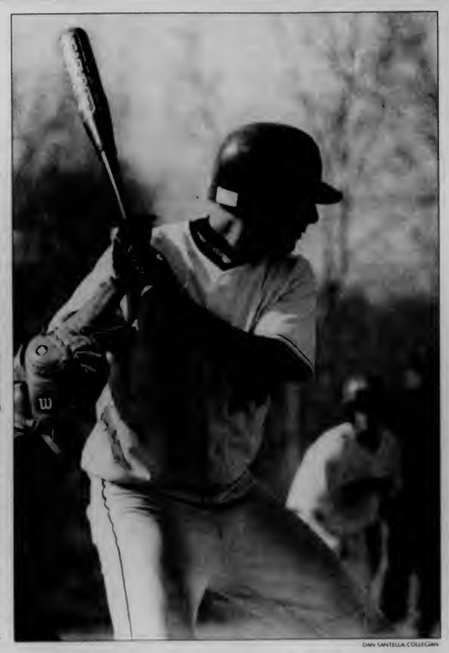
It wasn't supposed to work this way. Manager Jack McKeon knew his rotation was suspect from the beginning, fielding injury-prone Pete Harnisch and Denny Neagle as the staff's aces, which won't take a team far. In addition to the two veterans, Ron Villone and Steve Parris have made poor impressions in April after breakthrough seasons.

The result has been an atrocious showing on the mound, posting a 5.85 ERA, which lands the Reds' staff ahead of only the Astros and Cubs in the National League. On top of that, it's yielded 101 walks, easily baseball's worst. Cincinnati's 3-game sweep at the hands of the Dodgers can only be blamed on its shoddy rotation, which helped Los Angeles to 36 runs and 37 hits on the weekend.

How bad has it gotten? Mark Wohlers is pitching batting practice in preparation for a hitter return.

Harnisch's struggles are probably the most documented. With an aching shoulder that Harnisch claims is fine, he's managed a 9.64 ERA in three starts, which includes Saturday's collapse, where he was eventually knocked out of the game when Chan Ho Park doubled home two runs in the fifth. This is the same Harnisch who won a team-high 16 games last season.

Luckily enough for Cincinnati, only the St. Louis Cardinals have been able to muster much of anything. Griffey's slow start was expected, switching leagues which, in turn, forces him to adjust to a pitcher-friendly strike zone. Bichette's might have been as well, but critics believe Coors Field made the '98 hit leader the player that he is, or was. The Rockies' grad hit just .273 on the road the last five seasons, hardly worth the $14 million he'll reel in the next two years.



The Reds can't afford to be a middle-of-the-pack team on offense. With the aforementioned mediocrity on the hill, McKeon waits patiently for Griffey to explode, because realistically, no World Series will be one with that staff. Twenty-three year-old Rob Bell's been a pleasant surprise, compiling a 1-1 record with a 3.00 ERA heading into today's start against the Mets. Even the bullpen has been satisfying, led by Danny Graves and Scott Sullivan. Dennys Reyes is a wreck and Scott Williamson is showing hints of a sophomore slump, but it's the rotation that's chewing off the fingernails, leaving the offense swinging for the fences by the end of the third.

Yes, they will start hitting and balls with fly out of Cinergy Field like Bengals' chucker Jeff Blake trying to hit Darnay Scott, but it's a proven fact that pitching wins not only baseball games, but also championships. And the Reds simply don't have any of it in the cards.

Where are the Nasty Boys when you need them?

Granted, it's early, but August's trade deadline is already marked on the Reds' calendar. Or at least it better be.

Junior outfielder Nick Gorneault singled with two outs in the first and went on to score the first of UMass' four runs against Boston College yesterday.

Reedy, UMass drill BC

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

With one down in the top of the ninth inning, Boston College first baseman Stephen Langone launched a solo home run over the left field fence of McCoy Stadium.

But it was all for naught.

By the ninth frame, the final chapter had already been written by freshman Pat Reedy and the Massachusetts baseball team, who secured a 4-1 victory for the Minutemen in the first round of this year's version of the Beanpot Baseball Classic.

UMass	4
BC	1

"First, I'm just happy that we won," Reedy said. "It's good to get a win and now we get to play in the championship game of the Beanpot."

With two outs in the bottom of the first inning, junior Nick Gorneault singled off Eagle starting pitcher Jaime Quiros and immediately stole second. Chris Morgan, who walked in the previous at-bat, stood at third base as senior Kevin O'Connell made his way to the batter's box. O'Connell promptly lined an RBI single to the gap in left-center, driving in Morgan for the first run of the game. Sophomore Aaron Senez followed O'Connell's base knock with a rope of his own, this time a pulled single right down the left field line to bring in Gourneault and give UMass a two-run lead.

In the bottom of the second inning, senior Shaun Skeffington drew a walk, and then skipped easily over to second for his 18th stolen base of the season. Mike Kulak followed with a routine pop fly to left field that would be dropped by Boston College leftfielder Neal McCarthy, allowing Skeffington the easy tally.

The error occurred due to loose footing that was the result of a couple days of cold precipitation.

The inning could have been more prosperous for UMass, but the Eagles caught the Minutemen in the middle of a suicide-squeeze attempt with only one out in the frame. After Gavin Clark reached on a walk, he proceeded to steal both second and third on consecutive pitches. Next up for the Maroon and White was Skeffington, the key element to "the squeeze."

The Eagles, however, foresaw coach Mike Stone's trickery and countered with a pitch-out that sent a reaching Skeffington to the ground and a scrambling Clark to the dugout.

UMass added another run in the bottom half of the fifth inning, when O'Connell singled to center field to score Gorneault, upping the score to 4-0. Gorneault walked to reach base and was moved to third on a single to right by Morgan. Langone's round-tripper in the ninth brought the final score to 4-1.

Reedy, in his second start ever for the Minutemen, paced through the Eagle lineup, failing to let up a run through the first eight innings of play. He was able to compile the first complete-game of his collegiate career, striking out two Boston College batters while only allowing one run on five hits. He used the fastball, curveball and change-up to baffle the Eagle lineup. It was his mastery of the change-up, however, that kept the Eagle swordsmen on their toes.

"The change-up was my out-pitch today," Reedy said. "I mean the whole day I had the hitters leaning on their front foot."

Reedy was also helped by the plate umpire, who was pretty lenient when it came down to pitches ending up a few extra inches to the outside of the strike zone.

"It was good because I was hitting the inside corner, too," Reedy said. "And I didn't have to worry about the umpire calling strikes."

Leading the UMass offense was Senez, who went 3-for-4 on the afternoon while plating one run and O'Connell, who went 2-for-3 and brought in two Minuteman runners.

With the victory, the Minutemen march into today's championship game to find themselves in a title fight with the Northeastern Huskies at Fenway Park.

The two teams met earlier this year with Northeastern taking the pie, 8-6. In that game played on April 13th, UMass took a 6-4 lead into the bottom half of the sixth inning only to see a grand slam dash its hopes of conquest.

It should be a different story today when the Minutemen (17-15-1) bring a confident offensive attack, along with a more than rested pitching staff, to the storied Boston ballpark.

The first pitch is scheduled to be thrown at 2 PM. Boston College (27-14) will face Harvard in a consolation game today that will begin at 11 AM. Harvard (15-17) fell to Northeastern (16-12), yesterday, 7-5.

Rival UConn next to step up after Temple win

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

What does the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team do now?

What monumental feat must the Minutewomen accomplish after being the first Atlantic 10 opponent to defeat Temple in the short history of the league? What mountain must UMass climb after beating the No. 18 Owls, who it hadn't beaten in 20 years, to pull itself up into a tie for first place in the conference at 4-1 even after struggling through a 2-5 non-conference start?

How about going to Storrs, Conn., and defeating their archrivals, the Connecticut Huskies?

Sure, statistically speaking, it wouldn't be much of a feat. Unlike in basketball, Massachusetts is not an underdog against UConn in women's lacrosse – in fact, the Minutewomen hosted the Huskies a year ago and sent them home on the humble end of a 13-4 route.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Rachel Ingraffea

A year earlier, in Connecticut's first year in women's lacrosse, UMass went down to Storrs to personally welcome them to the sport with a 17-4 shellacking.

With that in mind, a win today at Morrone Stadium wouldn't be much of a mountain at all. It would, however, feel good.

"UConn is the state school rival, and we end up recruiting a lot of the same kids," UMass coach Phil Barnes said. "It would be a tremendous win."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Jen Nardi

The Minutewomen's earlier success against the Huskies is convincing, but doesn't make the scoreboard read anything other than 0-0 when the game begins today.

"They're in a similar spot to where our program was a couple years ago," Barnes said. "They're building, and they're doing a great job on all ends of the field. Their players are really stepping up and they're having a great season."

A fact that does not go unrecognized by UConn, which is, by far, a more accomplished team than it was a year ago. Connecticut has posted a 9-5 record so far, and has averaged an eye-popping 13.8 goals a game, including six showings of 17 points or more.

This scoring can be narrowed down, primarily, to four players: Pamela Lowie, with 37 total points, Heather Lewins, with 31 points, and Heather Bliss and Abby Morgan with 30 points apiece.

"We have been talking about how good UConn is for a week now," Barnes said. "The kids are very clear on the fact that UConn is a different team than they have been in year's past, and that they're not to be taken lightly."

Unlike other high-scoring opponents that the Minutewomen have faced off against, like Duquesne, Connecticut hasn't just victimized a weak schedule, even though it can be noted that the Husky itinerary has included Wagner, Sacred Heart, Quinnipiac and Fairfield.

"They scored a lot of goals against Boston University, 11, and I think they scored 17 against Notre Dame," Barnes said. "The game will be about their offense against our defense. UConn is a solid team all around."

The UMass defense held the aforementioned Dukes to only a goal, and stifled the Owls to the tune of only three goals allowed.

Minutewoman goalie Jen Nardi has established herself as an impregnable force, finishing 1999 as the nation's top netminder, and is currently ranked atop the A-10. To even make it to Nardi, the Huskies will have to get past

Robustelli busts out in twin softball routs

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

Oh baby.

That was about the only thing that the fans of the Massachusetts softball team could say after watching the Minutewomen completely crush the La Salle Explorers 9-0 and 11-0 in a doubleheader in Philadelphia. The wins improved UMass's record to a decent 22-19 (8-2 Atlantic 10), and dropped La Salle to a pitiful 8-37 (1-9 A-10). It was the sixth win in a row for the surging Maroon and White and was also the team's seventh win in their last eight games, dating back to April 15, A 5-4 heartbreaking defeat at the hands of St. Joseph's was the only loss for the Minutewomen over that span.

In the first game, UMass got things going quickly in the top of the first when freshman pitching ace Kaila Holtz showed that she can hit almost as well as she can pitch by driving in Emily Robustelli and Teri Rooney with a single to center. It would be all the runs that the Minutewomen would need as Holtz went the distance, striking out seven and giving up only one hit in her five innings of work. She did not walk a batter, and improved to 11-6 on the year with the win.

UMass was able to score two more runs in the second inning when left fielder Kiley Scofield reached on an error and later came across to score. Freshman outfielder Anna Perey scampered home for the second run of the inning on Rooney's sacrifice fly, this after putting her 4-foot-11 frame to good use by drawing a walk.

A five-run third inning put the game away for the Minutewomen as Ashley Bakken, Cherra Wheeler, Kerri Landers, Perey and Scofield all scored solo runs. From there, the Maroon and White coasted for the last two innings of the game behind the pitching of Holtz, and easily collected the 9-0 victory. Holtz, Brandi Cross and Bakken all picked up two hits on the game, and the Minutewomen were able to benefit from five costly La Salle errors. Missy Borke went the distance for the Explorers despite the fact that she gave up 10 hits and nine runs in five innings.

Surprisingly, things would only get easier for UMass when the second game of the doubleheader rolled around. The Minutewomen exploded for 10 runs in the top of the first behind the hitting of a young lineup that is only improving with age and experience. Cross drove in Robustelli for the first run of the game with a single to center, and Rooney was able to score the second run of the game when La Salle shortstop Winter Eastmond booted an easy grounder. Cross and Holtz came around to score the third and fourth runs of the inning when the next hitter, catcher Nikki Faessler, lined a double to left-center.

Later on in the inning the Explorers continued their sloppy play when Wheeler scored on an error by the centerfielder, and Faessler came home on a wild pitch. This made the score 6-0. When Robustelli stepped to the plate for her second at-bat of the inning, she blasted a double that brought home both Perey and outfielder Debbie Tomoguchi. For the grand finale, Rooney crushed her second home run of the year to make the score 10-0, completely blow the game open before La Salle even had a chance to send a single hitter to the plate. Finally, the Explorers were able to get out of the inning, but to put it lightly, the damage had already been done.

In the fourth inning UMass added its final run of the game when seldom used junior Rachel Parziale drove in Bakken with an RBI single.

On the mound for the Minutewomen in the second game of the doubleheader was junior Carrie Jeffries. She did benefit from 11 runs of offensive support, but was also able to match Holtz by throwing a one-hitter of her own. Her final stats included four strikeouts and two walks in five innings of work.

It wasn't the prettiest of games, but the Minutewomen scored two as infielder Kiley Scofield reached on a throwing error, helping UMass to a 9-0 win in game one.

What is the future of our global environment? This is a question that six experts in environmental research, science and activism posed last night in a forum celebrating the 30th anniversary of Earth Day.

The event held in Mahar Auditorium featured keynote speaker Dr. Barry Commoner, a man Time Magazine has hailed the "Paul Revere of Ecology" and the Earth Times has called one of the "100 Who Made A Difference."

Since the 1950s, according to the forum pamphlet, Dr. Commoner has worked in nearly every phase of the environmental movement "including opposition to nuclear weapons testing in the 1950s, the science information movement of the 1960s, the energy debates of the 1970s, as well as organic farming and pesticides, waste management and recycling, and the toxic chemical issues of the 1980s and 1990s." He has written several books including: The Closing Circle, The Poverty of Power and Making Peace With the Planet.

His talk focused on unnatural organic chemicals and biotechnology. Using the Inuit of the Canadian province Nunavut at an example, he successfully showed how man-made organic chemicals are harmful to humans and remain in the environment indefinitely and how governments know the harmfulness of such chemicals, but refuse to acknowledge the situation. Dr. Commoner explained how PCBs were created in 1929, and by 1932 the negative effects of human contact with such chemicals were published in the Medical Journal. Nonetheless, it was not until the 1970s that PCBs were outlawed in the United States.

PCBs as unnatural organic compounds, Dr. Barry Commoner explained, remain in the environment because of the fact that they are carbon-based and thus join in the ecosystem. He referred to human tampering with organic compounds as creating "evolutionary rejects." Thus, the after effects are felt today in the Canadian arctic, where the Inuit people face the dilemma of leaving their culture because they can no longer hunt and eat the animals on their land. PCB contamination, is causing low newborn birth weights. The amazing thing is that the closest PCB source was over 1,000 miles from their territory, the prime source being the United States.

"We have been totally irresponsible with our mis-use of [science], and we're suffering the consequences," he said further commenting that with biotechnology and genetic engineering we are, "in the process of [again] violating this precept [of natural vs. unnatural]."

He also disproved some myths dealing with biotechnology, speaking of the sheep-based virus related to mad cow disease that has no nucleic acid base. In January it was discovered that the "scraps virus" is a pure protein, with no RNA or DNA. He went on to say that human dabbling with DNA is as unpredictable as our present work with man-made organic compounds, and that the general public needs to be made aware of the facts.

"By educating ourselves we can prevent what will much more damage the earth," Commoner concluded.

Other forum speakers included Professor William Manning, "the Associate Director of the Plant Biology Graduate Program and Editor-in-Chief of the journal Environmental Pollution," Christine Lindstrom, a field organizer for MASSPIRG, Professor Raymond Bradley, head of the UMass Department of Geosciences, and Professor Jens Christiansen, a professor of Economics and Environmental Studies at Mount Holyoke College. Lois Barber, co-founder and co-director of EarthAction, moderated the event, saying, "The best fuel to run on is optimism."

Prof. William Manning focused his talk on global warming trends and how combustion is the main source of this problem. He said this will continue to be a problem because the "world is urbanizing at an incredible rate."

Manning also showed how many states, including Massachusetts, far exceed federal guidelines for air pollution, yet are not punished for their refusal to comply with the guidelines. "The only thing the federal government does is to threaten to dem federal highway funds," he said.

Christine Lindstrom narrowed her talk down to activism, especially among youth and college-aged students, stating that we are "smarter, younger and we're the ones who are going to inherit the world."

Lindstrom then has been involved in preventing oil drilling off the coast of southern Florida, and helping to force the co-founders of the Global Climate Coalition, Ford and General Motors to pull out. She stood as proof that activism and grassroots organizations can work.

Prof. Raymond Bradley showed graphs of temperature trends on the earth. "The temperature rate in the past 150 years is unique [when compared to] the past 1,000 years. 1998 was the warmest year, even past all uncertainties."

He said that an increase in carbon dioxide is based on population growth and the demand for high standards of living. Prof. Jens Christiansen continued along that line showing how industrialized nations can implement successful ways so that solar energy can compete with fossil fuel based energy and how there are many ways to begin an end to the global warming crisis.

"The issue is not economic, simply political," Christiansen said.

Ethics conference planned for Apr. 29

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

A nationwide conference on medical ethics will take place this Saturday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. in room 65 of Bartlett Hall at the University of Massachusetts.

The conference is sponsored by the philosophy department and is being organized by a group of students who were enrolled last semester in a philosophy department class titled, "Honors Medical Ethics."

The Commonwealth College provided funding to procure refreshments, speakers and press coverage. Sophomore biology major Joel Southall said the Commonwealth provided approximately $5,000 to the philosophy department to guarantee the running of the program.

"The same class has been offered before, but I believe this is the first time money has been available for a conference like this," Southall said. "We went through the different planning stages of getting speakers and getting a room for it."

The presentations, featuring science, philosophy and anthropology guest speakers from different universities, will focus on issues ranging from bioethics of the human genome to the ethics of reproduction.

UMass Professor Alan Swedlund, from the department of Anthropology, will speak on the bioethics of the human genome mapping project from 9-10:30 a.m.

Dr. Swedlund is the author of five books and is the head of numerous interdisciplinary studies in the United States and Mexico.

University of New York State Philosophy professor Bonnie Steinbock will be speaking from 10:45 a.m. to 12:15 p.m. on parental autonomy and reproductive technologies and whether the United States is making babies to specification.

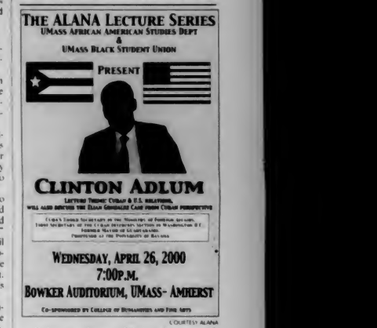
Adlum to talk on Gonzalez, Cuba, politics

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff



In the aftermath of the Elian Gonzalez situation, political activist and Cuban professor, Clinton Adlum, is coming to speak at the University of Massachusetts. Adlum will speak about Elian Gonzalez and larger issues of Cuban-American relations tonight in Bowker Auditorium at 7 p.m.

Director of the Office of ALANA Affairs, Nelson Acosta, said that in light of the recent Gonzalez incident in Miami, Adlum's arrival is particularly timely. Acosta believes, "A University is a place to grow, to expand your horizons," and that a speaker like Adlum is a good way to do this. He explained that Adlum was someone who students would not otherwise get a chance to see.

Talking about Cuba's past, Acosta described how Adlum has had experiences in both the pre-Castro, right-wing military dictatorship and the post-revolution regime. In fact, he has spent about half of his life or 30 years in each period.

Acosta said, "It's always nice for students to hear from people who are actually living it." He added, "I think students will benefit from his presence on campus."

As for Elian Gonzalez, Acosta believes that the United States took the proper action in returning Elian to Cuba. "I got to give credit to Janet Reno," Costa commented. "I can't believe how surgically precise [Elian's return] was done." He concluded, "I think most people are really glad he's finally with his father."

Cuban professor, Clinton Adlum, will speak at the UMass about Elian Gonzalez and larger issues of Cuban-American relations tonight in Bowker Auditorium at 7 p.m.

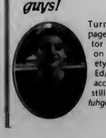
Acosta explained, "I don't agree with everything Fidel [Castro does]," but then again the United States also supports China, Russia and Vietnam - countries which he believes have less than stellar human rights records.

Acosta also thinks that Elian Gonzalez will draw greater attention to overall U.S.-Cuban relations. "We've had a blockade on Cuba for 40 years now," Costa said. "Most Americans don't really know that much about Cuba."

Clinton Adlum is being presented as a part of the ALANA Lecture Series, which according to Acosta presents the University as "a marketplace of ideas."

Clinton Adlum is currently a Professor Emeritus at the Center for Study of Alternative Politics at the University of Havana. Formerly, he has held the offices of Mayor of Guatanamo, First Secretary of the Cuban Interests Section in Washington, Cuban ambassador to Baghdad and Under Secretary in Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

In 1991, Adlum was offered a position at the Center for the Studies of the United States and soon thereafter moved to the Center for the Study of Alternative Politics. Last February, Adlum was invited to speak at a national conference on U.S.-Cuban relations, but could not attend because he did not receive a visa until late March.



The United States will not allow ALANA or the University to pay Adlum an honorarium; therefore, the lecture is being supported by personal donations and other ALANA contributions.

Baltimore reverend experiences medical miracle

By Caryle Murphy
Washington Post

In 1995, the Rev. Ronald P. Pytel, just 48, had resigned himself to an idle life and early death. His heart was so damaged that simply walking made him winded. His complexion was pallid, his weight a gaunt 140 pounds. His quality of life, he recalls one doctor saying, "wasn't worth a plug nickel."

But the pastor of Holy Rosary Catholic Church in Baltimore, like many of his parishioners, had long been devoted to Faustina Kowalska, a Polish nun and mystic who died in 1938. At a healing service in October 1995, he and a dozen church members were praying to her for his health when Pytel fell to the floor and, although conscious, couldn't get up for 15 minutes.

"I could talk, but I couldn't move a muscle," he recalled. "It was as though I was paralyzed." When he finally stood up, he felt so fit he began laughing.

Nowadays, the blond Pytel has the rosy cheeks of a choirboy, weighs a hearty 170 pounds and swims with abandon. His pumping machine is so robust he jokes of having "the heart of a 19-year-old." He and his parishioners call what happened a miracle.

And so does the Catholic Church.

Having concluded that Pytel's heart recovery was so rapid and complete that it could only be a result of Kowalska's heavenly intervention, Pope John Paul II – another of her devotees, and a fellow Pole – is to canonize her Sunday in Rome.

Pytel, who is of Polish descent, seems pleased but bewildered by his unexpected role in adding a saint to the church's pantheon of more than 4,500 holy people. Two documented miracles are required for elevation to sainthood. Kowalska already was credited with the 1981 cure of a Massachusetts woman. Pytel's made her canonization possible.

"I still ask 'Why me?' when so many people are praying for health reasons," he said. "Why the Lord chose me I wouldn't know."

Kowalska's canonization is a major event for members of his church, built in 1927 by Polish immigrants. Petitioners come here daily to intercede with Kowalska, better known as Blessed Faustina, in a small room dedicated to her and the devotion she promoted known as the Divine Mercy.

"I pray to her every day," said Dottie Olszewski, 73, director of the tiny shrine. "She takes care of everything for me now. She's good. She intercedes for you, if what you're asking for is Jesus' will."

Unlike all other female saints who adopted Poland as home, Kowalska will be the first one born in Poland, said the Rev. Seraphim Michalenko, of the National Shrine of the Divine Mercy in Stockbridge, Mass., where 30,000 pilgrims come annually to pray to her. Michalenko is the church official responsible for collecting information in North America about Kowalska's miracles.

Born Helena Kowalska in 1905 near Lodz, she entered the convent at 25, took the name Faustina and served as the cloister's cook, gardener and housekeeper. In 1931, she began having visions of Jesus, who appeared with two rays of light – one red and one white – emanating from his heart. She said he directed her to have a painting done of what she'd seen and write on it, "Jesus, I Trust In You."

In a nearly-700 page diary, Kowalska described her visions and the message of Divine Mercy, a devotion that extols Christ's mercy and urges people to be merciful to others. She died in Krakow at 33 of tuberculosis.

In 1992, the Vatican declared Kowalska responsible for the miraculous cure of Maureen Digan, of Lee, Mass. Digan testified that, after praying at Kowalska's tomb in Krakow in 1981, she was cured of Milroy's disease, a hereditary form of lymphedema that had already cost her one leg. That miracle led to Kowalska's 1993 beatification as Blessed Faustina.

In June 1995, Pytel, who was having difficulty breathing, went to cardiologist Nicholas Fortuin, a professor of medicine at Johns Hopkins University.

"He was in profound heart failure," Fortuin said. The outflow valve of Pytel's heart, normally the size of a half-dollar, was no bigger than a pinhole, obstructing blood flow, Fortuin said. Because the heart had been forced to work extra hard to keep blood moving, its left ventricle was badly damaged.

Fortuin immediately scheduled Pytel for an aortic valve replacement with Johns Hopkins surgeon Peter S. Greene. The operation would repair the blood flow but not the left ventricle. So "he would not likely return to the lifestyle of a parish priest, which is a very energetic and time-consuming lifestyle," Fortuin said. "I told him that frankly."

That was Pytel's situation when he returned to Holy Rosary after the operation. In August, parishioner Olszewski made a pilgrimage to Kowalska's tomb.

"I knelt at her grave and promised that if she got Jesus to get Father Pytel healed, I would spend the rest of my life promoting the Divine Mercy devotion," Olszewski recalled.

On Kowalska's feast day, Oct. 5, the parish held the healing service. Although Pytel felt better immediately afterward, he didn't know his heart had fully recovered until a November checkup with Fortuin.

"Lo and behold, the heart function had returned to normal," recalled Fortuin, who was taken aback when he observed Pytel's heart with an echocardiogram, which produces an image of internal organs using sonar.

Some patients with Pytel's condition who have valve replacements show marginal improvement in their damaged hearts after several years. But Pytel's once-enlarged heart was back to normal size, and "the movement of the walls, which formerly had... poor contraction," Fortuin said, "now had returned to normal contraction.

"I was very surprised, maybe astounded," he added. "I didn't expect the left ventricle muscle to come back to its normal state. But it did. That was extremely unusual."

Removal of Confederate Flag sparks southern debate

By Rosemary Moine
The Daily Cougar (U. Houston)

(U-WIRE) HOUSTON – South Carolina's tentative decision to remove a Confederate flag from the dome of its statehouse has sparked yet another debate about the flag's tie to slavery and the Civil War. This time, a group is out to change the history books regarding the cause of the war.

The Sons of Confederate Veterans, a group of Confederate descendants, say history professors aren't teaching their students the truth about slavery and its role in the war.

"Leading academic historians agree if Southerners wanted to keep slavery, all they had to do was remain in the Union," said SOCV member Rodger D. Carey.

The group's statement comes after a sometimes bitter debate about South Carolina's displaying the Confederate flag atop its capitol. Several groups were opposed to the flag's presence, saying it glorifies the Confederacy and, by association, slavery.

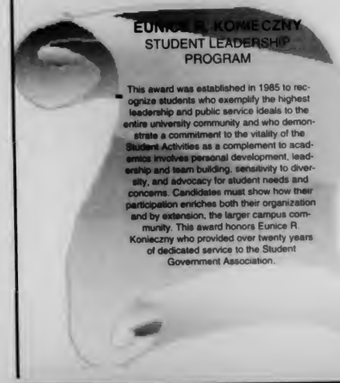
But Carey claims such arguments are not based in fact.

"The people of South Carolina are suffering from ignorance and delusions about their history and must be corrected by the superior wisdom of these professors," he said.

The SOCV backs up its assertion with the support of an unnamed group of professors and historians. But at the University of Houston, historians maintain slavery was the deal-breaker that led to secession and the Civil War.

"It's preposterous to think that credible historians think that slavery was not a central part of secession," said history professor Joseph Glathaar.

Glathaar and history professor Eric Walther, who is working on a project to document the lives of every slave who ever lived in Texas, pointed to several of the Southern states' declarations, including Texas' own Ordinance of Secession and Declaration of Causes, that state the right to hold slaves as a major factor in their leaving the Union.



But to Carey, the issue of secession had more to do with congressional representation of the South and free trade than with the right to keep slaves. The North's larger population, he said, would have given it the representative power to abolish slavery in Congress at any time it chose.

"If the North had wanted to abolish slavery, the South couldn't have done anything about it," Carey said. "The war was not fought to free the slaves; no one was passing laws to free the slaves. It's all politics."

Our Opinion

GO TO CLASS!

As evidenced by the sunny skies outside, spring is indeed upon us here in the Pioneer Valley of Western Massachusetts. The singing of birds is clearly more audible, shorts and skirts are becoming more and more prevalent around campus and random outdoor activities such as Frisbee and Hacky-Sack are on the rise all across the University.

And less and less students are going to class.

On any given weekday, a large afternoon lecture in Thompson will be missing as many as 20-40 percent of its enrolled students. Many Friday lectures (and even smaller, more intimate discussion groups) are marked by more empty seats than participants. The usual spots of casual student congregation, such as the side steps of the Student Union, are occupied by more and more individuals whose academic schedules conflict with their need to relax in the sun.

We at the Collegian feel that these students should go to class.

Many of the seniors anticipating a May graduation are frantically scurrying between the copy shops and post offices of Amherst, trying to send out as many resumes as possible in hopes of landing a job. Other would-be grads are ditching school in favor of important interviews and job fairs which may lead to that "first big break" and a promising career path. Still more are cutting class to finish up the seemingly endless research and writing process for their thesis projects.

The Collegian believes that even seniors have no excuse for not going to class.

Many spring athletes are in the stretch portions of their respective seasons, trying to keep focused on a coveted postseason run. In highly individual sports such as track or gymnastics, lone athletes are forced to adhere to strict routines of intense practice at the expense of class time. Season-ending tournaments, often held in faraway cities and lasting several days, shave countless Fridays and Mondays from many a student-athlete's scholastic schedule.

The Collegian feels that athletes really need to go to class.

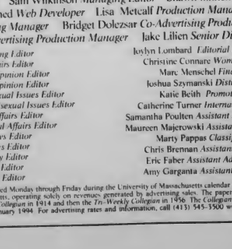
A large numbers of juniors are hunting for an ever-important summer internship to propel them into their final year of college. Still more underclassmen are spending their afternoons shuffling from business to business, in person or on the phone, in search of gainful vacation employment. Those whose residences are rented often spend the last few weeks of the semester frantically searching for a suitable person to sublet to, while others inexplicably sit in their dorm rooms and contemplate how long they'll be allowed to live at home once the semester grades are posted.

The Collegian feels that none of these are good enough reasons to miss class.

Then there are the students who have never really made a habit of attending class at all this semester. Whether it be due to an over-commitment to a part-time job or RSO, a penchant for sleeping late (or staying up even later) or simply a knack for finding better things to do, many students have so rarely graced their respective classes that their professors have ceased to even call out their names when taking attendance.

We at the Collegian feel that it's never too late to start going to class.



Because let's face it, many classes save the latter portion of the semester to explore how topics and concepts fit into modern society. Others spend the last few weeks bringing together all of the major points of the semester into one cohesive "big picture." Even more classes utilize the final remaining sessions for overviews and summaries to help aid in preparation for final exams. And at the very least, most classes at this time of year offer students a chance to evaluate both the course and the instructor through a standardized survey, one which may or may not affect that professor's job security.

All of which are excellent reasons to go to class.

Jimmy and Adam from Comedy Central's The Man Show get down with Fox and some fine ladies.

Man Show's cool duo spouts off

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

How do you prove your manhood? Can you drink an entire beer stein in under three seconds? Do you sit in a hot tub staring at buggy girls? Or do you watch Comedy Central's "The Man Show?" The popular series has had huge success over the past year, and recently the Collegian had the opportunity to talk to the men of "The Man Show." Jimmy Kimmel and Adam Carolla.

Adam Carolla, one half of the wise-cracking team that hosts "The Man Show," actually began his career in Los Angeles as a carpenter. Because of this, he considers himself an expert on everything that is masculine. After his quick stint as a handyman, Carolla found himself doing comedy at a local radio station in California. Before "The Man Show," Carolla's biggest hit was MTV's "Loveline."

Jimmy Kimmel is no stranger to Comedy Central's world of television. For the past few years he has been the co-host of "Win Ben Stein's Money." The series is the only Comedy Central game show to ever win an Emmy.

The two were really looking forward to the upcoming season of "The Man Show." The series plans to move from their current Wednesday time slot, to Sunday nights at 10 p.m. When I asked them what they thought of the move, Carolla responded with, "We're moving, no one told us we're moving. What the hell's going on here?" At this point it was obvious that the interview was going to be something unique.

As for their plans for this season's "Man Show," Kimmel said, "Well, we're going to kill somebody." He laughed and said, "Actually, I think the show is much better. We've already taped twelve episodes. We've got some new stuff. We improved the stage. We got a hot tub, and buggy twins. Everything is a little better than it was."

"The Man Show" has had quite a bit of protests brought against it. People proclaim that it is sexist and is sending the wrong message across, especially to younger viewers. The co-hosts said, "Most of the criticism comes from the media. We know that there are a lot of people that like the show, and we don't really care about the people who don't."

Electronica duo brings Noize

Daniel and Free get personal with the Collegian

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Los Angeles electronic music pioneers Hednoize took time out of a rainy Monday afternoon to talk to the Collegian this week, commenting on topics that ranged from Napster to Nine Inch Nails.

Comprised of Psykosonik founder and programmer Daniel Lenz and vocalist/keyboardist Free, the duo managed to create every single sound found on their debut album Searching for the End on machines, a process that found both men in the studio working for the better part of the last five years. The end product is a refreshingly different and deeply emotional journey through dark musical soundscapes and personal lyrics that often were inspired by the music and the process itself.

Breaking from the prevalent electronica of today are Free's emotional and resonating vocals, which complement already lavish electronic arrangements. The introspective lyrics, which Free insists are not, as popularly interpreted, about relationships, confront addictions and personal demons, themes more akin to Trent Reznor than Norman Cook. The lyrics also bring about a noticeable pop sensibility to much of the album, with recognizable choruses and grabbing melodies rather than loops and samples presented ad nauseum.

"We incorporate traditional songwriting," the group admits, "and it's really natural to put (electronic music and songwriting) together. We're trying to bridge the gap between rock and club music, and hopefully more bands will help fill the gulf that has appeared between (the two styles)." Listening to Searching for the End, the massive amount of work is easily apparent, and clearly not the work some kids on their computer with Rehirth, a concern the group addresses.

"It's too easy for the novice to create electronic music today," Hednoize laments, adding that they'd like to see "more electronic artists become songwriters. Software programs like Rehirth really eliminate the band element, allowing for a more do-it-yourself approach."

In fact the group attributes much of their unique sound to their union, one that began in the mid-90s in Minneapolis. So was the Minneapolis music scene an exciting one?

"Hahahaha," the group informs me. Taking the hint, I wonder if the LA music scene they are now both a part of is any better.

"There is more stuff in LA," they say reluctantly, "although our music doesn't fit in any category, its kind of a gray area."

The band explored that gray area recently in one of the handful of shows Hednoize has played in the area; the most recent of which yielded some positive results.

"The show was good, it sounded great," Hednoize states with pride, even though they admit this first batch of live dates are more like practices to see what works and what doesn't in a live setting. The crowd response was surprisingly good, however, even though the band was preceeded by a party-style band that threw wieners into the crowd, the perfect introduction to Hednoize's personal, thoughtful electronica.

An interesting thing happened during the making of Searching for the End, and that was that the music actually inspired some lyrics, as opposed to the traditional opposite approach.

"It happened by default, actually, because we are both soundsmiths first and foremost, so it was a natural occurrence."

The dark music predictably inspired some dark lyrics, so I inquired, with the dark-themed score of The Virgin Suicides in mind, to what film would Searching be the soundtrack for?

"Maybe the first Crow film," they decide on, after some deliberation. "Although, the whole album is very much like a soundtrack. It's cinematic, with build ups and fade aways."

Hednoize lists Nine Inch Nails and Underworld as bands that have inspired them as of late, even name dropping my personal favorites Pitchshifter which instantly ups their coolness factor. And, like metal giants Metallica who have just launched a massive lawsuit against it, Hednoize is concerned about the potentially damaging nature of the mp3-sharing software Napster.

"It's scary for the industry and artists in general," they said, predicting that the software's increased presence will result in artists no longer being able to survive simply on their craft. It's potentially discouraging to many would-be artists if "you have to be wealthy already to make music, and really have to believe in music as art."

Word to the wise, though: if you are grabbing Hednoize tracks from Napster you are missing out on the group's kick-ass website, which they constructed completely by themselves.

At http://www.bitstream.net/psykosonik/hednoize.html, you can listen to the music, check out some cool concert photos, and keep up to date on the latest news all while witnessing the coolest interface this weary web-traveler has seen in some time. Do yourself a favor and check it out.

The future for Hednoize is mostly working out a tour, but at the same time working on new material. "We're better songwriters and musicians now than we were when we first got signed to TVT," they admit, and their maturity and live experiences will no doubt contribute equally to their work in the future.

But for the present, you'd be hard-pressed to find a Hednoize show outside of the city of angels, although the band is currently working with booking agents to either start or latch on to a tour that would bring the noize across the country and beyond. Until that happens however, we'll just have to be content with getting wieners thrown at us.

The lovely Gwen Stefani and No Doubt are all over the place for their new release Return of Saturn.

No Doubt runs musical rings on Saturn

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

NO DOUBT
Return to Saturn
Interscope

A band sells 11 million albums domestically and they go and get all self-conscious and introspective. This is certainly the case for No Doubt. The title of their latest album, Return to Saturn, refers to the 29 years that it takes Saturn to orbit the sun – not coincidentally lead singer, Gwen Stefani's age.

Punk-veterans and ska-reared, No Doubt finally reached the mainstream with their immensely popular, power-pop album, Tragic Kingdom. Ironically though, the sales of Tragic Kingdom were driven mostly by the breakout ballad, "Don't Speak," which really didn't sound like much else on the album.

Reflecting on their abrupt introduction to mass appeal, the band pushes their own boundaries with the fairly eclectic, Return to Saturn. Lyrical maturity and an acoustic flair characterize No Doubt's latest effort. Stefani makes this her personal, energetic anthem – a reflection on her growth and the band's.

From the very first chorus of "Ex-Girlfriend," "I kinda always knew I'd end up your ex-girlfriend," it is evident that Return to Saturn isn't going to be a repeat of the light, bubbly pop sounds of "Just a Girl." The traditional punk choruses are restrained by the acoustic verses and eventually overwhelm them. This is one angry liberation song.

However, No Doubt runs the gambit in their musical styling on this disc – from a brassless swing-style, to a Dance Hall Crasher piano homage, to uncharacteristically acoustic pop pieces. Even "New," the rave theme song from the Go soundtrack seems to take on new shadings in the album's larger context.

The sheer simplicity of the bass-driven "Six Feet Under" is certainly a return to more classic No Doubt material. The synth-pop piece is the kind of enjoyable ditty that we've come to expect from the band. It's raucous and overpowering and dizzying. However, the ominous reminder of death is certainly typical of their lyricism.

"Bathwater" is a pure joy – swinging ska done by a Southern California band that knows how to. Trumpets and a piano embellish the tune about self-destruction. It's the band in a different vein.

"Magic's In," is Saturn's first outright acoustic piece – the definition of a well-crafted pop song. Stefani's vocals are less harsh here, playing well off the song's theme of enchantment. Likewise, "Suspension without Suspense" is a decidedly pop-ballad, though not nearly as meticulously arranged as "Magic's In."

"Marry Me" is spacey and winding – almost bleeding with anxiety. It is probably not coincidence that the lyric, "A girl in the world barking up the wrong tree," directly opposes the lyrics of the aforementioned "Just a Girl" single.

"Staring Problem" has a decidedly hard-edged riff to it, while "Comforting" borrows from Latin influences to get its salsa/punk sound. However, Return to Saturn shines the most when all of No Doubt's influences are mixed together.

"Artificial Sweetener," one of the album's most eclectic tracks, mixes the band's punk roots with their newfound acoustic sound and an electric overlay. The track serves as a microcosm for the entire album as Stefani worries about "assessing her life." The album's title phrase emanates from this song, "The return of Saturn."

The lyrical maturity is consistent throughout most of the album, slipping, rather blatantly, on "Staring Problem." Spelling words is never a good idea.

Gwen Stefani and No Doubt have grown up though, both spiritually and musically. Whether or not old fans will embrace Return to Saturn, it is a new step for the band, no doubt. B

Both men are juggling "The Man Show," with one other series. Corolla has MTV's "Loveline," while Kimmel has "Win Ben Stein's Money." Kimmel said that he has officially resigned from the game show, but Ben Stein was a wonderful person to work with. Corolla seemed to enjoy working for MTV.

"You really can't use MTV as a contrasting example to Comedy Central. I don't get restricted too much on MTV," Corolla said. "But, Comedy Central is probably second to HBO. They pretty much give you free reign."

The pair realizes that a high percentage of their audience is at the college level. When asked if they specifically targeted the college community, they said, "We don't specifically target anything. There is definitely a connection between the kind of humor that we like and that age group. What makes us laugh is what makes the show, and when you're younger you seem to get off on watching other people do things. The older crowd tends to dislike us because they don't want to just sit there and watch us do stuff. The kids seem to like that."

The show has proven to be a very successful hit. One of the highlights is when a man named Fox drinks an entire beer stein (sometimes two) in one gulp. Corolla said, "We tape two shows in an entire day, so sometimes he will drink 15 to 20 beers within the two hours."

When asked where they found him, Corolla said, "Jimmy found him in college when he was at UNLV." Kimmel said, "People would go to watch him to the beer thing, and sing some funny songs. He can drink 30 beers and not get drunk."

"The Man Show" is certainly one of Comedy Central's most successful series ever. When the co-hosts were asked how well they get along, Kimmel laughed and said, "Oh, we barely speak." After speaking to two people who seem to be very close friends, it is very difficult to imagine them anything close to hostile.

Karros packs usual power with .190 BA

By Jason Reid
Los Angeles Times

NEW YORK – In another typically slow start, Eric Karros is batting .190 after striking out in his only official at-bat in Monday's 1-0 loss to the New York Mets at Shea Stadium. Karros, who has four home runs and 12 RBI, walked twice and was hit by a pitch.

He has struggled during April in his previous eight seasons, facing slump questions daily.

But Karros always rebounded, finishing among the club's leaders in home runs and RBI each season.

"The sun coming up in the morning should be a bigger concern (for fans and reporters) than E.K. producing," Dodger batting coach Rick Down said. "No matter how anyone looks at what E.K. is doing now, the important thing is what he does over the long haul."

After struggling early last season, Karros established career highs with a .304 average, 40 doubles and 112 RBI. He also matched his personal best with 34 home runs.

He is the only player in Los Angeles franchise history to hit at least 30 home runs with 100 RBI three consecutive seasons.

Matt Herges is realistic about his strong start.

The rookie reliever hasn't been charged with a run in seven appearances, giving up only four hits while striking out eight in 12 innings.

"This isn't going to last forever," he said. "I mean, everything is going great, and I'm real pleased with how I'm throwing, but I'm going to give up runs. At some point, I'm going to get pounded."

Three of the six runners Herges inherited have scored. Those runs, though, were charged to others.

The longtime minor leaguer said the key for him would be how he fares after his first difficult outing.

"You know it's going to come because that's the way this game is," he said. "Hopefully, when it does happen, I'll be able to bounce back OK."

Rookie left-hander Jeff Williams will be optioned to triple-A Albuquerque Tuesday to make room for Kevin Brown on the 25-man roster.

Williams struggled with his command in four appearances, walking six in three innings. He gave up eight hits and six earned runs.

Beathard considers retirement after up-and-down stint in SD

By Leonard Shapiro
Washington Post

Bobby Beathard is telling friends around the league he is contemplating retirement as general manager of the San Diego Chargers. A final decision could come within the next week to 10 days.

According to league sources, Beathard, 63 and an avid surfer, runner and cyclist, has been thinking about retiring for the past several years.

He was telling friends before, during and after the NFL draft last week that the time may be right to walk away with his team on the upsurge under second-year coach Mike Riley. He could make an announcement when the team assembles for its first minicamp Friday.

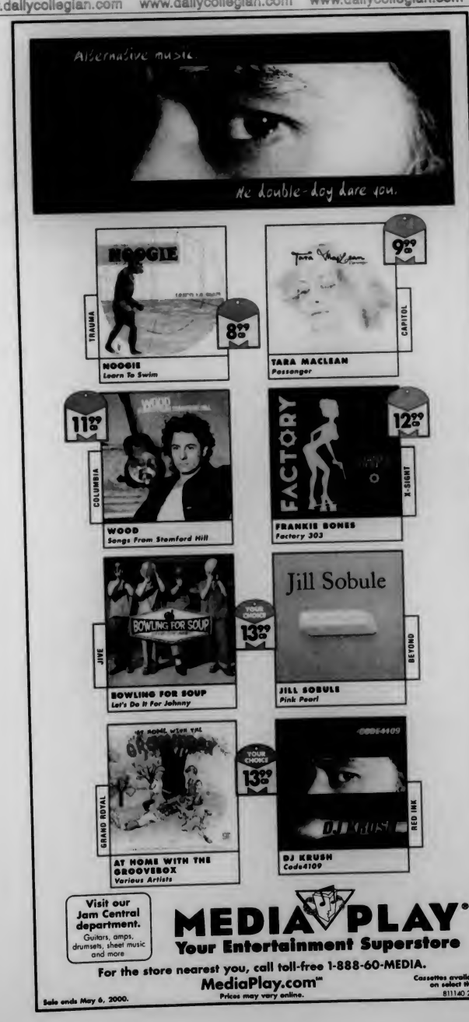
"He hasn't said yes or no, but he's definitely leaning in the yes direction," one long-time friend – a current NFL coach – said Monday. "He's got all those grandkids (12) and he's more serious about it than I've heard him before. I think this might be it."

Beathard, who hired Joe Gibbs as head coach and provided most of the players who produced the greatest era in Washington Redskins history, did not return telephone calls. "There's been speculation the last couple of years," director of public relations Bill Johnston said. "But until I hear it from Bobby, that's all it is – speculation."

If Beathard does step down, sources indicated Billy Devaney likely would replace him. A former Redskins scout, Devaney has been the Chargers' director of player personnel since 1990, when Beathard joined the team following a year out of football as a studio analyst for NBC.

Beathard was hired by the Redskins away from the Miami Dolphins in 1978. In 1980, Beathard plucked an obscure NFL assistant, Joe Gibbs, from the staff of offensive-minded Don Coryell, who was coaching the Chargers. Gibbs's Redskins won three Super Bowl championships.

Beathard left after the 1988 season, but the Super Bowl team of 1992 fielded many of his players.



In his third season with the Chargers, they won their first AFC West title in more than a decade. They advanced to Super Bowl XXIX after the 1994 season, losing to the 49ers.

mance of Reedy in Pawtucket was the beginning of a two-day trend for UMass – a swing that saw unheralded players forging a niche for themselves in the UMass lineup. Stone said the effort Reedy brought on Monday could be the thing that jumpstarts the freshman to bigger and better things.

"We talked about the last time he had pitched," said Stone of his conversation with Reedy before Monday's opening round contest. "We told him the last time he pitched [that] he needed to work on the slide step to keep the runners in check. He did a good job; he mixed his pitches, probably threw 20-25 changeups out of 120 pitches, that's pretty good. He just kept them off balance. He was good. It was great to see him pitch like that."

It would have been hard for any member of the UMass pitching staff to follow the performance of Reedy, but senior southpaw Todd Samolewicz did just that. Another unlikely candidate to lead the Minutemen to victory, Samolewicz took to the mound at Fenway on Tuesday and simply fell into a groove, corralling the Huskies into a single file line that led straight back to their dugout.

"We used a lot of pitchers on Sunday to get through the weekend," said Stone, insinuating that UMass needed Samolewicz, the only rested arm left on the bench, to pitch well. "Sometimes you just have to go with what you have left. It's nice to see him step up and pitch well."

Samolewicz was awarded the victory, improving to 3-1 on the season. He allowed three runs on six hits in six and two thirds innings while fanning six Husky batters.

Off the mound, another face emerged from the crowd, giving Stone a taste of what he has to work with next year. Freshman Jeff Altieri stole the show, going 3-for-4 with two homeruns and five runs batted in.

"He's going to be our first basemen next year," said Stone. "We've gotten [him] time there at first a little bit. He's our first guy off the bench to pinch hit. I know he's always solid, so [I gave] him a chance to play and he did well."

Altieri was happy with his performance, but remained realistic as to where he stands, for this season at least.

"It's hard," said Altieri of his current status. "I have a senior in front of me (O'Connell) who does very well. It's a tough situation. For me, I will hope to play. We'll see."

still in the game until the very end. This series will ultimately come down to Carter and whether or not he can be patient when the double teams come at him. If he can settle down and play his game, I still think this series is going five games.

The playoffs' biggest player hasn't even touched the floor. The injury to the Spurs' Tim Duncan has changed the entire complexion of the playoffs. The Suns scored 72 points in a playoff game and won. Even with the presence of David Robinson, the loss of Duncan has left the Spurs without a go-to-man. It showed on Saturday when they went to Sean Elliott for the last shot. Elliott was big in last year's playoffs, but he was playing in just his 17th game this year and still has understandably not fully recovered from the kidney transplant that sidelined him for most of the year. Duncan needs to come back or the Spurs will be knocked out.

The Portland Trail Blazers finally brought Scottie Pippen out of hiding on Sunday and took advantage of an uncharacteristic collapse by the Minnesota Timberwolves to take game one.

Pippen had a season high 28 points and Rasheed Wallace played sensational defense on Kevin Garnett to save the game. This is going to sound weird, but Garnett had a triple-double on Sunday; he needs to do more. He was just 6-for-20 from the field and was invisible in the fourth quarter.

The other Minnesota players must find a way to get him the ball in the final five minutes. He is their go-to guy and if they don't go to him down the stretch, they'll be facing another type of go-to: go-to-home.

However, for the other 15 teams still left in the playoffs, there is still one team to beat: the Los Angeles Lakers. Although it looks like he does absolutely nothing on the bench, Phil Jackson has done an outstanding job this season with a team that had underachieved the last couple of years. They won 67 games during the regular season and outran the Sacramento Kings in game one.

Shaquille O'Neal scored 46 points and Kobe Bryant continued his outstanding year with 23 points. Although Shaq is the MVP, the Lakers became a better team when Bryant became one of the best defensive players in the league. Bryant will make the league's All-First team and All-Defensive team as well.

The Lakers also have the blend of veteran players with championship experience. A.C. Green, Ron Harper, Robert Horry and John Salley have all won championships in the past and have brought that leadership with them to the Lakers.

Before the playoffs, I thought that the two teams that would give the Lakers problems in the playoffs were the Spurs and the Jazz. However, with Duncan out, the only team I see with any chance of stopping L.A. is Utah.

Malone always gives O'Neal fits and can take him away from the basket with his patented turnaround jumper. John Stockton is still one of the best point guards in the league and will not get flustered by the playoff pressure.

Also, with all the experience that the Lakers brought with them this season, the Jazz have a core unit that have played on the same court for two NBA finals in the late 1990s.

Finally, the Laker players still have in the back of their minds the fact that Jazz has defeated them in the playoffs two of the last three seasons. There still might be some doubt in the Lakers' minds, but I don't think so.

The Lakers have been the team of this season, and they will be lifting the championship trophy when it is all over... whenever that is.

Orioles' Bordick hitting his stride with new manager and new season

By Dave Sheinin
Washington Post

His teammates marvel at his work ethic. His former teammates look at him in awe, wondering what happened to the scrawny guy they used to know. His manager loves him, knowing he will accept a move to the bottom of the lineup and still produce.

His organization? It's hard to tell exactly how the Baltimore Orioles feel about Mike Bordick.

At age 34, Bordick, the Orioles' shortstop, is coming off a career season in 1999 and is soaring even higher in 2000. A career .258 hitter before this year, Bordick is hitting .353 through Monday, and, with 24 RBI, he is tied for the American League lead with Oakland's Jason Giambi.

However, Bordick is in the final year of a contract that pays him $3 million this year, the result of a vesting option based on plate appearances that kicked in last year. While Bordick expresses a desire to remain with the Orioles and the Orioles express a desire to keep him, there have been no discussions of a contract extention.

In the meantime, Bordick's value appears to be soaring. Once known as a smooth-fielding, light-hitting shortstop back when that was what was expected of a shortstop – he hit .277 with 77 RBI last season (70 percent more than in any previous season) in his first year as the No. 2 hitter in the order. And Bordick has been even more formidable this season since a return to the ninth spot.

Explanations for Bordick's surge are many – a maturation as a hitter, an intense off-season conditioning program, productive hitters surrounding him in the Orioles' order – but few come from Bordick, who is content to enjoy his increased production without overanalyzing it.

"I've had a lot of opportunities to produce," he said in typical low-key style, "and luckily I've been able to come through. The main thing is to keep it going."

Manager Mike Hargrove, in his first year with the Orioles, remembers how the scouting reports used to label Bordick an opposite-field singles hitter.

"I've seen him go from an off-field hitter to a guy who has every year gotten stronger and more knowledgeable," Hargrove said.

"He hasn't lost that off-field stroke, but now he's also been able to bring that stroke around and drive it to left and left-center.

"He's a good athlete. He's stronger and more experienced, and he knows what he wants to do with a pitch."

It is probably more than coincidence that Bordick's increased offense came around the same time he began an off-season conditioning program with teammate B.J. Surhoff.

Orioles strength and conditioning coach Tim Bishop said the five-times-a-week program is the most strenuous he has ever devised for an athlete.

"They push themselves to the limit, and they push each other," Bishop said. "The more you give them, the more they'll take. You can't teach that. It's the same way (Bordick) approaches everything, from the batting cage to the weight room to the infield. You can't ignore that work ethic."

The winter workouts – which include running on a treadmill set on a steep incline, a group of "explosive" jumping exercises called plyometrics and intensive weightlifting – have helped Bordick become noticeably more muscular and powerful.

"He's a lot bigger than he used to be, especially in the chest," said Orioles left-hander Buddy Groom, who played with Bordick in Oakland in 1996, "and it hasn't cost him his quickness. He's still as quick as ever."

Orioles hitting coach Terry Crowley, who joined the Orioles before the 1998 season, has known only the stronger, more explosive Bordick. "Last year, from Day One, I saw a hitter who could cover the entire strike zone, with the ability to hit to right field and also to turn on a ball with power," Crowley said. "It was just a matter of getting consistency."

The most glaring jump in Bordick's numbers last season was his .406 average against left-handed pitching, which led the American League and more than doubled his average (.184) of the previous season.

In the era of the slugging shortstop, in which Derek Jeter, Nomar Garciaparra and Alex Rodriguez are capable of hitting .340 with 30 homers, Bordick has a higher batting average, more homers and more RBI than any of them. Based on 162 games, Bordick is on pace for a staggering 243 RBI, a fact that drawn a sheepish chuckle from Bordick.

"I don't think that's very realistic," he said, "and I hope you don't, either."

Pawtucket, so yeah, maybe I'm better off that way, I don't know."

Altieri went 3-for-4 on the day, bringing five runs to the plate, while scoring two of his own.

Northeastern would add another run in the bottom of the eighth frame, and a grand slam by Beck in the bottom of the ninth to bring the score to 13-8, but it was all for nothing. UMass reliever Nick Skirkanich fanned R. J. Longchamps to finalize the victory.

"I wish we could have finished better," Stone said. "You know, I would have felt real good if we had maybe just given up three runs at the most. Every game's a struggle. Every game's going to be right down to the wire. That's the way this one was, too... I think we made a statement early but we backed off a little bit. I mean I don't want to run to embarrass people but sometimes you have to keep the pressure on. I probably should have done that."

Shaq sounds off with fury

By Tim Kawakami
Los Angeles Times

EL SEGUNDO, Calif. – In the key, in front of Vlade Divac, or even a day after his 46-point Game 1 Sacramento King slam dance, Shaquille O'Neal doesn't give ground.

He makes it shake. He owns large portions of it. He conducts regular one-man mosh pits on top of it. But he does not retreat from it, ever.

And on Monday, after hearing about King Coach Rick Adelman's complaints that the Game 1 referees allowed him to get away with too much body-slamming to position himself in the Los Angeles Laker offense, O'Neal hurriedly defended his ground.

"Adelman's complaining about me?" O'Neal said, incredulously, after Monday's light Laker workout at their El Segundo practice site. "Those are the rules. All right, fine, he can be an Idiot. What Rick Adelman doesn't want to do is wake me up, (by) crying and whining. He'll wake me up."

So, he tied his career playoff single-game scoring mark, but he is not yet awake?

"No," O'Neal said.

O'Neal pointed out that this season the NBA adopted new rules that forbid defenders from grabbing cutters across the lane, which, he said, means that he has every right to leverage himself into the key.

So, the annual public playoff debate over officiating – and which team is getting the benefit of the doubt and clout – began in earnest with both sides fixing a hard eye toward Game 2 tomorrow at Staples Center.

Interestingly, in recent years, the Lakers and O'Neal have mostly been the complainers, not the accused, and you can flash back to the Game 1 loss at San Antonio last season, when O'Neal screamed at the officials after the game, then smashed a VCR in the Laker locker room.

Is it an indication of O'Neal's and the Lakers' loftier positions in the minds of officials and the league that this time the Lakers find themselves in a switched role?

The Kings after the game Sunday argued that their superstar, Chris Webber, picked up several cheap fouls on the post against Robert Horry, which cost Webber dearly, while O'Neal broadsided Divac, and Scot Pollard at will.

Webber picked up his fifth foul toward the end of the third quarter when his arm banged into Horry's head and shoulders while they jostled for position.

Webber protested loudly, earned a technical foul to the delight of the Staples Center crowd, then barely made it into the fourth quarter before fouling out for good, whistled for charging into Derek Fisher.

"I might talk a little bit about officiating myself, if I'm prodded enough," said Laker Coach Phil Jackson on Monday. "I mean, really they shot 35 foul shots to our what, 15 (actually 14)? ... at's a disparity you usually don't see at home. It looked to me early that they weren't going to give any simple cheap fouls to Shaq, that Shaq was going to have to put the ball in the basket, and he was able to do that finally.

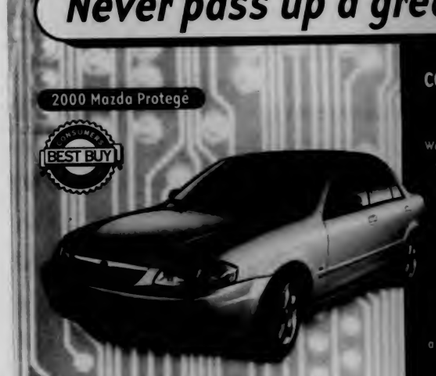
"There were just some funny things that happened like the end of that third quarter (with Webber), it was almost nonsensical. I don't think it boils down to refereeing as much as it just boiled down to who wanted the game more and who played with more intensity."

O'Neal shot only five free throws on Sunday, making four of them. Jackson, for his part, said that the Lakers were not intentionally trying to annoy Webber, though it did work out that way in Game 1.

"We're not looking to exploit people and their mental stability out there on the floor – that's not the way we want to play basketball," Jackson said. "What we do want to do, we want to take his territory away from him.

"And so Robert was trying to make him detour and go somewhere else, and this year the league has done a real concerted effort to try and limit the offensive player from displacing the defense. So you have to work for your pivot position; you can't just run somebody over... Chris just has to handle those things. He's capable of doing it. He's an all-star, he know how to do that."

Horry, a veteran of two Houston Rocket championship teams, shrugged and said the complaints, responses and retorts are all part of the familiar NBA playoff routine.



"Sometimes you say things (so that) the refs read the papers just like the normal people and they go, 'Hey, maybe we need to look at something,'" Horry said.

"A lot of times, it's just talk, to try to get the ref to say, 'Well, we're going to try to get Shaq some fouls.'"

Webber fingered Horry for exaggerating the contact to get the whistle, but Horry said that Divac's gestures and flinches against O'Neal were the true act.

It's a Beanpot turned massacre

UMass crowned victors in Boston

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

BOSTON – It's been about 230 years since a horrid massacre erupted in the evening of a cool March day in Boston.

Yesterday, it was the Massachusetts baseball team (18-15-1) that decided to bring down a carnage of its own upon the Northeastern Huskies (16-13) to win the 2000 Beanpot Baseball Championship, 13-8, at Fenway Park.

"If you can't play here, or get yourself ready to play here, then you're not much of a ballplayer," UMass coach Mike Stone said.

Northeastern	8

The Minutemen had no trouble adjusting to the intimidating presence of the Boston ballpark, going for three runs in the top of the first inning. Senior Shaun Skeffington led off the game, blasting a double to left center that needed only one hop to bounce off the Green Monster in left field. Two batters, two strikeouts and one wild pitch later, Chris Morgan lined an opposite field RBI single to left, bringing in Skeffington from third for the first run of the game. With Morgan on first, senior Kevin O'Connell drilled an inside fastball thrown from the grips of Huskie starting pitcher Matt Cavallaro over the Monster and into the leftfield screen to give UMass a 3-0 lead.

The Maroon and White added another tally in the top of the fourth when freshman Matt Boulanger dropped down a sacrifice bunt with the bases loaded to plate O'Connell who had reached on a walk.

In the top of the fifth inning, things started to get out of hand.

Skeffington took four balls to lead off the inning and then stole second a few pitches later before a Mike Kulak fly out to right field. Next up was junior Nick Gorneault who lined a double off the top half of the Monster to bring Skelfington in to score. Morgan took the very next pitch up the middle for a single, right before O'Connell drilled his first delivery from Cavallaro to opposite right field, plating Gorneault from second. Sophomore Aaron Senez followed the base knock from O'Connell with a single of his own to the same area to load the bases. Then, freshman Jeff Altieri stepped into the batter's box.

Crack. Altieri unleashed the one-out pitch from Cavallaro, sending it up and beyond the netting in left field.

"It felt great," Altieri said. "[Cavallaro] threw me a straight fast ball down the plate and I couldn't let it go."

Leftfielder Ben Beck took one step forward before realizing he had no chance whatsoever to make a stab at the ball, which he was watching sail over his head and onto Lansdowne Street. The Minutemen would add two more runs in the inning to bring the score to 12-0.

Todd Samolewicz, who got the starting nod on the hill for the Maroon and White, paced through the first five innings, not allowing single run to the Huskie offense.

"It's good to come in and get some innings in," Samolewicz said. "And to pitch well is even better, so hopefully I can build on this. I felt good warming up in the bullpen so it was a lot easier to concentrate on throwing strikes."

The Northeastern attack didn't crack Samolewicz until the bottom of the sixth frame when they went for two runs on two singles and a roped double, bringing the score to 12-2. He was pulled in the bottom of the seventh inning after giving up a solo-homer to Huskie catcher Luke Carlin, and infield hits to Mike Wysong and Pedro Pena. Samolewicz went six and two thirds innings, striking out six Huskie batters while giving up three runs, six hits, and a lone walk.

The final run for the Minutemen came at the top of the seventh on another Altieri explosion, this time a solo-shot into the left field net.

"I haven't swung a bat since Sunday. I don't think," Altieri said, chuckling. "Because I didn't play yesterday in

Stone credits unsung trio for title

BOSTON – By the time the sun began to work its way across the sky over Fenway Park yesterday afternoon, sending silhouettes of the light towers creeping across the infield, the Massachusetts baseball team had long since cast its shadow over the Northeastern Huskies.

The level of confidence was crystal clear early on, as a Kevin O'Connell first inning homerun over the Green Monster laid the groundwork for the rest of the afternoon. UMass left the opening inning with a 3-0 lead and never looked back.

By the fourth inning of the 2000 Beanpot final, the Minutemen had a comfortable four-run lead; the floodgates officially opened two innings later as UMass exploded for eight runs in the top of the sixth, going up 12-0 en route to its 13-8 Beanpot championship victory.

For the Minutemen (18-15-1), the tournament victory couldn't have come at a more opportune time. Heading into the event, the Minutemen stood one game over .500 at 16-15-1, a talented club that had yet to put together a consistent winning streak since the early days of the season. Having taken two key games from the Fordham Rams this past weekend, however, UMass went into the first round of the tournament Monday in Pawtucket with a wealth of assurance that only a streaking team could possess.

The Minutemen had good at-bats yesterday, were aggressive on the base paths and played solid defense to keep the Northeastern offense at bay. They also benefited from great pitching.

Eyes were raised at head coach Mike Stone's decision to start freshman Patrick Reedy on the mound Monday, a move questioned because of the freshman's inexperience. Reedy broke all expectations, however, spreading out five hits over nine innings and leading the Minutemen to a 4-1 victory over the Boston College Eagles. The perfor-

Senior midfielder Stephanie Pavlick tallied three times in yesterday's 7-6 win over the host Huskies of UConn. Junior goalie Jen Nardi was solid in the net, stopping 22 shots.

Senior midfielder Rebecca Minaker struck first for the Minutewomen, tying the game at one seven minutes into the first half.

UConn	6

UMass and UConn alternated goal scoring, tying the game at three, with both Minutewomen goals coming from Pavlick, her 22nd and 23rd of the season.

Rough defensive play ensued for the remainder of the first half, with UMass tossing two more goals by Huskie keeper, freshman April Pollock.

Junior attacker Fay Naber pitched in for her 11th goal of the season. Senior defender Melissa Miele also contributed to the game, putting the sphere through the pipes for the 12th time this season.

The second half opened with a quick point from UConn, which UMass responded to with two goals of its own.

Pavlick put the biscuit in the basket for the third time that game and the 24th time this year. Minaker also found the goal, her second of the game.

For the final eight minutes both teams played solid defense, and neither goalie allowed a shot past them.

The Minutewomen record their seventh win, with an overall record of 7-6.

The Huskies drop their 4th game this season, with 9 games falling into the win column.

UConn senior attacker Denise Gattinella scored her first her two goals in the game, her 3rd and 4th of the year, pushing the ball past Nardi less than two minutes into the game.

Connecticut junior attacker Abby Morgan tallied four minutes into the second half to bring the Huskies within one, scoring her thirteenth goal of the season.

With 9:27 left in the game, sophomore attacker Pam Lowie scored her 34th of the season, bringing the Huskies within two with less that 10 minutes left.

UConn freshman attacker Heather Bliss saw her 27th goal of the season, and second of the day, slip past Nardi less than a minute later.

Nardi finished the day with 22 saves, Pollock stopped 16.

UMass launched a total of 23 shots at Pollock; UConn got off 24 shots on goal.

UMass' next opponent is the North Carolina Tar Heels, at home on Friday at Totman field.

Sophomore attacker Kellie Thompson, of UNC, is a player to watch out for, as she's scored 31 goals this season, as well as passed for 16 assists.

Senior midfielder Meghann Mohler is also a force to be reckoned with. Mohler has tallied 21 times this season, while dishing out 7 assists.

Mohler has also been named to the All-ACC team this season, for the second year in a row.

The Tar Heels have made the best of a tough schedule, coming up big over teams like Johns Hopkins (14-6), Maryland (14-13, in four overtimes), and Loyola (8-6), winning nine games thus far, with one of those coming against Duke in the ACC tournament.

Conference rivals Maryland knocked UNC out of the tournament by a score of 17-6, to finish second in the ACC.

The Heels have also lost 4 games this season, to James Madison, by a score of 13-5, as well as the B.U. Terriers, 7-4.

Other losses have been handed to UNC by Duke, who beat them 8-7 in the their regular season match-up, and Georgetown, 13-7.

North Carolina has also beaten Virginia Tech 18-7, an A-10 team that defeated the Minutewomen 8-6.

David Rose on the NBA

The opening round of the NBA playoffs has the possibility of seeing three or four series go the distance. However, due to TV constraints, the first round will last until Ricky Martin produces his second hit song.

The timetable for the first round is hideous. For example, game three of the series between the New York Knicks and the Toronto Raptors and between the Los Angeles Lakers and the Sacramento Kings will not be played until this Sunday. If those two series, along with the series pitting the Detroit Pistons and the Miami Heat, and the series between the Utah Jazz and the Seattle Sonics, go to game five, they will be played on "Cinco de Mayo." WHAT?

By the time the playoffs are over, Bill Clinton would have left office and a two new presidents will have been elected. The playoffs will take so long that 76ers guard Allen Iverson will complain 10 more times about internal problems in the Philadelphia organization. The playoffs will be so long that Raptors' coach Butch Carter might sue me for calling him an "idiot."

But through all the waiting, games have actually been played.

The Utah Jazz have been, by far, the most dominant team, jumping out to a 2-0 lead against Seattle with game three pitted for, gulp, Saturday. Karl Malone delivered on Saturday with a half-dollar against a Sonic team that has had the Sonic Boom dropped on it. In fact, in the two games, Malone has outscored the entire starting frontcourt for Seattle 73-47. When center Greg Ostertag can dominate against you in the low post, you know your team is in trouble.

Unless a drastic change occurs up at Key Arena, Gary Payton and the rest of his teammates will be arriving for tee time at about 10 p.m. on Sunday.

The Knicks gave Vince Carter and the Raptors a rude awakening on Sunday afternoon at Madison Square Garden. Carter went 3-for-20 from the floor, or as the Los Angeles Clippers call it, "A great shooting night." However, thanks to Vince's super-cuz Tracy McGrady and his 25 points, the Raptors still had a chance to win the game at the end. But it was the experience of the Knicks coupled with a clutch three-pointer by grandma-ma, Larry Johnson that sealed the victory.

The Raptors are in good shape, surprisingly. They out rebounded the Knicks by 15 in game one. They shot 36-percent as a team. Their best player shot 3-for-20 and they were

After rumors and politicking, the Student Government Association passed, almost unanimously, three motions last night designed to eliminate the Senate's appointed representatives.

It took only four minutes for the issue of the appointed seats to be raised in front of the Senate and at least three and a half hours before it was finally resolved. In the time it took for those hours to elapse, there was at least one heated debate between SGA President Jeff Howe and members of the Asian Latino African and Native American Caucus.

Debated now for eight years, the appointed seats, which also include seats for appointed area governors, were described last night as a consistent sticking point for the senate.

After an initial plea by SGA Chief Justice Ricardo Rodriguez to wait until a weekend decision from the Judiciary, the Senate buzzed during announcements and motions.

Of the three motions, it was only the one scheduled to be debated last that caused serious problem. The motion called for a gradual elimination of appointed seats by allowing them to exist next year, be decreased to five percent of the entire Senate in 2001-2002 and eliminating them altogether in 2002-2003. The other two motions called for the creation of a new SGA cabinet position and a committee whose job it would be to investigate diversity within the senate body.

ALANA Senator Corey De Barros said that the ALANA Caucus was divided and that every side needed to be heard in the debate.

"You need to consider these sides when making your final decision," De Barros told the Senate. He addressed the issue of the seats' constitutionality, saying that no decision on that had been made and, until it was, the seats could be considered legal. He also took issue with the amount of time that it took for the decision to eliminate the seats to be made, saying that it took individuals 17 hours to decide something that had been debated for eight years.

It wasn't taken to my constituents, and my constituents don't support this. We should never make a decision until everyone's concerns have been heard and everyone's concerns haven't been heard," De Barros said, adding that while the concerns might not be educated, the SGA should still take the time to alert individuals about the issue.

His other main issue was that there was no way to know if the new committees would actually function the way they were planned.

"It's a good idea and a good start, but without results, we should wait," De Barros said. "This is a premature decision."

The room was quiet during his statements. The talking and whispering of earlier in the night had died away. De Barros finished his thoughts, saying that the committee and cabinet member needed to be in place with enough time to establish themselves before the change was accepted.

"Change is never instantaneous," De Barros said. "I'm begging you not to make this change."

Debating for the motion, Howe said that he understood the concerns of the ALANA senator.

"I've heard a lot of what Corey said before, and there should be reservations about these things working, but we're putting our faith into this legislation. We assume that it will work. Nobody in this room would create committees or cabinet positions based [on] they thought it was going to fail," Howe said. "The most important part about this motion is what we have time to see things change, a year and a half to see if the committees and cabinet position are working."

Howe said that he could only promise that he would work hard to see that things worked, and said that he hoped that future SGA administrations would continue the model that the SGA creates.

"All I can tell you [the Senate] is that the position created will be filled by the end of the year and that the person picked will help to publicize elections to all parts of campus. If that doesn't happen, then I've failed," Howe said.

Allotting the rest of his time to student George Chidi, Howe would later add that the issue of the appointed seats had been a problem for eight years and that diversity could still be promoted without the appointed seats. He said that the motions would have the opportunity to benefit the "this body, year after year after year."

Chidi, for his part, said that "not every student of color believes that these seats should be here."

"I was an elected representative when I was in this body," Chidi, who is African

UMass police fight for new contract

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts police officers have been working without a state-approved contract and pay raises for the last three years, and many officers are concerned that a pending decision in the state legislature may not come before their contract with the university expires June 30.

Police Chief John Luippold said that every three years the UMass Police renew their contracts with the university and it is passed along to the state legislature to await approval. However, he said this year the process has been taking longer than any of the officers had ever expected.

The UMass police ratified their contract last April after lengthy negotiations between the International Brotherhood of Police Officers Local 432B Union and university administration. The contract called for educational pay incentives between $1,000 and $2,500 dollars and 3 percent salary increases over the three-year contract period.

However, UMass employees are state employees and funding of contracts requires approval by the legislature and governor, and Luippold said, "here it is a year later and they [officers] still haven't received the money because it's waiting to be appropriated."

The contract is in the House Ways and Means Committee and Luippold explained that it's an issue of whether they've reported it out as funding or it it's still sitting on the Ways and Means agenda waiting to be approved. "Either case, the bottom line is it hasn't been funded," he said.

According to Luippold, if the contract were to expire before being approved by the legislature, the police officers would have to receive retroactive pay based on their previously approved contract and what it states they are entitled to receive.

"The contract that they have now should have started three years ago, and to date, they're still operating under old contract salary rates," Luippold said. "Chances are it's not going to be funded prior to the expiration of this contract."

Luippold explained that the UMass Police have always had difficulties getting their contract appropriated by the state for the very fact that the state refuses to recognize the police force as having the same benefits and duties as a city and town.

According to a statement in the Springfield Union News made by State Rep. Ellen Story, D-Amherst, the problem lies in the misperception in the Statehouse that the UMass Police are more similar to college security guards than to metropolitan police.

"UMass is like a little city," Story said. "It is just as difficult to be a police officer on the UMass police force as for a city. They should be treated the same."

According to her statement, Story explained that most Massachusetts representatives don't understand the responsibilities involved with a campus police squad at UMass, mainly because they've never been to Amherst.

Luippold expressed the feeling of frustration his officers have been operating with for the past three years.

"I think it's a pretty fascinating situation," Luippold said. "Realizing that we don't receive many benefits that cities and towns receive, to not have these officers receive the raises that they're entitled to, compound this feeling of disrespect from the state."

Cuban professor spoke on Gonzalez case

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Correspondent

Clinton Adlum, Cuba's Under Secretary in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Professor at the University of Havana, spoke yesterday at 7 p.m. in Bowker auditorium, highlighting Cuban and U.S. relations and discussing the Elian Gonzalez case from a Cuban perspective. The ALANA Lecture Series, the UMass African American Studies Department and the UMass Black Student Union sponsored the event together.

"The Elian case has got people to think in regard of 'what's going on down there?' Maybe people will start reflecting more seriously towards Cuba. It is my aim to explain 'who are these people?'" Adlum said.

"For the past 40 years you have been hearing about the current system in Miami. You have been receiving all kinds of information in favor of the Miami people and against the Cuban people. Another thing I should clarify, is that all Cuban immigrants are not like Gonzalez. The great majority of Cubans are people who decided to go abroad to the U.S. to search for a better life and abandon the country that has been subjected to a double blockade in the form of the Soviet Union and Eastern European countries. Whatever I say will be filled with the idea of exactly what has been going on and what we have had to put up with in order to survive," Adlum said.

Adlum explained his views on some of the history between the U.S. and Cuba and how he believed the United States held influence over Cuba in past years.

"There were secret and covert alliances [in Cuba] with your extreme right circles and backed by the U.S government and the CIA. After this, in the measure in which we [the people of Cuba] began to apply social justice, the United States reacted negatively. The minute we attempted to start changing not only the government but the system that made possible all the corruption and all the problems we experienced 60 years after 1902, the discontent started to erupt and these elite, in addition to having a lot of money, had full control over the country and the economy. They were white and close friends with the extreme right circles of the U.S. and on the side of segregationists. These powerful people convinced Congress to be against the revolution and have succeeded in establishing laws and procedures against the [people's] Cuban Revolution," Adlum said.

"Now, Cubans who come here on a barge are considered refugees. It is incomparable with immigrants from Mexico, Dominican Republic and all over Latin America; none of these people are considered refugees. They [the Cubans] are not searching for work, not running away from a Cuban regime. It has been built up. We have had to put up with forty years of propaganda," Adlum said.

Adlum added, "[Cubans] are a lot of nice people, a lot of decent people. All they want is to make a living, send money home to families and make a life."

Adlum spoke about his wishes for current world relations. "It is our desire to maintain best relations with all countries of the world including the U.S."

When speaking on the basis of strictly U.S. relations, Adlum said, "Relations must be on the basis of mutual respect. We are an independent sovereignty. No one in the world is going to succeed in establishing relations with Cuba on a different basis. When you ask about what I think about relations and improving of relations with the U.S., there are things in the way. We received sovereignty and independence, but that doesn't seem to be in agreement with the U.S. They understand it should be on another basis. For this, I don't know what to say."

When speaking about current politics in Cuba, Adlum discussed the changes restoring Cuba after the Batista regime. "When we overthrew Batista, the idea was to guarantee continuity. After 60 years of problems, drug trafficking, coup d' etat, etc., we, in 1959, attempted to end social injustice. As a result we have free education. Women in the past were objects of pleasure, now women are dignified. There is equal work for equal pay and even special provisions made to guarantee compensation for women with children. We uprooted racial discrimination, we implement school [in such a way] to guarantee no racism."

Today, Adlum added, "despite blockades, hardships, we are improving. We have a powerful medical service. We are capable of helping other countries, people in Angola and Nigeria, for example, where we have medical doctors, in many cases, free of cost. It is possible because we are not squandering resources. Cuban resources are not in the pockets of anyone; there is a good administration, a policy of solidarity, not charity, we are not offering leftovers. We share what we have. We believe in human rights [such as] the right to have good medical services, and a right to education, because people who are illiterate don't have the best use of resources."

Each year, the UMass police receive approximately 17,000 service calls and make between 300 and 400 arrests, on the UMass property alone.

Even with statistics comparable to the Amherst Police Department, Luippold said pay scales and benefits have always been relatively low in the past. He said that in the past, UMass officers have protested and raised awareness on campus to inform students that the state is not making security the student's top priority.

"In some cases, this leads officers to go to other [police] departments where they get paid more and receive better benefits," Luippold said. "For many cases, working for a town with less population than UMass."

Police Sergeant Thomas W. O'Donnell has high hopes for the upcoming months, and according to the April 12 edition of The Springfield Union News, he said the best estimate is that it will be completed some time in the middle of June.

Luippold said that the police department will soon be entering into negotiations for another contract, but he said they are waiting to see whether the terms and conditions of the contract currently in the legislature will stay in place.

This is part one of four in a series on the University of Massachusetts Police Contract.

Students across nation call for WRC involvement

By Ashleigh Graf
Daily Orange (Syracuse U.)

(U-WIRE) SYRACUSE, N.Y. – During the last three months, Syracuse University students have streaked across the campus quad topless and have spent the nights there in tents. They held candle lit vigils and stormed the chancellor's office, all in the name of the Worker Rights Consortium.

Students nationwide are joining their protest against sweatshops, attempting to coerce administrators to leave the Fair Labor Association and join the WRC, a watchdog group that implores clothing manufactures to disclose the whereabouts and employee conditions of their factories.

The FLA is an organization with a mission similar to the WRC, but involves corporations in monitoring the facilities that produce their own members' apparel.

Sam Brown, executive director of the FLA, calls the recent criticism of his organization a "diversion" from the real issue – sweatshops.

But WRC supporter Marika Wissink said the issue is the FLA and its allegiances.

"Our problem with the FLA is that we are running creditability to an organization that supports Nike and Kathie Lee Gifford," said Wissink, a senior in the College of Visual and Performing Arts and a member of the Student Coalition On Organized Labor.

Nike was sued in 1998 after allegedly producing its apparel under sweatshop conditions and in 1997, it was revealed that the Wal-Mart clothing line of television personality Kathie Lee was being manufactured in an illegal sweatshop.

But Brown contests the criticisms of the FLA, calling them unfounded. He added that his organization began in September and has not had adequate time to begin monitoring.

At the WRC's first founder's meeting April 6, members discussed definite policies for the organization. But the consortium does not monitor the facilities and instead employs non-governmental organizations.

"It is just going to tell everyone that there are terrible conditions," Brown said. "We know that."

WRC representatives could not be reached for comment after more than a dozen attempts. The FLA grants the facilities making its members' apparel two to three years to improve employee conditions, according to its Web site at www.workersrights.org. The association will tag the apparel that meets its standards and those that do not pass will be stated in a yearly report.

The WRC, however, will leave it up to the universities to take action once a factory is caught operating a sweatshop, according to its Web site. The consortium is concerned only with university apparel, whereas the FLA monitors other textile manufacturers in addition to its collegiate members.

As the WRC works with employees and non-government organizations to encourage corporations to release facility information, a code will be implemented that protects the rights of workers, the Web site said.

As colleges join the consortium, apparel contractors like Nike will have to change the conditions of their facilities if they are caught operating under sweatshop conditions, the Web site added.

University tug-of-war

As the debate rages over the two labor groups, SU Chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw questions which organization is better to evaluate facility conditions.

"There may be more than one way to ensure that these products are made in safe conditions," Shaw said.

For the past year and a half, President Bill Clinton and his administration have pressured all the nation's colleges and universities to join an organization that would ensure their goods were not manufactured in sweatshops, Shaw said.

But although some students are now pushing for SU to withdraw from the FLA – which it joined last year – Shaw said he is not going to rely on these protesters' whims.

"In the last analysis, I have to do what I think is right," he said. "This isn't a place that is run on referenda.

"Ultimately, like it or not, I accept the responsibility for making decisions."

Shaw said despite student opinion he still stands by the university's position, publicized March 23 in the wake of protest. The university is not refusing to join the WRC or pledging to remain in the FLA, but instead is taking the time to consider all options before making a decision, according to the announcement.

When SU joined the FLA in May 1999, however, the organization was still a poor choice because of the large role corporations have in its monitoring process, Wissink said.

There were not many options available at this time, Wissink admitted, noting that changing the structure of the FLA was possible. But as the organization expands, change becomes less likely, she added.

"I pretty much realized there would be no changes that would be really effective," she said.

Finer details

The FLA currently has a membership of 130 colleges, Brown said. Its monitoring is not only for colleges, but also other retail and footwear companies, he added.

Florida lawyers argue admission changes

By Matt Avery
Independent Florida Alligator (U. Florida)

(U-WIRE) GAINESVILLE, Fla. – A Tallahassee attorney argued Monday that the Board of Regents had no authority to make the sweeping university admissions changes required by Gov. Jeb Bush's One Florida plan.

The Regents were in administrative law court Monday responding to the first legal challenge to One Florida, which was filed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People several days after the plan was passed. John Newton argued on behalf of the NAACP that only individual universities can make admissions decisions. The One Florida plan replaces racial and gender preferences in university admissions policies with the Talented 20 Percent Plan, which automatically admits into the state university system students who graduated in the top 20 percent of their high school class.

"It lacks rationality," Newton said. "The Board of Regents was in such a rush to pass a rule that it didn't act in a reasonable way."

William Williams, a Tallahassee attorney defending the Regents, disagreed. He said rules set by the Regents "trump" those of individual universities and that to do otherwise "would throw the system into chaos."

The Board of Regents unanimously approved One Florida on Feb. 17. The NAACP quickly filed a challenge on behalf of Mattie Garvin, mother of Keith Garvin, an African-American high school student from Miami whom they argue will be denied "the benefit of the limited access programs governing admissions." The challenge contends the Regents do not have the authority to end race-based policies and did not properly notify the public of the extent of the changes they planned.

But Regents spokesman Keith Goldschmidt said the Regents have precedent for their One Florida decision. He said they have been developing admissions policies "as long as there has been a board."

"As far as we're concerned we followed the rules and we had statutory authority," he said.

While officials wait for a ruling, the NAACP challenge has already had an impact on university admissions. The Regents have suspended implementation of One Florida until the challenge is settled.

Goldschmidt said State University System officials will have to wait until Fall to see what effect the delay in implementing One Florida will have on minority enrollment figures. He said it was possible that by holding off, universities will not be able to attract as many students as was originally hoped.

The Governor's Office has estimated the Talented 20 Percent plan will bring up to 400 additional minority students into the SUS.

"With any delay, you run the risk of losing students who could have already been in the system," he said.

Goldschmidt said SUS officials are planning to send letters to high school students who would have been eligible for the Talented 20 Percent plan, encouraging them to apply even though the plan will not officially be in force. He said officials are only waiting for the state Department of Education to deliver a list of eligible students.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

American, said, "I didn't choose any of these ALANA senators before me, and while I don't doubt that they're doing a good job, it's the nature of democracy to pick leaders and to say 'I want you, no, I don't want you.'"

He added that it wasn't the SGA's responsibility to "protect diversity for students that can protect it themselves."

Asif Sayani, Grasson Senator, called for a roll-call vote. The motion passed 40 to 6. Although there was some clapping, the room had emptied after a break.

Those voting for the motion included ALANA Caucus internal chair Ianell James, who had earlier said during announcements that the caucus was "not trying to prevent progress" by removing their support of the motion.

"We removed it to show the divide in the ALANA caucus. There is division and skepticism amongst us," she said.

"Tonight," she said, "there will be a variety of opinions, please listen. It doesn't have to be a heated debate."

However, she was later involved in a fight in the hall with Howe and Senator At-Large Ken Campbell, while other ALANA Senators looked on. Senator Mark Boniface had earlier made an announcement that the motion about the gradual elimination of the seats should be debated on first, not third, as it was scheduled to be. He maintained that if the motion were passed, the other two would be. If it failed, he maintained, the others would fail.

James was worried that if the removal motion was debated first, it could be passed and Senators would then back out of their support of the other two.

"A proposal to fix the problem involved debating the motion in question second, thus allowing everyone to know if Senators could be trusted to pass all the legislation. Howe maintained, when talking to James, that there was a lack of trust among the ALANA caucus and the rest of the SGA.

"You have distrust of people in there the same was people in there have distrust of you, it's a fact of life," Howe said. "If you sandwich the motions and the first one fails, then I will withdraw the fucking motion. Period. End of discussion. Now that's not fucking politics, that's guaranteeing you something."

James countered by saying that "we will not petition (the fucking judiciary," if the motion failed.

Campbell entered at that point, saying, "they (the Senate) will petition until they feel the constitution is being followed, that the law is being followed."

He went on to say that if the parties interested in petitioning the motion decided to follow through with it, they would ask that it be mandated.

"It will say you have to follow this. That is what they're going to ask for, that's what I'm going to ask for," he said.

"If this passes, on my brief it will say, 'Please make this a mandate.' If this goes through as a mandate, in three years the seats will be gone," Campbell continued.

The argument was settled when it was agreed that the motion could be sandwiched between the other two. And after minimal debate, all three were passed.

After the meeting, Boniface said that each sides made concessions, but defended the motions as a good compromise.

"I am in support of all three."

Everyone that spoke to The Daily Collegian felt that the motions being passed was a good thing. Jini Ettringham, a senator from Coolidge Residence Hall, said that it was a good first step taken by the SGA.

"Our work isn't done, we have to make sure this works, and that's going to be up to our leadership and Senate next year," Ettringham said.

Howe said he thought that it was the best thing that the SGA had done "institutionally."

"We can focus on student issues rather than internal ones," Howe said, adding that he was glad things went so smoothly.

James, for her part, said she felt the ALANA Caucus represented their constituency.

"They reflected the division within the Caucus," James said, adding that she expected the "commitment of the SGA to diversity. I expect that commitment to be extended from now on, and from here on out."

Our Opinion

Improved Equality

Congratulations, Vermont. You are brave indeed.

On April 25, 2000, the state of Vermont became the first in the nation to pass legislation providing the legal recognition of same-sex relationships in much the same sense as that of marriage.

While not actually marriage, the soon-to-be law (Vermont Gov. Howard Dean is expected to sign the bill officially this week) makes same-sex unions almost identical. These "civil unions" provide that the same tax breaks, family leave, and other benefits currently provided to heterosexual married couples be available to same-sex partners. The partners will have to obtain a license and perform a ceremony, just like current legal marriages across the country; they will also have to go through a legal divorce with all the trimmings should they decide that they've made a mistake.

For all intents and purposes, gays and lesbians in the state of Vermont now have the right to marry.

And we wholeheartedly approve.

The legal barriers and discriminations that have existed against homosexuals have stood for too long in this country. While we have no right to pass judgment on religious marriage and what different religions allow in their marriage ceremonies, the official legal status of being married has absolutely no justification in being exclusive to traditional definitions that have a lesser and lesser significance in modern society. The process of eroding bigoted and archaic policies is a slow and long one, but this law is a definite step in the right direction.

Do not, however, get the idea that the legislators of Vermont just woke up one morning and said, "Hey, let's legalize gay marriage today!" It was a long process. It took a ruling from the state Supreme Court, direct threats of violence upon sympathetic members of the legislature, and finally a close 79-68 vote in the House to make the bill a law. Even now the opposed legislators are screaming bloody murder about the death and defamation of the state now that such an abominable law will be on the books.

Is it really the end of the world?

In a sense, yes. It would be more accurate, however, to say that it is more the beginning of a new world than the ending of an old. Equality for a long-oppressed (or simply ignored) population of Americans is finally coming into being, and that is certainly a rebirth of sorts.

We here at The Daily Collegian feel that it is about time that a law such as this took effect in America. More than that, though, we hope that legislation of this nature will now extend beyond the borders of Vermont to sweep the nation as a whole. Having one egalitarian state out of 50 is better than none, but an entirely free nation is the ultimate goal.

The stage is now set for gay rights to assume a greater importance in the national consciousness, and we could not approve more.

Congratulations, Vermont.

More important things in life

Despite what many people have said recently, there are a lot more important things out there than the Elian Gonzalez case. Yes, it is unfortunate to have a six-year-old boy lose his mother, and it's sad that he is "torn between nations," but there are more important things going on.

Don't worry, this column is not going to be yet another piece listing the pros and cons of having Elian in the U.S., and I am not going to be talking about "Elian's right to the liberties and freedoms that America can provide." Believe me, that's not the case at all; in fact, I think they should have returned him to live with his father from day one. We might not like Cuba, but so what... who are we to judge? Anyway, as I said before, this column is not going to be about that.

Although this case surfaced in the winter, the bulk of the media attention it has received has occurred during the springtime. But there are plenty of other things that have happened or will happen fairly soon, some other things that most of us would enjoy far more than the Gonzalez case.

Now, some of you out there might be offended by my "callous" treatment of this unfortunate affair. If you are, then I suggest you realize how much time and money was wasted on the whole situation, and then get over it. For the rest of you, here is a small list of things that I have dubbed, "Things Much More Important than the Elian Gonzalez Case." I hope you enjoy.

Yeah, I just found out about that one. I learned it from Jay Leno the other night. Tom Cruise? Brad Pitt? Nope. Why chose someone aesthetically pleasing when you can have the seed of David Crosby?! Whatever.

I'm not exactly sure what she was thinking about, but who am I to judge? I guess it doesn't matter that her children will probably be made fun of throughout their childhoods and will most likely grow up to be serial killers, but hey... at least their biological father (who will probably die by the time they're teenagers) was a celebrity!

Gary Mendese

Warm Weather and the Benefits that come with it

Call me a pig, but one thing that I notice every spring is the lack of clothing worn by the females on campus. This is much more exciting than the Elian Gonzalez case. I'm sure most guys would agree, and you women can't think anything less of me because you're the ones (not) wearing those clothes; and you're not doing it because sports bras are in style, either.

There's no Easter Bunny

Nope, there isn't. I discovered that one this weekend. There's no legendary bunny; however, there is Giggle Bunny and Giggle Ball (which by the way... thanks for those, mom. Now I'm definitely not going to get laid again).

Sam Adams Summer Ale is Coming Back

That's all I have to say about that one.

Same Sex Marriages are Essentially Legal in Vermont

Now, I don't know your feelings on this subject, but it's about damn time. It's great news because we all know that premarital sex is bad. And now that gay marriage is legal, homosexuals in Vermont can finally start having sex. Oh wait a minute...

Coolio was on Judge Joe Brown

What, you don't believe me? I saw the case with my own eyes! Hey, I love those courtroom shows (in fact, I have to admit that I'd love Judge Judy to "slam my gavel"). And it is especially cool when big-time celebrities like Coolio share their legal battles with the rest of us.

"Big rapper and multi-millionaire Coolio fights with local record company for a couple thousand dollars!" Thanks for sharing, Coolio. I'll see you at the bank.

Saddam Hussein died of syphilis

Oh, that didn't happen, but I can hope, can't I?

"Stone Cold" Steve Austin is back at the WWF

Oh my God... he's back! Whoop-dee-friggin'-do! Sorry to arouse all of you WWF fans but put your pants back on. I couldn't care less about steroid boy coming back, and the sexual behavior of bacteria is more exciting than wresting. Sorry.

Alexis Pushkar, my co-editor

She didn't even do anything. She just is. To put it simply, she rocks! I love looking at her debonair photo at the Ed/Op desk and I love when she makes fun of me every day. Nah, I'm just kidding. We have to bond because we're the only science dorks that work here. Well, that and the fact that she is so hot!

And finally, the last things that are more important than the Elian Gonzalez case are:

Americans are poor, thousands of other illegal immigrants are deported every year, gas prices are so high that wars could start to rectify the problem, kids are having kids, hepatitis is killing millions, and there are huge holes in the ozone layer.

See what I mean? Sure, most of the things I've talked about have been jokes, and I don't mean to make light of the welfare of a six-year-old boy, but we have to start dealing with the bigger problems that confront we Americans on a daily basis. The whole Gonzalez case had nothing to do with a child; it had to do with a political war between to rival nations, and millions of dollars were wasted throughout the ordeal.

Yes, the Gonzalez case touched the hearts of millions, but enough is enough. But hey, what do I know... I obviously don't have a clue, right? I'm too busy watching Judge Joe Brown and drinking Summer Ale.

When a friend takes the first plunge

I just found out this weekend that my friend from high school, Em, is getting married this September. The news of a friend getting married is always major, but this one is particularly significant because Em is the first of any of my friends to get engaged. After all of the joking around about which one in our clique would get married first, I guess reality will finally set in this fall.

This news is doubly shocking because Em, who attends the University of Utah, hasn't been seeing her fiancee for that long. In fact, the last time I had talked to her in December, she had only recently been dating this guy, though he had come out to visit her family her in Massachusetts. In high school, we guessed that our friends with long-term boyfriends would go first. But clearly, Em is setting a new precedent on my outlook on marriage.

It's important to understand the friendship between Em and I. We don't talk that much when we're away at school. She's visited UMass twice and I spent five days in Salt Lake during our sophomore year, but we've become June-December friends. We catch up on each other's lives when she's home and occasionally get together over the summer while she's vacationing in Maine (and who has the more exciting life, you ask?). When we're together, it's like we never spent a day apart. She's always the funny, goofy, beautiful friend we all love and I just tell sarcastic jokes and fill her in on all the home gossip that she hates to love.

Kathleen Ralls

My initial reaction was to call her up and berate her for not letting me know as soon as the question was popped. But she moved into a new condo and I couldn't get in touch with her family so I had to settle for an e-mail entitled Holding Out?! Her response was typical Em.

"It's kind of crazy but not at the same time... I know he is the one. We will be living in his house after the HONEY MOON..."

The one word honeymoon still makes me think of my parents hanging out at the Poconos Resort in Pennsylvania. It's totally outdated and almost not within my own comprehension to think of a friend of mine planning one.

Two years ago, two friends tried to figure out who would get married first from our high school circle. Those who were prone to steady boyfriends were served sentences in their early 20s. Next came those who are just plain likeable girls who wouldn't mind getting married. Unfortunately (or maybe not) for my friend Deb and me, we never made the list. Not even in our 30s. The two eventually got bored and returned to their homework before we were even given consideration. And for the time being, we will continue to take pride in the honor, no matter what it insinuates.

When my mom heard the news, her first reaction was of happiness, but she had reservations about her age. When I told her that Em would not be 22 until July she exclaimed, "But Em is younger than you, she's too young to get married!"

Mind you, "younger" signifies five months. Now this is coming from a woman who married at the age of 27 in the early 1970s. She was told by her older sister, who had already popped out her five kids by the same age, "You're too old to have children now." I guess we proved her wrong.

It got me thinking about how times have changed with weddings and honeymoons. While we are happy for Em, I can't say that we have felt additional pressure to "catch up." Nor do we feel undesirable or something to that effect. It doesn't change the way I want my 20s to be or make the idea of marriage any more appealing.

I think thirty years ago that might have been the case. Suppose one friend got married, it might have left other couples with the notion that at their age (say, 18-21), marriage should be at the forefront of their priorities. Thirty years ago, my mother probably wouldn't be exclaiming about how young Em is; rather, she might try urging me to get with the program. Thankfully, that wasn't the case.

I don't think marriage is as big a deal in a young person's life anymore as far as making it a priority to find somebody. No longer do women attend college to find a husband. Even during the late 1980s, when Hillary Clinton was attending one of the Seven Sister colleges, Wellesley, many of her fellow classmates just wanted to paste the elite name on their social resume to attract an Ivy League husband.

College sweethearts (another painfully outdated phrase) don't always make the perfect couple in six months when careers try to splice the relationship. People are more focused on where they are going to live and how much they are going to make in five years. Most don't want to think they are tied down to one person, and that they can date as many people as they want. Maybe it's good that people want to take time to get to know who they are and what they want rather than figuring it out with somebody else.

Of course, there are those like Em - those who want to make the commitment and know what's right for them and will maintain successful careers in the process. But I think they have become the exception to the rule.

Your subliminal dose

Ever since we were little kids, we have had anti-drug propaganda pounded into our heads. Whether it was Nancy Reagan and her "Just Say No campaign" or the 100 percent graduation rate of the D.A.R.E. program, we have been inundated with thousands of reasons and multitudes of unsolicited advice about not using drugs. Yet for some unknown reason millions of people continue to use and abuse elicit drugs. Some say it's because they're addictive, others say it's because they are fun. There are even bunches of people who believe the reason so many people use drugs is because of peer pressure. However, most people don't live near the ocean so I don't know what that's all about. Let me be the first to tell you that all of the previous reasons are hogwash. There is one definitive reason why people use drugs. And today, one time only (unless you get a hold of me and ask me to explain it again), I am going to let you know what that reason is.

Dan Viens

The one and only absolute, definitive, ultimate reason why people throughout the world use drugs is that the powerful governments of the world are giving off subliminal suggestions to the citizens of the world to do so. Through certain events, words and advertisements, certain key members of powerful governments around the world are prying into our minds and forcing many of us to use illegal drugs.

I'm sure that many of you students reading this are saying "Right on" or "I knew it, man." However, I know that many of the people who read my columns are respectable adult members of the real world who are probably ready to put this column down or maybe see what Kathleen Ralls wrote about this week. I beg you adult readers: please, do not stop reading. I have amassed a plethora of evidence from throughout our world that points to the secret subliminal suggestions we have been receiving for years that have been telling us to use drugs.

Let me start with psychedelic mushrooms. These are the delinquent cousins to those mushrooms that we put in our salad and on our pizza. The psychedelic variety, as many of you know, causes one to "trip," if you will. In other words you see and feel many strange sensations that are not real. Or at least don't seem to be. The layperson may say that people take these mushrooms because they are curious or because they are looking to expand their consciousness. This, however, is not the case. Anyone who has ever played Nintendo has had it embedded in their brain that eating big, oddly colored mushrooms is good for you. In case your gears are a little slow in moving, I am talking about Super Mario Brothers. In this video game of video games, what allows you to live longer? Mushrooms. What allows you to grow big and strong? Mushrooms. Mushrooms seem to be a magical vegetable that will always make things better when you eat them.

So you're still looking for another example. All right, here you go. What is the end product of a nuclear bomb? Answer: a mushroom cloud. Many people may say that this shows that mushrooms are bad. Nope. The last thing that people see when hit by a nuclear bomb is a mushroom. This means a whole bunch of things. First of all, it means that the place where they are going will have an abundance of mushrooms. Next it means that if they did mushrooms during their life they were on the right track. Lastly the mushroom cloud means that the end-all and be-all of everything is the psychedelic mushroom. End of story.

Now that we're cooking let's move on to heroin. A slang term for heroin is H. What is the universal signal, at least in America, that there is a hospital nearby? You guessed it: H. As you can see, the deadliest and most addictive of all drugs has the same symbol as the place where healing and birth takes place. Next time you take a road trip count the number of Hs on the side of the road. Someone out there really wants us to start shooting up.

I'm rolling, but I don't have much room left so I guess I'm just going to have to concentrate on the drug that's sweeping the nation: ecstasy. I guess it's been around for about twenty years or so, but it has really come into its own during the last five. For those of you who don't know, ecstasy is a drug that comes in a pill for the most part. Kids take it a lot now. It makes 'em feel good for a couple hours or so and then it's gone. A lot of times it comes with cute little pictures on it. Two major slang terms for ecstasy are E and Ex. Please don't tell me you think it is a coincidence that ecstasy is getting big at the same time that all the Internet companies named e-whatever are taking over the world. The government and police try to tell kids not to take it, but just last night I saw commercials for e-bay and e-toys. Then when I changed the channel in order to get away from their brain washing I stumbled upon the cable channel named only E! Come on now, this is getting a little ridiculous.

What about all of those housewives who are worried that their kids may be exposed to too much violence in their lives. They pushed for the standard ratings for all video games. Guess what the rating is if a game is suitable for everyone. Need some help? The answer is E. I guess if Super Mario Brothers came out today It would probably be rated E. Boy would that be a double whammy!

Hey, maybe you don't feel like taking the time to mail your friend a letter. Don't worry, just send them an e-mail. You've got a lot of Christmas cards to send out, but not enough time. Just abbreviate Christmas by writing Xmas. In Spanish, Xmas means more X. In English this means more ecstasy. Do you feel like connecting with nature and climbing a mountain? Well first you need all the right gear. You better run over to EMS. Another thing to look for on your next road trip should be the Estes shipping trucks. You probably won't even notice that they say Estes on them because all they have is a giant E on the side. Nobody is shipping anything in those trucks. Somebody out there just want kids to take E.

Here is the last example that I'll give and then you can go back to your subliminally vulnerable lives. What makes the world go round? What can you never have enough of? Why do you want a good job? The answers to all of these questions are money. In the eyes of many people in this world, money is the most important thing out there. "Money" – try to tell me that saying it doesn't sound like a Jamaican guy trying to sell you ecstasy. "Hey mon, E."

That's all I got to say. The truth is out there, and for the most part, it can be bought for thirty bucks.

Italian police recover Caesar's possessions

By Sarah Delane
Special to The Washington Post

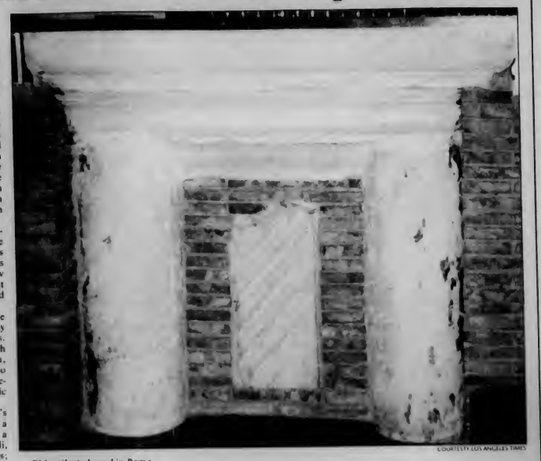
ROME – Armed with a search warrant, 10 members of a special Italian police unit descended on a lushly landscaped villa outside Rome earlier this month to look for a cache of stolen booty.

It wasn't drugs or arms they were after, and they didn't have to search very far: A second-century Roman sarcophagus had been transformed into a large, moss-covered planter; a dozen or so columns from a funerary monument blended nicely with the shrubs and pine trees; two pieces of a rare, delicately sculpted column from imperial times supported a wet bar in the rec room.

The find was important for archaeologists; the recovered artifacts have shed new light on daily life in this part of the world nearly 2,000 years ago. But it also demonstrated a new resolve by Italian law enforcement authorities against those who buy and sell artifacts.

Throughout the centuries, the grand, open-air museum that is Italy has been an easy target for thieves. The peninsula is littered not only with Roman ruins but also Etruscan, Phoenician and Greek artifacts–not to mention the vestiges of countless pre-Roman peoples and even prehistoric settlements.

Today, the plundering of Italy's archaeological treasures has become a highly lucrative business involving a sophisticated network of tombaroli, ravagers of archaeological sites; expert fences in Italy, Switzerland and England; and knowing buyers in the United States, Japan, Australia and elsewhere, authorities said.



After enduring years of criticism from around the globe for failing to care for its incomparable riches, Italy is now taking the protection, cataloguing and exhibition of these treasures seriously.

The Artistic Heritage Protection Command force of the national police agency has been expanded to 150 people; relations with police and customs officials in other countries have been improved; and a vast computerized databank has been developed to help track down stolen goods.

Authorities are also trying to prevent thefts by increasing staffing and improving security systems at cultural sites.

Last year, the unit recovered 27,000 pieces, more than twice the number of the year before.

"Our methods of prevention and recovery are always improving, but they must be complemented by public interest," said Gen. Roberto Conforti, who heads the Heritage Protection force. "If the public realizes that their cultural heritage is an expression of their identity, they'll be more apt to protect it. A collective conscience is the best thing."

Old artifacts found in Rome

Conforti and his agents decry not only the theft of a historic object but particularly its removal from its place of origin, the context in which it made sense.

"The value of those works is in relation to where they are found," he said. "They have historical value there, where they are supposed to be."

In the case of the sarcophagus and the other objects recovered from the villa in Avidonia, about 18 miles east of Rome, scientists were able to discern their origin.

"Usually, we don't know where recovered pieces come from, and we can't learn much from them," said Benedetta Adembri, an archaeologist with the government of the Lazio region, where the treasures were found.

"In this case, we know from historical records that a plaque found at the house – with the name Lucius Plotius Sabinus, a middle-level administrative official – and the sarcophagus came from a sacred burial ground discovered in 1890" near the villa where they were confiscated, Adembri said.

Incorporating ancient artifacts in the decoration of modern, private homes "is a mentality that must disappear," Adembri said. The column found in the Avidonia house was in good condition and may have come from the vast villa of the Emperor Hadrian in nearby Tivoli. Using it as part of a wet bar "shows only the incredibly kitsch taste of some people," she said.

Other offenders, however, are experts who know exactly what they are looking for. Conforti's unit recently confiscated more than 2,000 coins minted during the sixth century B.C. in the home of a scholar who writes about rare and ancient coins for numismatic magazines.

A 1939 Italian law says that all objects that lie under ground belong to the state and that any individual who finds an artifact must report it. But Conforti said that it it difficult to prove that someone came into possession of such items illegally.

The Ministry of Culture is trying to promote a new law that would offer amnesty from prosecution to people who acknowledge they possess illegal artifacts and turn most or all of them in, but would impose harsher penalties than currently called for on traffickers.

"At least then we would know what's out there," said Culture Ministry Undersecretary Giampaolo D'Andrea, "and (could) begin to apply the law seriously, prosecuting those who traffic or possess this material." The bill is still in parliamentary committee.

The greatest market for such objects, Conforti said, is the United States. Exportation peaked in the 1980s, he said, "but now we've gotten better cooperation with the customs officials and the FBI."

Author keeps mystery alive

LOS ANGELES – Fifteen down and 11 books to go. For Sue Grafton, it's a good thing there are only 26 letters in the alphabet.

Since "A Is for Alibi" was published in 1982, Grafton has been working her way to Z, chronicling the adventures of Kinsey Millhone, a tough, unpretentious private detective who pays her disability insurance even before her rent.

"When I sit there and think about the entire rest of the alphabet, I about have apoplexy," said Grafton, who later this month will turn 60.

"I lower my focus and think all I have to worry about is writing the next sentence well. Don't look at the big picture. Don't worry about the critics. Just get it down to which word goes in front of which. And if you can do that, then the rest will take care of itself."

One of the first modern hard-boiled female detectives, Millhone is a smart-mouthed, fast-thinking ex-cop based in Santa Teresa, a thinly veiled rendition of Santa Barbara. The setting is a natural for Grafton, who lives in Montecito and captures the aura with such clarity that you can almost smell the sea breeze.

Millhone is in her mid-30s (she ages one year every 21/2 books), twice divorced, no kids, no pets. She takes chances, makes mistakes and has even killed.

In the series' most recent installment, "O Is for Outlaw" (Henry Holt, 1999), Kinsey returns with her wry sense of humor and insatiable appetite for cheeseburgers.

"I steered with one hand while I munched with the other, all the time moaning with pleasure. It's pitiful to have a life in which junk food is awarded the same high status as sex. Then again, I tend to get a lot more of the one than I do of the other."

In "Outlaw," Millhone stumbles onto some long-forgotten personal mementos, including an unopened letter, that persuade her that a former husband isn't the murderer she thought he was. As he lies in a hospital fighting for his life, she searches for the real killer.

"Outlaw" is the first in the series to delve into Kinsey's first marriage, a subject that made Grafton a bit nervous despite having a solid following for the series with 42 million books sold worldwide.

It's no mystery that Sue Grafton is publishing a new book

U. Oregon loses millions as Nike president rescinds pledge

By Travis Reed
Minnesota Daily (U. Minnesota)

(U-WIRE) MINNEAPOLIS – Earlier this month, the University of Oregon decided to join the Worker Rights Consortium. Now, in the coming weeks, the school might be faced with another important decision: how to come up with an extra $30 million to finance an $80 million football stadium renovation.

Last week, a "well-placed source" at the Nike Corporation contacted a university representative to inform school officials that Nike President Phil Knight, a University of Oregon alumnus, had withdrawn his informal pledge to cover $30 million of the renovation's price tag.

The move is the latest in a series of shots the apparel giant has taken at the WRC, a grass-roots sweatshop monitoring group supported by student sweatshop activists and organized labor.

Last month, Nike moved to nullify its hockey equipment agreement with Brown University after the school tried to renegotiate its deal in accordance with the WRC terms. Principally, Nike says it is opposed to the WRC because the company isn't allowed to affiliate with the organization and can't sit on its governing board.

WRC supporters cry foul and accuse Nike of throwing money around to scare schools away from the consortium.

"It's obvious that (Knight is) trying to sway the school's direction with his money. That's the danger in the corporatization of schools," said Rana Kasich, a University of Minnesota Licensee Labor Practices Task Force member.

"He's obviously trying to interefere with the democratic process by using his money to influence it. It's really low politics."

Since Knight has made it big, his alma mater has been reaping the benefits of his success – cashing in around $30 million from the apparel magnate during the past 10 years.

But the school's decision to join a consortium that Nike says it is "fundamentally opposed to" has rendered Knight's relationship with the university tenuous, and has given him the inclination to take his philanthropy elsewhere.

So far, University of Oregon officials remain cautious about confirming the retraction of Knight's pledge. Duncan McDonald, the university's vice president for public affairs and development, said Knight didn't even have a formal pledge on record to help fund the stadium project, and the school isn't jumping to conclusions until they speak with Knight directly.

But Nike spokesman Simon Pestridge said "the facts are very clear," and "the call went in from Phil's right-hand man" to express disapproval of WRC membership and pull Knight's financial backing of the project.

But neither party is sure how anyone has arrived at the $30 million contribution figure. Nike officials won't talk because they won't dahhle in Knight's personal affairs, and McDonald expressed frustration that "nobody is on the record."

McDonald would not speculate conclusively on how the school might react to Knight's decision, but said it was the result of a careful and deliberate process.

European economies ill-prepared for crisis of retiring baby boomers

By Anne Swardson
Washington Post

ROME – Elisabetta Valle, 50, is on the leading edge of an oncoming European financial crisis that threatens to bankrupt nearly every major government on the continent.

Her daily schedule doesn't show it. Valle spends her days fussing her children to school, running errands, shopping for groceries, taking the kids to swimming practice, then bringing them home and cranking up the housework.

But once a month, her routine varies. She cashes her pension check.

Valle, like 5 million other Italians under age 65, is a youthful retired pensioner. She receives the equivalent of $800 a month from the government pension plan. If she lives to be 80, her tiny pension will have cost Italian taxpayers $316,800.

Retirement was a rational choice for Valle nearly three years ago, when the school where she worked eliminated the art-and-drawing classes she taught. In Italy, her sort of early retirement was not only permitted but common. Like everyone else, she paid in and now she gets to take out.

Still, she feels guilty.

"I know there is not going to be enough money for everyone," Valle said. Added her husband, Guido Rasi: "It's a crazy use of public money. Our children will pay for this."

By 2023, an estimated 11.5 million Europeans – nearly one-third of the population – will be pensioners, Romano Prodi, president of the European Commission, warned recently in a speech. Nearly all will be covered only by government-financed pension programs.

These aging baby boomers will be an unprecedented drain on their governments and their children, creating enormous pressure to raise taxes or cut spending, and presenting a serious threat to the euro. While the United States faces similar demographic challenges, European countries – especially Italy, Germany and France – are in far bigger trouble and have been slower to enact reforms.

The looming crisis is the result of three major factors: No European country is producing enough children to replace its current population, which will lead to a decline in the base of workers contributing to the pension systems. The last time Italian women bore more than two children on average was in 1945, before Valle was born. In 1997, the average number was 1.22.

Italy's population will shrink 28 percent, to 41 million from 57 million, between 1995 and 2050, according to the United Nations. The European Union, which now has 103 million more people than the United States, will have 18 million fewer as Europe shrinks and the United States grows during this period. And widespread European hostility toward immigration makes it unlikely that people from other countries will fill the gap.

Workers retire early. Although the legal retirement age is 65 in most European countries, the financial penalties for early retirement are so minimal that men retire on average at 61, more than two years earlier than in the United States. The average for European women is 58. Fifty years ago, European men and women worked seven years longer than they do now, and lived 11 years less.

Pension schemes "are so generous it's almost like giving money back to the government if you work longer," said Ian Mantel, a consultant to the brokerage firm Merrill Lynch and Co., which published a 1999 report on European pension reform. "The trend toward early retirement is the biggest problem in the system in Europe for the last 50 years."

In most countries, few private alternatives supplement taxpayer-financed systems. Private pension funds such as corporate pensions or 401(k) plans are nonexistent, weak or are just beginning in much of Western Europe. In France, they're illegal; a 1997 law permitting them was never fully enacted because of union objections. Italy is just starting tax-favored savings funds. Corporate pensions cover half of German workers, but the funds' financial solvency is questionable.

According to Merrill Lynch, only 7 percent of European Union workers are covered by corporate pensions and only 0.9 percent by private savings plans equivalent to 401(k)s. Thus, nearly all workers will be entirely dependent on government-paid retirement benefits, similar to Social Security, upon retirement.

So the burden of the retiring baby boom generation, which will hit in earnest in about 10 years, will weigh upon working taxpaying Europeans far more than their American counterparts. In the United States, there will be one person older than 65 for every three of working age in 2030, according to International Monetary Fund estimates. In Italy and Germany, the ratio will be one to two.

In both those countries, the official figures hide the full impact because so many people retire before 65; experts say Italy and Germany likely will have one worker for every retiree in about 30 years. By some calculations, taxes will rise so much there that half of workers' income will go to taxes to support retirees, with taxes for other purposes on top of that.

The United States also faces a demographic crisis, but some reforms have been implemented. The retirement age for Social Security is being raised from 65 to 67 over the next 22 years, for instance, and a higher rate of immigration means the U.S. population is growing and is younger than Europe's.

In Europe, a new factor has raised the stakes: the euro.

The new European single currency has locked the economies of 11 European countries together, and all are governed by one monetary institution.

Thus, a demographic crisis that requires the Italian government to pay pensions to more people could raise inflation in Ireland, even if the Irish government can take care of its own retirees – because higher government spending in one country can raise the general inflation rate. If France spends its way into a deep deficit to support an aging population, Dutch bank buyers may pay higher interest rates on their mortgages, because big government budget deficits tend to raise interest rates.

Should such a crisis erupt, experts say, it's hard to imagine the euro union holding together. European Commission President Prodi has been sounding warnings since taking office last fall, but only national governments can change their own retirement rules.

"The bottom line is that generational imbalances across the euro zone gravely threaten the single currency's medium-term stability," wrote historian Niall Ferguson and economist Laurence J. Kotlikoff in this month's Foreign Affairs journal. "The choice for nearly all members is between tax hikes on a scale unprecedented in peacetime or drastic government spending cuts. SUMMER CONCERTS

TOP 10 AREA CONCERTS OF THE SUMMER

By Ryan Benharris

Pearl Jam at the Tweeter Center on July 29 & 30 – There is simply no better show on the planet than Pearl Jam. I've seen them once before and they truly put on the best show that you could ever imagine. The last time that I saw them was at the Meadows in Hartford, Connecticut. Dutch bunic buxvts may pay higher interest rates on their mortgages, because big government budget deficits tend to raise interest rates.

Should such a crisis erupt, experts say, it's hard to imagine the euro union holding together. European Commission President Prodi has been sounding warnings since taking office last fall, but only national governments can change their own retirement rules.

"The bottom line is that generational imbalances across the euro zone gravely threaten the single currency's medium-term stability," wrote historian Niall Ferguson and economist Laurence J. METALLICA INVADES THE LAND OF THE PATRIOTS

OZZFEST: THIS SUMMER'S BEST TRAVELING FESTIVAL.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

All previous collections of metal artists inside this summer with a tour that features perhaps the most power chord driven bands that have ever assembled at the same place and time could prove to be the one that sends the boys in black to the forefront of popular culture once again.

Already picking up steam after a period of time in the early '90s that was devoid of headlining heavy bands, the current metal influx of bands like Limp Bizkit, korn and Godsmack could see their "cause" get the push it needs to finally complete a movement of metal to the mainstream.

The tour in question includes heavy revolutionary Metallica, who has carried the torch of the genre since 1983, when they released their first album, Kill 'Em All, and the eye-popping lineup of Kid Rock, System of a Down, Powerman 5000 and, of course, the aforementioned Korn.

The tour, which will take place in stadiums across the United States is headlined by Metallica and is dubbed the "Summer Sanitarium Tour," undoubtedly after the classic song off of 1986's Master of Puppets.

Perhaps in the theme of one of Metallica's more recent singles, "Fuel," the tour is making its way primarily around motor speedways – including dates at Rockingham Dragway in Rockingham, North Carolina, Gateway International Raceway in St. Louis, Missouri, and the Kentucky Speedway in Sparta, Kentucky.

Ironically, though, the tidal wave of black will make its most local stop at where next to no movement on the ground happens, at the home of the New England Patriots, Foxboro Stadium.

Winds blow from the bowels of Hell again this summer as the Ozzfest tour is set to begin its fourth nationwide jaunt starting at the beginning of July. Sponsored by Sega Dreamcast, the metal mania rolls by these parts on July 29 and 30 at the Tweeter Center. Hot off the success of last year's Black Sabbath-headlined show, Ozzy will host the show for what he claims will be the final time, although he'll be maintaining involvement in future Ozzfests to be hosted by other major acts. The official Ozzfest site at www.ozzfest.com assures fans that while much will stay the same, there will be both improvements and additions. The site features preliminary sketches from artist Perry Blake, which show what the stages will look like this year, and massive elements and crimson reds are the dominant aspects. Also, Roy Mayorga, formerly of Soulfly, will be assuming the position of Ozzy's drummer this year. Fans can also expect another hilarious Ozzy intro movie, which is currently in production.

Never Neverland, the line of kiosks which features tattoo artists, piercing, jewelry, and the infamous breast painting, will be back in full force this year, in addition to Sega kiosks which will feature a variety of Sega products with an obvious focus on their successful Dreamcast system. Reveille has also recently been added to the second stage, splitting the tour dates in half with newcomers Pumpjack, who will take over duties at the beginning of August.

The lineup this year is formidable, but can't really compete with past years, mainly due to some poor choices, placement, and repeats from previous Ozzfests. The main stage will feature, in addition to Ozzy, Pantera, Godsmack, Static-X, Incubus, Methods of Mayhem, P.O.D., and Queens of the Stone Age. Pantera, behind Ozzy, is the undisputed highlight of this year's lineup. Their recent album, Reinventing the Steel, again reaffirms their position as the kings of modern metal, and they will no doubt ignite the stage. Southern style Godsmack, returning to the main stage again this year without another album under their belt, seems a poor choice despite their popularity, so hopefully some new songs will generate more interest than hearing "Whatever" for the bagzillionth time. Static-X also seems an unlikely choice since they too were just part of the festival last year and have released only a couple of new songs since last year. I love Static-X, but with Marilyn on the same tour, they'll have to work much harder to make an impression with their industrial sound.

Incubus' presence on the main stage is another absurdity, and the relative none of their fellow [illegible] off, will provide a nice contrast to the other heavier acts. Queens of Mini-hatred Jonny Lee's rap/metal offering, is just crap and shouldn't be on the road at all, let alone the prestigious main stage. P.O.D.'s recent buzz is certainly instrumental in landing their main stage spot, although their mid-afternoon time slot will make it hard for them to make a substantial impression. Queens of the Stone Age, a sludge-rock group in the tradition of Monster Magnet and Kyuss, will have an even harder time impressing the sparse crowds with their early time

Dave Matthews Band and N'Sync are the top two worst concerts this summer

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

Dave Matthews Band at Foxboro Stadium on July 8 and 9, and the Hartford Meadows on August 25, 26 and 27 – If you paid $55.00 to see Dave Matthews with Ben Harper at Foxboro Stadium, you should be ashamed of yourself. If you paid $110.00 to see the show two days in a row, you should punch yourself repeatedly. With parking prices, the total for two days of Dave will be more than $150.00. They're a great band, but they're absolutely not worth that much money. Certainly not for nose bleed seats. Oh, and by the way, if you paid $275.00 (that's assuming you're only paying for tickets for yourself. Multiply that by two to get $550.00, if you have a significant other) to see them both times at Foxboro and all three times in Hartford, you're not a die-hard fan, you're an idiot.

N'Sync at Foxboro Stadium on June 23 – The only thing dumber than paying $110.00 to see DMB is paying double that to see N'Sync. If anyone finds out that you went to see this concert say "Bye, Bye, Bye" to your dignity.

No Doubt with Lit and the Blackeyed Peas at Fleet Boston Pavilion on June 22 – This show may be cool if it weren't for the terrible opening bands. Why doesn't the world realize that Lit is horrible? It seems like every time I turn on the radio I hear one of their awful songs. Every miserable song they release is worse than the last one. Plus, No Doubt has no place headlining a show at that big of a venue. They're an opening act for a band like Foo Fighters at best.

Tina Turner at the Fleet Center on June 9 – The fact that this show is sold out is sad. I didn't realize that so many people still care about Tina Turner. I'm sure the show will be a display of Tina basking in her oldness. I'd rather stay home and watch "Golden Girls."

92 Pro-FM Birthday Party in Providence on June 4 – This line-up is very, very wrong! The stars appearing on stage are Mandy Moore, Train, Goo Goo Dolls, Hanson, and Bon Jovi. What the hell is Bon Jovi thinking? I'd love to see Bon Jovi, just to be taken back to the time when I thought he ruled. However, I'd rather have the electroshock therapy that was administered to Mark Wahlberg in Three Kings than sit through the torture that would be created by Mandy Moore, Train, Goo Goo Dolls and Hanson. Don't question me on that either. I've actually been to a Hanson concert.

If you want to see Dave Matthews Band this summer, prepare to shell out much more money than they're actually worth.

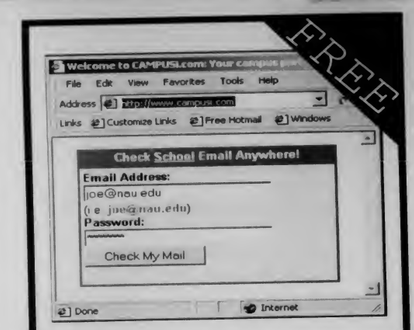
STP rock WBCN's Rave

On Saturday May 27 WBCN will hold it's annual WBCN River Rave at Foxbourgh Stadium. Previous years' acts have been Stone Temple Pilots, Blink 182, Mighty Mighty Bosstones, Everclear, Lit, Live, Red Hot Chili Peppers, SilverChair, and The Offspring, to name a few. This year's concert promises to be equal or even better than those of previous years.

This year the show will change venues. In previous years it was held at The Tweeter Center (formerly Great Woods), which holds only 19,900 people, and by moving to the home of the Patriots, the number of fans will increase dramatically, as will the variety of music that will played.

The Canadian all-female goth band, Kittie will be in attendance, as will one of last year's top young bands, Five 6. Also performing will be Bloundhound Gang, Powerman 5000, Godsmack, Filter, and Static-X. And then come the big acts.

This year at the River Rave will be the Mighty Mighty Bosstones and Cypress Hill (both alums of last year's UMass Spring Concert), Everclear, and returning for the first time in three years will be Stone Temple Pilots.



The show, which has already sold out, promises to be a good one with new local bands and well-known national acts, so do what you can to find a ticket.

Fight for Elian consumes tube

Last Saturday I woke up at about nine o'clock and flipped on the TV (big surprise there) hopefully to regress and catch up on some cartoons from my past. The classics from our youth like "Thundercats," "Transformers" and "M.A.S.K." are, of course, nowhere to be found. Now every cartoon has some sort of digital computer graphic aspect to it. As I was pondering what to watch, the choice was between "Saved by the Bell: The New Class" and "Batman", I stopped at what would turn out to be the most compelling program I had seen in a while.

What I stopped at blew Kelly Martin being stabbed on "E.R." out of the water.

You thought Jimy Smits dying was good acting – it was nothing next to what I saw. What I saw made Dawson and Joey's break-up (both times) look like a vaudeville act. On this particular morning, I had stopped on CNN and it's continuing coverage of Elian Gonzalez and his trek back to his father.

At first I didn't know what I was watching. On the screen were two hysterical people, shouting stuff like, "I hope he's okay." "I saw them drug him. I want to know what happened" and "We kept this helmet as evidence because we intend to sue the U.S. Marshall service." The couple, which was on the verge of tears, turned out to be the man who saved Elian and Elian's second cousin once removed (or something like that). Elian was now in the protective custody of the U.S. Government and well on his way to see his father.

All I have to say is that CNN rules. These guys are everywhere. Five months of intensive coverage finally paid off when they were on the scene at five in the morning as the U.S. Marshals raided the house, taking Elian and placing him in a white minivan. For a moment I thought I was watching clips from CNN's coverage of the Gulf War. Army fatigues, guns, screaming people – the only thing that didn't fit was the fact that the houses had white picket fences. And it only got better as the day unfolded.

CNN became king of "dangerous reporting" during the Gulf war with its non-stop coverage of the skirmish – those brave correspondents who made us forget that the war was being fought for cheaper gas and oil prices and made us believe that we were indeed freedom fighters. Sure, Jennings, Brokaw, and Rather were at base camp talking to Stormin' Norman and other high-ranking officials, but CNN had people inside Iraqi hotels. They had correspondents breathing through gas masks and whispering into microphones. What did NBC have? They had Maria Shriver giving the American people and in-depth analysis of the camouflage outfits. And since then, CNN correspondents hadn't seen much action, until lil' Elian came along.

Before you knew it, federal cops were tear-gassing people in front of Elian's "home". Later that day in Little Havana, Miami, a simple rally turned into a scuffle when a woman refused to move her car from an intersection. This led to cops arresting her, and then a broken window across the street. Soon more angry people had congregated and began to set things aflame, including a dumpster full of trash. Miami's finest approached the crowd with riot gear, firing tear gas and pepper spray. And as the correspondent on site relayed what he was witnessing, you heard his voice rising. When they broke out the tear gas, he just kept on repeating that tear gas was in fact being used. He continued to comment on just how potent this stuff was. I was half expecting him to say, "But it's not that bad as the time I was in Baghdad and there was a gas scare. No sir. Now that was a scare."

I must commend CNN, however, on their journalistic integrity throughout the day. Every correspondent and anchor delivered the news professionally and without voicing their opinion on whether they thought the U.S. Government was acting rightly or not. CNN's coverage was so good that ABC was showing CNN footage instead of sending some of its staff.

Even when the exciting rallies were being dissolved and it was quite apparent that some people had given up, CNN continued to give us updates from Washington and the Air Force base where Elian was reunited with his father. CNN proved once again why they are, as James Earl Jones says, "The world's number one news service".

What to Watch

What to watch? I'll tell you what to watch. Starting tonight and for the next four weeks "E.R." will be totally new. That's right, now you don't have to watch episodes that are so out-of-date that you are seeing characters that left the show years ago. These next four weeks will lead to the season finale in which nurse Carol Hathaway will leave County General to go out west to be with her beau, Dr. Ross. "E.R." might always seem to be in reruns, but its season finales never fail.

Also, it might be fun to check out this week's "X Files." Directed by David Duchovny (who wrote last year's alien/baseball episode), this episode looks like it's going to spoof the show, with Gary Shandling as Mulder, and Duchovny's real life wife Tea Leoni as Scully, as the "X Files" goes Hollywood.

If you liked "The '60s", you'll want to tune in for "The '70s"

By Brian Lohnes
Collegian Staff

This Sunday night at 9 p.m. NBC will air "The '70s," a look at four friends through a tumultuous decade. Following closely in the footsteps of its earlier production "The '60s", "The '70s" finds a group of friends involved in every major event of the decade. Starring as the four friends are Brad Rowe ("Wasteland"), Vinessa Shaw ("Eyes Wide Shut"), Amy Smart ("Varsity Blues", "Felicity") and Guy Torry ("American History X").

If and when you do tune in to watch the mini-series, have the right mindset. If you are looking for a history lesson on the 1970s and all of its major events, you may be disappointed. But if you are looking for a nostalgic take on the biggest and juiciest events of the disco decade, you will enjoy it.

Looking at it straight on, the idea sounds preposterous, that four people who know each other will be involved in almost every major event of the decade, but it does make for some fun television. Rowe plays Byron, a conservative-minded law school student who gets swept up by Richard Nixon re-election fever. Byron soon finds himself moving up the ranks of the political ladder and each step brings on more shady dealings with the Nixon campaign. Rowe's performance leaves a little to be desired; he doesn't quite fit the part of the slippery Nixon pawn that they want him to be, and comes across as a square peg trying to get into a round hole.

Torry plays Dexter, a man we meet as a National Guardsman at Kent State. He is with a unit of soldiers keeping an angry mob of anti-war protesters at bay. A shot is fired and all hell breaks loose, leaving four students dead. Dexter becomes disenchanted with the military and goes AWOL, escaping to Los Angeles to hide away. Soon Dexter finds himself working his way up the power scale of the Black Panthers and becomes a victim of underhanded government tactics. Torry, a comedian, does an excellent job with this role. In a part that could easily have been overacted, Torry knows when and where to pour it on.

Vinessa Shaw plays Eileen, Byron's love interest at Kent State. Shaw leaves Kent State to escape the memories and ends up in NY. She becomes exposed to the new ideas of feminism and at first rejects them for traditional family ideas. Then her mother gets divorced and Eileen finds herself agreeing more with the ideas of this growing movement. Eileen is stifled by male employers throughout her career and finally decides to file a sexual discrimination lawsuit. Her relationship with Byron over Eileen tries to find a new love interest but can't leave Byron's memory behind. Shaw gives the best performance of all four of the major cast members, she does a good job with her role as a woman struggling to come to grips with changing social views.

Finally, every story needs a wild child like Christie, who is played by Amy Smart. Christie always seems to be able to find a party – unfortunately for her this usually doesn't carry the best results. She becomes involved in modeling and drugs, which leads to the death of a boyfriend and her life is never quite the same again. She runs into a porn filmmaker and even winds up in a cult. Smart does her best as the "out for a good time character" and generally pulls it off, although I do have to admit that the cult element was pretty weak.

I found NBC's "The '70s" to be highly entertaining and fun, even if a little campy. It is an enjoyable and somewhat accurate look at one of the wildest decades in American history. B+ be playing at this year's spring concert in the Mullins Center on May 7 as well) on the bill, it should not be missed. Ticket prices have not been announced yet, but you can be sure that they'll be so cheap that you'll be saying, "That is a price I'd even pay just to see Green Day."

Roger Waters at Providence Civic Center on July 11 – Ah, the desire to bring back Pink Floyd. Waters had a fairly successful tour last year, and the reviews were excellent. His show at the Civic Center should prove to be one of the best of the summer. Though it is always better to see a show outdoors in the heat, I think it would be more difficult for Waters to put on a killer light show. I'm sure that this is something that he doesn't want to sacrifice.

Counting Crows and Live at Tweeter Center on August 16 and at the Hartford Meadows on August 23 – The fact that Live is opening for anyone should be considered a crime. However, I can't take anything away from the Counting Crows. They are a remarkable band to see perform, and Live simply adds to the greatness.

Ozzfest at the Tweeter Center on July 29 and 30 – I don't think I'll be able to attend the Ozzfest, but I would love to see it. I think that truly to be a rock fan you should have at least have been to the Ozzfest at least once. I'm sad to say that I am still not a true rock fan.

Sonic Youth at the Avalon on June 15 – If 25 bucks is too expensive for you to spend on 311 tickets, check out Sonic Youth at the Avalon for only thirteen dollars.

WBCN River Rave at Foxboro Stadium on May 27 – The River Rave should be at Great Woods, but the truth is that the line-up is simply too big for the Tweeter Center to handle. I'd like to see Stone Temple Pilots while Scott Weiland is still out of prison, and I still haven't seen Godsmack or Filter. However, Eve 6, Kittie, Everclear, and Cypress Hill weaken my attraction to the show. I think the highlight of the day will be when 70,000 fans simultaneously scream "Let's do it like they do on the discovery channel," during the Bloodhound Gang's performance. Tickets for the event are already sold out.

Crew of Noise prepares to deliver visual messages with film showing

By Ryan Benharris and Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

While most low-budget student films are lacking in many different aspects, Shawn Downs' film Noise proves to be something very unique. Tonight he will open the world to his first feature film that he has prided himself upon, having spent over two years in the process of writing and producing. The film will be shown at 8:00 p.m. in room 165 of the Campus Center.

Noise is the story of Boo, played by Downs, a character derived from his life as both a writer and director. The plot centers around a radio show called "Noise," which is hosted by Boo and his best friend Bradford, played by University of Massachusetts freshman Jesse DeAngelis. The story begins when the two make a proposition to offer a date with Boo as the prize to the highest donator for the station fundraiser. When options begin to arise, Boo finds himself in the middle of romantic relationships, while at the same time trying to discover his specific place in life.

DeAngelis' character, Bradford, has his own difficulties surrounding his relationship with his girlfriend Jen, played by UMass freshman Krista Jayne. DeAngelis and Jayne are two of the film's strongest parts. Their superior acting talents and wonderful chemistry make the most interesting scenes. One scene of worthy mention takes place in a campus restaurant and includes a detailed argument between them. DeAngelis and Jayne complement each other very well, something that is difficult to do in any picture, let alone a student-produced film. The fact that these two work so well together strengthens the film even more by allowing for the love-seeking Boo to be admired as somebody we can all relate to at some point in our lives.

Downs is very quick to point out that life has flaws. All of the relationships in this film are not perfect. There are several fights among the characters, friends and acquaintances. Lucy (Jaclyn Sobel) is a mentally and emotionally unstable character that with whom almost no one gets along. Downs' point is clear. Interpersonal communication has many different levels of conflict that need to be dealt with.

Downs is certainly proud of the work that went into the film, which he said took over a year to write. It is brilliantly edited and allows for the film to carry at most times an interesting storyline.

"Shawn has an incredible way of taking three hours of unorganized, adlibbed dysfunction, and turning it into ten minutes of watchable, entertaining film," Jayne said.

Downs has exceptional talent in the field of cinematography. His use of the camera is quite unique. The entire film was shot with one camera in super VHS format. However, Downs is able to deceive his viewers into believing that there are two cameras through precise editing. His use of color is remarkable. He is very cautious as to which scenes are in color. All of the conversations that take place in the radio station are in color, and there is one scene that displays nature as a very colorful and beautiful wonder. Downs has the ability to take the most uninteresting landscapes and turn them into a splendor of reality.

The potential harm of the movie is that some scenes seemed to drag, and as a two-hour production, it could have been much shorter. Also, there are dangers in producing a movie where the creator resembles the lead character. A filmmaker will always have some difficulties crossing the boundary from director to actor, and Downs is no exception. Kevin Smith is an excellent example of this. Even when he places himself in his film, he is hidden in the back, careful not to disturb the normal flow of the story. There is plenty of possibility for Downs to struggle with this transition since he represents the crucial role.

The cast and crew of the film seemed to enjoy working on this project.

"Filming certainly wasn't in a professional atmosphere by any means, but for a college production I think we did pretty good," Jayne said.

With their project, Downs and his entire crew will now turn to UMass students to join their endeavor. In their constant desire to be seen, they will finally bring their finished product to the Campus Center tonight. The cast and crew of Noise urge everyone to attend a production that could not have been accomplished without student support.

slot and far from easily accessible sound.

The second stage, headlined by Ministry, features a daunting eleven bands, with the usual few unsigned acts. On the list are Kittie, Taproot, Primer 55, Pitchshifter, Disturbed, Crazy Town, The Deadlights, shuvel, Slaves on Dope, and the aforementioned Reveille and Pumpjack. Ministry is the perfect headliner for second stage, and their set will be a blast provided they play very little from Dark Side of the Spoon and a lot from Psalm 69 and The Mind Is A Terrible Thing to Taste. From the popularity of their unimpressive debut Spit, Kittie, by being an all-female band, will add variety, if nothing else, to this year's lineup. Taproot, who plan to release their debut album, the gift, on June 27, have already amassed a dedicated fan base and plan to hit the road previous to Ozzfest with other promising newcomers Papa Roach, Primer 55's debut album, An Introduction to Mayhem, is about as enjoyable as a root canal, but they proved at the recent New England Metal Festival that they can move the crowd so their set should be tolerable. Pitchshifter's placement in the middle of the second stage is the biggest crime in the history of Ozzfest, and their excellent industrial punk metal will no doubt be highlight of the second stage. Disturbed have been making serious waves with their recently released debut album, The Sickness, and the Chicago metal outfit is currently spreading their disease on the road with Danzig. Crazy Town is another band to jump on the rap/metal bandwagon, and while I wasn't at all impressed with their debut single "Toxic," hopefully their live show will leave a more lasting impression.

A dose of aggro will be added to the mix when The Deadlights hit the stage with selections from their self-titled debut, while the recently signed shuvel bring their brutal funk fresh off a tour with Kittie. Canadian rockers Slaves on Dope bring their revolution-minded sound to the second stage, and Pumpjack does their rocking Texas style, so well, in fact, that they caught the attention of members of Pantera, who decided to help the band out. New England audiences won't be seeing Pumpjack however, instead getting Reveille, whom will no doubt be well-received, but I have to admit I would have much rather seen an upcoming band that hasn't played a million shows in the area over the past year.

Ozzfest 2000. There it is, and tickets are already on sale. How can I describe it? Pantera already did it for me when they said, "it's Goddamn Electric."

Metallica, the ultimate hard rock band, will entertain a sure to be sold out crowd at Foxboro Stadium in June.

The tour comes conveniently timed near the release of Kid Rock's latest single, "American Badass," which is done over the stripped instrumental of Metallica's "Sad But True." Kid Rock's release lends itself, not unintentionally, to the prospect of live collaborations between the two on tour.

The dates are also on the heels of Metallica's latest single, their first for a movie soundtrack, entitled "I Disappear," which has brought in mixed reviews despite decent commercial success, and Korn's continuing dominance over the Billboard Charts with their latest album Issues and their latest single therein, "Make Me Bad."

System of a Down boasts their most mainstream success in the song "Sugar," although a more underground supporting crowd will likely pack the joints, and Powerman 5000 has finally fought its way to the big time with the album Tonight the Stars Revolt, featuring well-known singles like "Nobody's Real" and "When Worlds Collide." PM5K's big hits have come after a history in Boston, meeting at Tower Records and forming in 1990. Earlier minor label releases such as the EP True Force, and the LP Blood Spat Rating System preceded their first Dreamworks album, Mega Kung-Fu Radio.

Still, of all the bands, the one with the most notable old tracks will be the headlining Metallica, who has emerged as the encyclopedia definition for modern-speed metal after kicking the genre into second gear with a decade of what have become known as classics. The 1980's hit the southern California band pulled tunes like "Whiplash" "Whom the Bell Tolls" "Battery" and "One," known by many as the defining song for mainstream heavy metal.

Regardless, old tracks or new collaborations or not, any one of the five bands featured would be worth a trip on their own. Load and your culture, the country is about to black.

Glassjaw, Boysetsfire are hardcore triumphs

By Michael Delano

BOYSETSFIRE
After the Eulogy
Victory

GLASSJAW
Everything You Wanted To Know About Silence
Roadrunner

Emo, emo-core, whatever you want to call it, it's the style of music that combines cathartic vocals with hardcore vocals with hardcore music to create an often startling sound. This style is currently popularized by KoRn and Deftones, the latter being closer to the two releases in this review. Chino's brazen emoting trading off with hardcore screams over music that spans from the blistering "Headup" to the tranquil "Mascara." Boysetsfire and Glassjaw both use this style to get their point across, although for very different reasons. While the two bands do have one additional thing in common, they both strive to revive the lost art of the long and confusing song title. The title of Glassjaw's debut is a great example, and my personal favorite from After the Eulogy's number of choices is "(Compassion) as skull fragments on the wall." Yes, parentheses make everything (more interesting).

Boysetsfire uses the aforementioned style of music to relay their overpowering social messages. The lineup for their Victory debut are guitarists Josh Latshaw and Chad Istvan, bassist Rob Avery, drummer Matt Krupanski, and vocalist Nathan Gray. Before even spinning the disc, flipping through the booklet reveals much of what's to come. Pictures of war and military funerals, quotes from Mumia Abu-Jamal, URLs for Michael Moore and Refuse Resist, and a strong band statement establish clearly the band's standpoint and that they aren't kidding around. And using the emo-core style seems like a perfect match, since the hardcore aspects can forcefully convey their revolutionary messages ("where's your anger/where's your [expletive] rage?"), while the more emotional edge can inspire compassion for the things they are fighting for ("stand in line/take a number/you sell your soul"). Unfortunately, the emo portion is what ultimately drags After the Eulogy down.

The division between emo and hardcore is mostly from song to song here, unlike Glassjaw where you'll get both in the space of one song. And while the variety is certainly a welcome departure from the endless hordes of testosterone-fueled hardcore releases, the lyrics can't really stand on their own without a strong musical backing. The sounds are pretty bland on the slower tracks like "when rhetoric dies" and "the abominations of those virtuous," and the lyrics take center stage. Gray's vocals, although adequate, don't have the strength to make the words come alive. And the words, although rallying for all the right causes, don't have the flow necessary to stand alone. The mid-tempo "unspoken request," an import from the 1999 split EP with Snapcase, works, but the other down tempo tracks are pretty boring, the greatest offenders being the back-to-back songs "my life in the knife trade" and "across five years."

Thankfully, these two tracks are followed by "twelve step hammer program:" a song that begins with the statement "bring it on" and ends with a gun blast. Pounding cuts like these are clearly where the band shines. The title track opens the album with an appropriate bang, and movers like "pariah under glass" are where the band's sound feels most at home.

Newcomers Glassjaw use the emo/hardcore combo for introspection, and all elements shift accordingly. The music on their debut Everything You Wanted to Know About Silence is more melodic, and vocalist Daryl Palumbo embellishes a lot more on his intensely personal lyrics, which leads to the word "you" coming out more like "yeah-heh-hoo" at times ("Piano"). The group is completed by guitarists Beck and Todd N. Weinstock, bassist Manuel Ragoonan Carrero, and drummer Sammy Siegler, and their Roadrunner release was produced by amazing talent Russ Robinson, whose credits include KoRn, Limp Bizkit, and Slipknot. Glassjaw are signed to Robinson's new I AM record label, and their CD has a couple of things in common with labelmates Slipknot.

For one, this is a very promising debut, with a lot of potential and substance to build upon. Everything, however, is also like the Slipknot record in that all of the great tracks are up front, and the second half of the album takes a disappointing nosedive. The decline on this release starts around track seven, with the only bright spot in the last six tracks being the guitar-driven "Piano."

But to focus on the good, the opening tracks are amazing, starting with "Pretty Lush" and "Siberian Kiss," both of which perfectly mix the emotional vocals with the considerable chops of the musicians. The aggressive yet bouncy "Ry Ry's Song" lets the guitar riff ease you through the song, and Palumbo's vocals are uncharacteristically subdued. His vocals owe a lot to Deftones singer Chino Moreno, both in style and delivery, although their over-the-top emotional extremity defeats the finer musical points of tracks like "Lovebites and Razorlines" and "Hurting and Shoving (She Should Have Let Me Sleep)." Palumbo's voice is certainly a commanding presence, and a little refinement in terms of how he uses it could become a real asset for this promising band.

When you mix emo and hardcore, there are bound to be bumps in the road, and no band to date has mastered this interesting hybrid; however, Boysetsfire and Glassjaw are both on the right track, and who knows, maybe in the future it will be one of these two that present the defining work in this unique subgenre.

Oasis and Travis storm the Orpheum in Boston

By Shawn Ilinitch
Collegian Staff

Tonight, one of Britain's most well known acts, as well as an up-and-coming one will be playing in Boston at the Orpheum. Oasis is promoting their latest effort, Standing on the Shoulders of Giants, while Travis is promoting their second album, The Men Who.

This most recent tour began in Tokyo, Japan, and will head throughout North America before they return to the United Kingdom. Oasis brings their heavy album presence on the road with them. In previous shows, they have played songs that have not been released, such as "Sad Song" and "Talk Tonight." Their infamous version of The Beatles' "I Am the Walrus" traditionally ended Oasis sets.

Travis, a Scottish band, has recently been getting some heavy airplay in the United States. Their latest album has reached number one in Britain. They collaborated on the new album with Radiohead producer Nigel Godrich. With a sound that is very comparable with that of Radiohead, the producer's skills were nicely used. Travis' surreal sound should compliment Oasis well.

Before the show, Travis will be greeting some of their new American fans at Newbury Comics in Boston, as well as playing an acoustic set, before joining Oasis at the Orpheum.

Oasis is playing smaller venues than those they have played in the past. They received their first attention in 1992 with the release of Definitely Maybe, which immediately prompted countless comparisons to The Beatles. They followed up with What's the Story (Morning Glory), garnering them incredible airplay with such hits as "Wonderwall" and "Champagne Supernova."

Conflict has always followed Oasis. The band's two front men, brothers Liam and Noel Gallagher, have a history of fighting, and rumors of their break up are always circling. Luckily for their New England fans, these rumors have been quieter than usual lately.

Fans can expect some surprises from the show. First of all, the new album features the first song not written by Noel. Liam wrote "Little James" for his son. In the past, he has been rumored to say that he could write better than his brother, but that he simply did not feel like it.

Oasis should find other ways to mix things up, too. Noel usually treats fans to some acoustic numbers, and they are always discovering new songs to cover.

British legends Oasis come to the Orpheum in Boston tonight. Scotland's Travis will open the show.

Trax On Trax Off

Oasis finds "Love"

OASIS
"Who Feels Love?"
Big Brother

A disheartening trend has emerged among Oasis singles as of late, namely the "Go Let It Out" and now the "Who Feels Love?" releases. I have two major grievances. One: the two singles only have three songs each, including their respective title tracks from the album Standing On The Shoulder of Giants, which no one bought. This is depressing because ever since I started buying import Oasis singles about four years ago, they have traditionally had four tracks, a practice that dates back to the early Definitely Maybe singles.

This move is really no surprise from a band that previously justified playing live for less than an hour by asking, "What do you expect?" as well as releasing a comparatively small four albums throughout their almost decade-long existence. It's hard to complain when the material is so brilliant, but frankly, I'd like a little more brilliance, please. Second, the b-sides for the new album are starting to sound alarmingly like b-sides; namely stuff that wasn't good enough for the album rather than the usual sublime Oasis b-side. "Let All Make Believe" was good stuff, but "(As Long As They've Got) Cigarettes In Hell" was another story altogether.

Which brings us to the "Who Feels Love?" single. "Who Feels Love?" is a brilliant, beautiful song. I could make some appropriately over-the-top comparisons, possibly likening the song to "basking in the divine glory of sonic exaltedness" or "bathing in the nectar of melodic transcendence," but my previous alliteration should do the trick. The additional two unreleased tracks are both Noel-sung and don't really come off as anything special. "One Way Road" is very listenable; it's Noel with his trademark ballad structure and some nice vocals, although it's no "Talk Tonight" and the chirping birds just add to the overproduction. "Helter Skelter" finds Noel in Beatles territory again, and proves that he should stick to "You've Got to Hide Your Love Away" while Liam takes care of business on "I Am the Walrus" and heavy stuff like this. But it was not meant to be. And while Noel's enthusiasm is unmistakable throughout the six minutes, you can't do everything yourself, and this one just cries for Liam's attitude.

It isn't perfect, but there is plenty here for the Oasis fan (as if it needs convincing). The cover is great, as is the sleeve photo, although am I the only one who misses the classic Brian Cannon stuff? And the disc is enhanced, complete with the amazing "Who Feels Love?" video, which is the classy job the song deserved. A- (Michael Delano)

EMILY AYN
Bloh
Knotknown Records

I have a soft spot in my heart for well-meaning, sincere songwriters who expose their work to an often callous, impatient and fickle listening public. But at the same time, I have only so much tolerance for the overt sound of an amateur. Blah, the debut release of seventeen year-old singer/songwriter Emily Ayn, tugs me strongly in both of these directions. On the one hand, anyone so young able to produce a 13-track album of original songs deserves credit for the commitment and musical wherewithal necessary, and Emily's voice, although still underdeveloped, immediately begs comparison to siren extraordinaire Tori Amos. On the other hand, the album suffers from the rhythmical shortcomings so often encountered in such young musical artists, and vocally, Emily too often tries for notes beyond her range.

Blah offers a combination of folky, acoustic guitar-only songs and more fleshed-out pop rock songs; the former are always at least worthwhile, and often quite stunning, while the latter are difficult to listen to without cringing. "Drone," "Hall" and "Lonely Too Long" are all impressive acoustic compositions; "Hall," especially, featuring only Emily's skeletal finger-picking and a sweetly understated vocal performance, gives an inviting glimpse of what she may be capable of on future recordings.

Other tracks, however, such as the barely tolerable "Paraphrased," add problematic drumming and an unattractive distorted electric guitar to the equation, arranged around flat, grungy chord progressions, and send you reaching for the track-forward button. "Jitter Bug," the twelfth track, is perhaps the only instance of the successful use of a full-band approach; comparisons to the Sundays come to mind when listening to the song's slowly turning electric folk flavor. The last minute of this 5:33 tune, however, makes a decided turn for the worse when the band begins a sloppy escalation of speed and volume. Restraint and tastefulness are lessons yet to be learned, apparently.

I have little doubt that Emily Ayn could go far in the music industry, but, if Blah is any indication, she has to emphasize her strengths, specifically the charming interplay between her voice and her acoustic guitar work, and solidify her songwriting before she throws additional instruments into the mix. C+ (David Troupes)

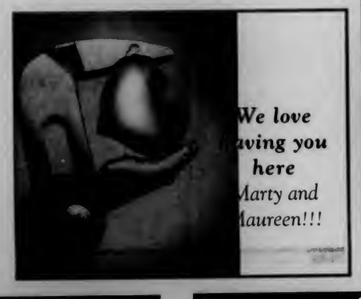
VARIOUS ARTISTS
Family Values Tour '99
Flawless/Geffen

The Family Values tour enjoyed its second massively successful year last fall, headlined by Limp Bizkit. And like the previous year, we now have a CD that gathers live performances from all of the participating artists on the 1999 edition, resulting in an enjoyable but completely predictable concert disc.

Featured on this year's release are 1998 survivors KoRn and Limp Bizkit, Primus, Staind, The Crystal Method, Method Man and Redman, and Filter. The great variety is, like last year, the disc's greatest asset, mingling choice cuts of rap and techno with the expected array of heavy hitters. Don't expect any shocking track selections or mind-blowing live performances, just the usual suspects that get the job done nonetheless. Filter's "Hey Man Nice Shot," Korn's "Falling Away From Me," and Limp Bizkit's "Nookie" – you've heard these all on the radio a million times by now, and the live performances do little to add or detract from that experience. One could hope for a little more daring track list, as well as more extras than LB's unexceptional cover of "I Would For You" and the Fred Durst/Staind collaboration "Outside," an emotional but anticlimactic ending.

Otherwise, what's here is good. The affecting flow of "Da Rockweiler" screams for more Meth/Red on the album, and Primus and Crystal Method both are characteristically solid. Even the LB stuff, which has been getting a little stale from overexposure lately, is given a shot in the arm with energetic live cuts. Absolutely unnecessary, but for an affordable price Family Values '99 is a solid bet for fans in the market for a fairly straightforward collection. B (Michael Delano)

SUSUAN ANGELETTI
Live
self-released



Susan Angeletti has one hell of voice. She can howl and soar in the best tradition of the Aretha Franklin's school of singing (her range may be smaller, but her vocal arrangements disguise it well). Susan's vocal talent is naturally the centerpiece of this record, comprised of eight songs recorded live in the studio in a single day. This focus, however, is a mixed blessing, for while Susan sounds excellent, the music goes somewhat neglected; generally Susan is backed by merely a single guitar, bass, and uninspired drumming. Of the eight songs, two are original tunes penned by Susan, and the rest are covers of rock and blues classics, such as "Under My Thumb," a Mick Jagger and Keith Richard song.

Fans of southern-style blues/rock will find this an enjoyable listen, but ultimately, there's little innovation that takes place and Susan runs the risk of getting lost in an already backward-looking crowd. It's a solid emulation of previous artists, but Susan needs to find her own style. B- (David Troupes)

pOp*stAr*kiDs
*This Is pOp*stAr*kiDs*
Hinds
Reminiscent of the Supreme Beings of Leisure disc of a couple of months back. pOp*stAr*kiDs wear their pop influences on their sleeve. But where as the Supreme Beings used their pop sensibility to craft some laid-back, on-the-beach chill music, these kiDs are intent on infecting your mind with unavoidable pop viruses. This duo consists of Andee (vocals, guitars, keys & synths, programmed drums) and Anthony (bass, "perspective"), with additional help from drummer Joe Donato and bassist Nick Donato on some of the album. The press release generously gives a list of the kiDs' faves, which are all over the map from AC/DC to Daft Punk, but the most telling description of them given would have to be that they "make immaculately disposable electro pop with big guitarzz…"

What's fun about this album is how it avoids all of the mind-numbing expectations that determine the worth of popular music these days. "It's a comeback album," or "it's a product of their Middle Eastern influences," or "they have to re-establish their trademark sound on this release."

pOp*stAr*kiDs transcend all of this, and you can tell without question that these guys are just having a lot of fun, which is both good and bad. This isn't the brilliance of Mellon Collie and The Infinite Sadness, but it doesn't try to be, so what we have is, yes, "disposable electro pop," but fun electro pop nonetheless. Standout tracks include "Oceans of It" and "Atomik!" B (Michael Delano)

"It makes me laugh when attackers try to elbow you off, though," Passanese said. "We play defense so tight, that they get annoyed and try to elbow you. You can tell that you're getting to them."

With the success that the two have enjoyed thus far, one might think the Minutewomen are insane by the amount of laughing going on during competition. The laughter was perhaps most intense, however, when Passanese – about whom it would be an understatement to merely say that she's a defender by trade – decided to cross over to the offensive side of the ball during the Maroon and White's 19-2 route of St. Bonaventure in Olean, N.Y.

"Everyone was egging me on, saying, 'Jess, you have to score, you haven't scored yet,'" Passanese said. "So I went in and cut, and Rebecca passed me the ball. I shot lefty and it hit the pipe. Sara was out there too, and we both just looked at each other and started laughing… it was the only shot I'd taken in four years and it hit the pipe. We both double-teamed the defender (who picked up the loose ball) and checked it out of her stick. I just picked up the ground ball and shot – and I scored."

The goal was one of many that day, but its importance in the context of that game was not to be understated.

"At the beginning of the season we needed that morale booster, we had a hard time getting the 'Ws,'" MacNabb said.

That win, complete with Passanese's first score, began a 5-1 streak for UMass that is responsible for the Minutewomen being tied for the top spot in the A-10.

That's a long way from Baldwinsville… or R'Ville.

"They're still very close," Barnes said. "People from R'Ville just live for their hometown. They're very proud of where they come from."

Dave Andreychuk is proving to be more than just "the other guy in the Bourque trade," giving the Lanche another legitimate offensive force. Peter Forsberg woke up and finally remembered he plays pro hockey for a living, and Patrick Roy is Patrick Roy. Like him or not, he's money in the playoffs. As long he maintains a healthy relationship with his goalposts (hockey fans know what I mean), St. Patrick seems poised to carry his club into the Finals.

Detroit is flying as well, coming off a sweep of the Los Angeles Kings in the first round. They finished the series with a 3-0 shutout, Chris Osgood's eighth career playoff shutout. The Wings get offense from all over the board: Steve Yzerman, Brendan Shanahan, Sergei Fedorov – and Niklas Lidstrom, who led all defenseman with 73 points. They can hurt you in a number of different of ways.

Realistically, the Wings are the better, more well rounded team. The Avalanche have turned it on though, and one things rings true more than anything else: The Ray Bourque Factor. Am I biased? Absolutely. You don't live 20 years in Beantown and not have this man ingrained in your sports loving psyche. If he doesn't do it now, it may be never. The Avalanche in seven (with Bourque playing a decisive role in the clincher).

Because the Blues have been sent home a little earlier than I had anticipated, Colorado now has my permission to go out and win itself a Stanley Cup. Yes, they have Bourque, but they also have a roster flooded with talent and a new sense of purpose that was sparked late in the season. Experts everywhere (and lowly college students) had St. Louis as a lock, but now it's a wide open affair that won't be decided until the final second has ticked off the clock. In 2000, it's nothing as it seems.

who shares time in the second rotation spot, gave one of her finest performances of the 2000 season in game two against La Salle. Jeffries (5-7) followed Holtz with a one-hit gem of her own, striking out four in the process. Sophomore co-captain Jen Hadley, who splits time on the mound with Jeffries, has also pitched much stronger during the UMass surge. In 15 appearances, Hadley's record is only 6-6 but her ERA is 2.62, a run and a half better than Jeffries'.

With the help of 20 runs in two contests against the Explorers, the Minutewoman offense could not be any healthier as the team approaches a crucial stretch of the season. Freshman first baseman Brandi Cross is enjoying an outstanding inaugural campaign. Cross leads the teams in nearly every hitting category, including a .409 batting average, five home runs and 28 RBI. And she has amassed these totals having missed four conference games two weeks ago because of a death in the family.

The freshmen class, it seems, has become the most dangerous at the plate. Proving herself as a versatile player, Holtz, who is used as a designated hitter when not pitching, boasts the team's second highest batting average at .329. Behind Holtz are sophomores Ashley Bakken, Teri Rooney and Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler.

And perhaps one of the hottest batters for the Minutewomen is freshman shortstop Emily Robustelli, who has handled both the position and the leadoff spot in the order with uncanny poise. Robustelli is third on the team in hits with 35, and second in runs with 22.

While UConn has a handful of hitters hovering under .300, the Huskies do not have a dominating bat in their line-up, nor anyone who hits over .300. Unlike UMass, UConn does not have a proven the deep ball threat equivalent to Cross, with no Huskie player totaling more than two home runs.

But what UConn does have is a dominating pitcher. Ace Barbara Cook owns a miniscule 0.72 earned run average, with an intimidating 14-3 record through 21 appearances.

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Keeping its eyes on the prize, the UMass softball team hopes to steal a victory from the Huskies today at the new Minutewomen softball complex.

NBA cries out in a technical frenzy

By Stephen Siegel
The Sporting News

Picture this: The Trail Blazers and Lakers meet in the Western Conference finals and Game 1 is tight and physical. Designated Shaq-hacker Joe Kleine gets his first significant action in months, and late in the game he throws Shaquille O'Neal to the floor. O'Neal barks at the referees, contending they should have called an intentional foul. That brings Rasheed Wallace into the fray, calling all the officials that O'Neal deserves a technical for telling the referees what to do. In the end, O'Neal and Wallace both receive their second technical fouls, leaving their teams without their most important player.

OK, so it may not happen, but would you be shocked if it did?

It's an epidemic. Big-time team, big-time player, big-time technical foul. Kobe Bryant and Chris Childs came to blows during a late-season game. Wallace argues almost every call that doesn't go his way. David Robinson – David Robinson – gets tossed for arguing a call in a game against Wallace.

Suspensions: one player's technical foul or ejection can fire up his teammates. But in the playoffs, what team wants to lose its best player? How can the Trail Blazers expect to rely on their leading scorer and rebounder is ejected? How can the Lakers be comfortable knowing they're one O'Neal blowup from being an ordinary team?

In the 1998 playoffs, Alonzo Mourning was involved in an on-court scuffle that led to an ejection and suspension in a series against the Knicks. The Heat appeared to be the stronger team, but after Mourning went out, the lower-seeded Knicks won the series. Wallace could learn a lot from Mourning, who by now realizes losing his temper can only hurt his team. "I learned to control my instincts," Mourning says. "It's difficult to turn the other cheek when you're provoked, but this is about the best I've been able to do it."

A few years ago, Mourning bore a striking similarity to Wallace. Wallace is a gifted player, but he often seems to be playing out of control. In his 333 regular-season games in the NBA, Wallace has collected 102 technicals (38 this season, an NBA record). "I don't care. It doesn't bother me," he says. "I do what I can to help my team win, and that's the bottom line."

But when does Wallace cross that line? His coach and teammates are vocal about their displeasure with his on-court volatility, and Wallace says he knows how important he is to the team, but the message just doesn't seem to be getting through.

"We can do all the talking we want to Rasheed, but he's got to make a decision that he wants to channel his emotions in a positive way," Trail Blazers coach Mike Dunleavy says.

Scottie Pippen, a reformed attitude-problem player himself, says, "Rasheed feels like he's not getting the calls, but he can't keep letting us down. We lose our best scorer and rebounder."

Obviously, some of Wallace's fiery attitude gets him, and his teammates, going. But there are times to plead your case with officials and times to keep your mouth shut and emotions to yourself. Bulls guard Hersey Hawkins has played alongside two of the best provokers – Charles Barkley and Gary Payton – and knows it is sometimes important to keep quiet, if for no other reason than the griping gets on the officials' nerves.

"After a while, you get tired of it, and you have to call a technical," Hawkins says. "Referees have to let guys know that after every play, you can't moan and gripe. Every play's not a foul."

Payton, tied for fourth in the NBA in technicals with 17 this season, understands when to complain. "Gary's good at knowing when to get technicals and when to stay in the game," Hawkins says. "We played lots of huge games in Seattle, and never once did he get tossed or get a technical in a crucial situation. That's just maturing and understanding the game and learning your role."

It's kind of like growing up way too fast; Miller flees Florida to seek out pro dream

Would someone please tell me exactly what Mike Miller is thinking? After leading Billy Donovan's squad to a 29-8 record and a berth in the NCAA Championship Game, the 6-foot-8 forward has declared himself eligible for the NBA draft.

The news comes after a less than dazzling season from the sophomore.

In making the leap, Miller has joined the disturbing trend of underclassmen that declare themselves eligible, but who aren't physically and mentally ready to go big-time.

Don't get me wrong: there have been some select freshmen and sophomores over the years that were ready for the vigorous world of the NBA, but for every Stephon Marbury or Allen Iverson who goes on to be a lottery pick and dominant force in the NBA, there are always a few like Cory Alexander, Victor Page, or even the highly touted Maryland star Joe Smith, who just hasn't lived up to what was expected of him, being the dominant force he was in the ACC for the Terps.

Joseph Giasusso on

The logic behind this is simple. Players who stay through their junior year or even finish college (what a concept!), on average, do better in the league than those who come out early. Take a look at Tim Duncan. Here's a guy who was a solid college player and one who could have been a pretty good NBA competitor had he come out after his sophomore or even his junior season. Instead, he decided to complete college and be a perennial all-star.

Why would Miller sacrifice a shot at another Final Four appearance and possibly an NCAA championship to sit on the bench for the Los Angeles Clippers?

Florida, losing only Kenyon Weaks to graduation, is a clear favorite to win the NCAA championship next year. Coach Donovan has done a good job with the Gators, and they have a strong, young, talented core of freshmen and sophomores.

But Miller has decided to leave early, and really, who can blame him? The salaries being paid to young athletes who sign NBA contracts is astronomical. Even with the new rookie salary cap, which limits rookies to $3 million per year for their first three years, there hasn't been a significant decrease in the number of players leaving early.

Why would there be? I wouldn't exactly call $9 million over the course of three years filthy rich compared to some of the other salaries of NBA superstars. But, it is by no means a poverty situation. Most of these kids do not come from families with a steady cash flow, and the NCAA makes it almost impossible for these student-athletes to earn any significant amount of money. It is getting to the point where a member of a school's booster club can't buy an athlete a Big Mac or give him a ride home without it being ruled a violation of the NCAA statute.

I'm not promoting the idea of leaving school early, but I can't exactly tell you what I'd do if I were put in that position. The NCAA needs to make a choice, because in the end it's their responsibility. The rules come and the players go.

It's pretty clear, Miller's not ready for the NBA and his dismal showing in the NCAA championship game is an indication of this. Overall, he's just not ready to handle an 82-game schedule against the strongest and fastest players in the world.

But hey, if I could be "not ready" for the NBA and still get paid ...

$3 million a year, you bet your bottom dollar I'd take it. Hey, I'm a fan of good ol' Ben Franklin, who isn't?

Avengers QB arrested for assault

By Mike Terry
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES, Calif. – Los Angeles Avengers quarterback Todd Marinovich was arrested by Los Angeles County Sheriff's deputies Tuesday on suspicion of sexual assault.

Marinovich, 30, was practicing with the team at its West Los Angeles College facility when deputies arrived shortly after noon. Deputy Harry Drucker said. He said Marinovich was allowed to change clothes and was taken to the Sheriff's Department's Marina del Rey station. He was being held there on $50,000 bail.

Team spokesman John Lamanaka, who was at practice when the arrest took place, called it "an unfortunate situation that we have just learned about. Ever since we brought Todd in six weeks ago, he's done everything we've asked of him from a football standpoint, and was making good progress on the field."

Drucker said the alleged incident occurred between midnight and 12:30 a.m. at Marinovich's apartment.

A woman, whom Drucker did not identify, went to an area hospital Tuesday and told medical personnel that Marinovich had assaulted her. After examining her, hospital officials contacted the Sheriff's Department. Detectives, acting on the victim's statement and the results of the victim's examination, made the arrest.

Marinovich, who signed with the Arena Football League Avengers on March 18, is trying to revive a professional football career after much success in high school and college.

At Mission Viejo Capistrano Valley High School, Marinovich passed for a national-record 9,194 yards. He played two years at USC before being chosen by the Los Angeles Raiders in the first round of the 1991 NFL draft.

Marinovich played two seasons with the Raiders before being released after the 1993 season. He signed with Winnipeg of the Canadian Football League but suffered a season-ending knee injury during his first practice.

The San Diego Chargers showed some interest in Marinovich before this year's NFL draft, but no deal was worked out.

He has had other legal problems. In 1997 Marinovich was arrested at his Dana Point home after Orange County sheriff's deputies found marijuana plants, a syringe, and prescription medicine not in his name. He later pleaded guilty to a felony charge of cultivating marijuana, and a misdemeanor charge of illegally possessing the prescription medicine, and served a three-month sentence.

Marinovich, a reserve quarterback with the Avengers, had not played in either of the team's two regular-season games. In the Avengers' two exhibition games, Marinovich completed 15 of 26 passes for 187 yards and four touchdowns with no interceptions.

It's all love for life and baseball with Galarraga

By Dave Kindred
The Sporting News

Andres Galarraga, baseball's smilingest man, is beautiful with a baseball bat in hand, especially in that moment when he has finished a swing that causes a ball to leave town in a hurry.

The other night at Atlanta's Turner Field, such a swing sent a baseball clanging off the highest part of the fair pole's metal screen. Without the pole's interruption, science tells us, the ball would have traveled 402 feet. As the ball sailed into the night, Galarraga dropped his bat, dropped it with a flair, just letting it fall, the artist signing his work.

His third time at bat this year, the Braves first baseman won a game with a home run. Next series, he won one with a grand slam. Two weeks later, two home runs in a night won another. Six times in his first 15 games, Galarraga hit home runs. Math tells us he's on a pace to hit 345 with maybe 60 home runs and 170 RBI.

The wonderful part is, if he doesn't do another thing, Andres Jose Galarraga owns our hearts.

In 1999, he couldn't swing a bat. Maybe he picked one up at home, just to remind himself. Maybe he moved the bat across an imaginary plate. But at age 38, a pro for 20 years, he did not swing a bat at a thrown ball.

Cancer's why. On Feb. 17, 1999, frightened by the news, Galarraga called his best friend/business agent, Fernando Cuza, and said, "These docs think I have a big, cancerous tumor on my spine."

Late in the 1998 season, there had been discomfort becoming soreness becoming pain. A winter's rest at his Florida home did nothing to ease his pain. It became so acute that Galarraga returned to Atlanta to see the doctors.

MRI and CAT scans showed a tumor inside a small bone near the bottom of Galarraga's spine. The doctors called it "non-Hodgkins lymphoma." If those words mystified Galarraga, he yet knew they meant cancer. That word, he knew. His father had died seven years before of pancreatic cancer.

Even as Fernando Cuza heard the news from Galarraga, he thought, "Why anybody? But why him?"

The next day, Galarraga came to a news conference unsmiling. Doctors explained the diagnosis and said Galarraga would miss the 1999 season while being treated for the cancer. Not trusting his emotional control, Galarraga wrote a statement he intended to read, only to ask Guza to read it.

"To all my fans in Atlanta, Venezuela and around the country, I was looking forward toward the '99 season. Unfortunately, I'm hit with this setback. But, I promise you, I will be back. To my teammates, I will miss you all and try to return as fast as I can. I will be with you during all of our games in spirit and wish you the best of luck..."

Within two weeks, Galarraga began a regimen of chemotherapy and radiation that left him nauseous, weak and bald. Brett Butler warned him about the "mind monsters," fear's night whispers. Eric Davis called. Darryl Strawberry called, players and cancer patients who made it back.

Fans mailed him rosary beads and prayer cards. He put the correspondence and gifts by a statue of the Virgin Mary in his study. There, each night during his treatment, Galarraga prayed with his wife, Eneyda, and their three daughters, Andria, 14, Katherine, 8, and Andrianna, 2.

If we didn't pray with the Galarragas, we likely know their prayers, for rare is the family untouched by cancer. We know cancer better now. We know how to find it, we know how to cure some of it. But to see a loved one with cancer is to know, really know, how brief our time is. Each day for a cancer patient becomes an act of courage against fear's incessant whisperings. These heroes and heroines do mightier things than throw balls around. They do things that Andres Galarraga did, such as...

Walk.

Chemiotherapy robs you of both strength and will. The treatment, some patients say, is worse than the disease. Six times, three weeks apart, Galarraga suffered chemotherapy treatment. At the end, doctors aimed 5,000 rads of radiation at the tumor. All these miracles of medicine do their jobs by killing parts of the patient in hopes they also kill cancerous cells. Some fun, that. Makes you feel like ...

Swimming?

When he most felt like doing nothing, Galarraga knew he must walk, must swim, must ride an exercise bike, must pray. He must not, above all, do nothing.

By November, when doctors declared the cancer gone, Galarraga moved beyond walking and swimming to workouts that became two-hour drills five times a week. Lifting, running, stretching, all done carefully to avoid putting stress on his lower back.

By January, he could swing a bat.

February, hitting pitches.

March, games.

Always the happiest guy in any clubhouse, his delight contagious, Galarraga now brings to the ballpark a joy in life and baseball that is all but palpable. Glenn Hubbard has noticed, the Braves coach saying, "You ever almost lost something you love? Andres has had that experience now. He's playing with intensity and passion. He thought he had it before. Now he knows he has it."

Steve Hummer of the Atlanta Journal-Constitution has seen that passion in more than Galarraga's home runs. The columnist noticed Galarraga, before a game, talking to a 6-year-old leukemia patient named Brett Ballentine. Take your medicine, Galarraga said, and keep a smile on your face. Then the big man took the little boy in his arms.

King Tiger and knights of the PGA

Woods enters different realm in the world of golf

By Thomas Boswell
Washington Post

Sometimes, one athlete transforms a sport by showing everyone else what is possible. And necessary. That is, if you don't want to be left behind. Babe Ruth did it by gripping the bat down at the knob, using an uppercut swing and aiming for the fences. That's when baseball's popularity exploded. Tiger Woods may be doing the same for golf right now.

"Tiger sets the expectations high, doesn't he?" said Hal Sutton after winning in Greensboro, N.C., on Sunday. "If you want to play in the same game with him you have to elevate your own thinking. I'm certainly trying to."

Throughout the sport, golfers are rededicating themselves in the post-Tiger world. "If you want to beat him, you have to play better, you have to get better," said David Duval this spring. "You just continually have to evolve and improve."

At the Masters, one of Duval's key strategic questions was how many miles he should run in the morning before he played. In his quest to catch Tiger, Duval has gone far beyond dieting to weight training and distance running. To him, a six-mile run is something to "get me loose."

Not so long ago, a six-mile run would have killed Billy Casper, Julius Boros, Fuzzy Zoeller, Lee Trevino, Phil Rogers and the young Ohio Fats version of Jack Nicklaus. All six of them, as a relay team, probably couldn't beat Duval.

Golf has occasionally been blessed with a matinee-idol type like Arnold Palmer, Sam Snead or Greg Norman who exuded athleticism. But Woods has broken the mold. He arrived on Tour as slim as Phil Mickelson. Now, he's gained 15 pounds of muscle and vows to bulk up even more as he ages.

For decades, weightlifting was anathema to golfers. Johnny Miller once came back ripped after an off-season of chopping down trees on his property. Suddenly, he lost the radar on his iron game and never won another big title. For 10 years, you could hardly get a pro to lift his own bag for fear of getting "overdeveloped" like Miller.

Conventional wisdom in sports has a way of remaining entrenched for years until, suddenly, it is reversed in a blink by one athlete. Wayne Gretzky brought a higher level of imagination and playmaking to hockey. Bill Russell and Wilt Chamberlain moved the NBA game not only above the rim, but also to the top of the box. Billie Jean King took athleticism in women's tennis to a higher plane and forced others to follow.

Now it's Woods who is changing the rules – at fitness, at swing experimentation and of mental toughness. In the process, he's raising the bar for his entire game. Woods isn't just winning, six events in a row at one point. He's winning with lower scores, more power and better golf than the sport has ever seen.

Woods won the Vardon Trophy in 1999 with a stroke average of 68.43, the lowest ever. Since 1947, only two players won Vardon's with averages under 69.1 – Greg Norman at 68.81 in 1994 and Nick Price at 68.98 in 1987. Such fractions of a stroke may seem insignificant to non-golfers, but they are huge. Woods appears to have cut half a stroke a round, and perhaps two-thirds of a stroke, off what had previously been thought possible. Over a four-day tournament, that's two or three strokes. What seemed good enough to compete two years ago just became obsolete.

Perhaps most impressive, Woods is winning while changing and improving – constantly. Totally revamp your swing? Few dare do it. A dozen years ago, Sutton tried to "get just a little longer" off the tee, despite being a top 10 money winner. He changed his mechanics to become "The Best." Instead, he disappeared for 10 years, leaving behind the famous remark that he had made millions of dollars with his own swing, then had been too dumb long enough to trade it for somebody else's.

Tiger has done a total cut-and-paste over the past three years, shortening and tightening his swing, getting better control of his short irons and virtually eliminating wild drives.

How many dare such a transformation after being Sports Illustrated's Sportsman of the Year?

This spring, Woods even had laser eye surgery so he wouldn't need contact lenses anymore. With his new 20-15 eyesight, Woods's first three rounds were 66-66-66.

Other top players feel challenged, and in some cases threatened, by such ambition and audacity. They know Woods is chasing Nicklaus' records and a vision of himself in sports history. They're just impediments to be swept aside.

Of all the game's elite players, the No. 2-ranked Duval has taken up the gauntlet with the most relish. Just one year ago, he was the hottest player on earth when his famous 59 won the Bob Hope Classic by one shot. Yet, as Woods swept past him last summer and fall, Duval seemed almost inspired rather than dispirited.

A purist, a solitary, a workaholic, Duval has actually enjoyed being put to the test. "I want to become a better player. I want to improve... If it's to beat Tiger, then so be it," Duval said. "Nobody has performed like Tiger (since mid-'98)... I don't deserve to be talked about with him right now in the same breath."

Head-to-head, the only player who has prospered against Woods this season has been Sutton, who stared him down at the Players Championship. To say Sutton has had to go to extremes to demythologize Woods is an understatement. "The other night I was sitting in bed and I thought, 'Well, you know what, I am not playing to him, so he is not a god,' " said Sutton after his one shot Players win.

"The realization came over me . . . he is just human like I am. So we can do this."

A whole generation of Woods' contemporaries has little choice but to follow his aggressive, self-improving ways. What else can the Sergio Garcias from Spain and the Aaron Baddeleys from Australia do when they compare themselves to Woods? They can't realistically think. "I'll just stick with the game I've got."

In the pursuit of better swing mechanics, stronger muscles, more endurance and the enormous self-esteem needed to confront Woods' greatness, many players will crumble. Like Miller after he got his new muscles and Sutton after he changed his swing, they'll fall far back into the pack, victims of The Quest To Catch Tiger. However, those who survive will be the better for it. And so will golf. The cream that rises will probably be of the highest quality the game has ever seen.

Just when we thought nothing could be better for golf than the arrival of such a Tiger, we discover that something may be. Every day, golf has more players, more athletes, who realize that to have any chance to beat Tiger Woods, you have to emulate his very best traits.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – Guard against becoming too self-concerned today, and you will surely be able to fulfill another's needs when the time comes.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – It may be time to cut off someone who doesn't know when to quit. Today, it will be up to you to keep a friend or loved one safe from himself.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Self-confidence and self-reliance must not be confused with arrogance; take care, today, that you don't let one turn into the other.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You may be able to score an impressive shut-out today and put an end to any rumors suggesting that you are not suited for a current endeavor.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You'll be required to meet mounting pressures head-on today – at home and at the workplace. Many people will be doubly grateful.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – Don't take "no" for an answer today. You must stand firm and remain true to yourself – without becoming cocky or aggressive.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) – Now is not the time to play roles for which you are unsuited; trying to be something you're not can only lead to disaster – now and later.

Countdown!

It's down to eight in Cup playoffs

Matt Despres on the NHL

Now that the smoke from round one of the playoffs has begun to clear, the number of teams eligible for the Stanley Cup has been pared down to a mere eight. It's a solid eight this year – a pool of clubs comprised of both the usual suspects and a relative stranger to life after round one. Playoff hockey always makes for good hockey (though not as good as the college game can be), and beginning tonight in round two, the world will see exactly what these clubs have going for them.

Eastern Conference Semifinals:

Pittsburgh vs. Philadelphia: Pittsburgh entered the playoffs as the No. 7 seed and did a remarkable job against Washington, disposing of the Capitals in five games. Pittsburgh outscored the Caps 15-8 in the series, taking one game by way of shutout, and one in overtime. Sure, Washington had Olaf Kolzig in net, but one man does not make a team. And besides, Pittsburgh has the best safecracker in the world: Jaromir Jagr. If this man is anywhere near the rink, chalk up a psychological advantage for the Pens.

The Philadelphia Flyers took a similar route to round two, defeating the Buffalo Sabres in five games. The Sabres found they couldn't ride Dominik Hasek like they had grown accustomed to doing, and also suffered through the disappearance of Michael Peca. After all the build up last season, it seems like he decided to take a year off and coast on reputation alone. Also, rookie Brian Boucher was a huge surprise in net. It was only round one, but the youngster showed remarkable poise in his first taste of playoff hockey.

These are two teams that are coming off relatively effortless wins, and a slight case of over-confidence may interfere early. In the end, I see Philly having too deep of a club for the Penguins to control. I take the Flyers in six.

New Jersey vs. Toronto: I picked Toronto to go the Finals out of the East a few weeks ago, and a second round match up with the Devils has done nothing to change that. It took the Leafs six games to dispose of the Senators, who enjoyed a strong regular season campaign. The Leafs did it by the textbook in round one, getting strong goaltending from Curtis Joseph and ample offense from where they need it – Mats Sundin, Steve Thomas, Wendel Clark and Co.

The Devils took a more direct route to the second round, sweeping the Florida Panthers. Scott Stevens showed he still has some quality hockey left in his aging frame, while the younger members of the club continue to set the pace. Jason Arnott is a dangerous weapon on the power play, and rookie Scott Gomez has been spectacular all season.

The Devils impressed in the first round, and I'll do nothing to take away from that. They're going to play the Leafs hard; there will be no cakewalk for either team in this round. In the end, I see the Leafs as having that little extra, taking the series in six (maybe seven) games.

Western Conference Semifinals:

San Jose vs. Dallas: I had picked the Blues to roll through the playoffs, but the Sharks went out and again threw a monkey wrench in the plans. What's left to say about them, really? They took the best team in the league seven games and won, displaying a grit and determination rarely seen in the professional sports arena. The Sharks benefited from great goaltending in the form of Roman Turek, and an offense that was sparked by the born again Owen Nolan. Although Dallas won't get caught off guard like the Blues did, the Sharks are still legit.

The Stars sent the Oilers packing for the third year in a row, and won their second straight playoff series (going back to the 1999 Finals) as a result of a Brett Hull goal. There was no controversy surrounding the Golden Brett this time around, nor is there any doubt hanging over the Stars as a whole. They are the defending Stanley Cup champs, and their roster reads like who's who of hockey stars: Mike Modano, Ed Belfour, Hull, etc. The Stars learned a lot from their run last year, and will undoubtedly draw on that as they march through the playoffs again. It's an invaluable tool to have.

The Sharks have burned me once already. Question is, do they have enough left in the tank to pull the same trick twice? Perhaps. They've got enough for a run, but I see Dallas taking them down in six games.

Detroit vs. Colorado: Nothing says NHL hockey like a few games between the Wings and the Avalanche. Colorado easily took care of the Coyotes in the first round, faltering only in game five.

It's all B'Ville pride in Amherst

Hometown friends MacNabb, Passanese still attacking together

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Sara MacNabb does what she does best: lead the Minutewomen attack.

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

For the past three years, Jessica Passanese has been the key element for the women's lax squad.

Not Clay, Baldwinsville. There was a time, not too long ago, that the Massachusetts women's lacrosse press releases listed Minutewoman Sara MacNabb's hometown as Clay, New York.

This was a problem. MacNabb, like teammate Jessica Passanese, played high school lacrosse in Baldwinsville for coach Doug Rowe, and takes her hometown extremely seriously. There's a sort of pride that goes along with being from what the players call "B'Ville," and to be called a Clay resident is unacceptable.

"Doug Rowe was our high school coach, and he taught us how to play lacrosse, pretty much from the ground up. He basically got us where we are now, playing in college," MacNabb said.

"[Pride] is really instilled by their coach, Doug Rowe," current UMass coach Phil Barnes said. "He's been one of the major forces in Syracuse High School lacrosse. He's a teacher at the middle school, so he's seen all these kids grow up. He views them as people first and lacrosse players second."

Added Passanese, "I still wear my B'Ville soccer sweatshirt and my B'Ville lacrosse sweatshirt."

MacNabb and Passanese spent a memorable four years at Baldwinsville High, playing side-by-side on defense and shutting down the opposition as the team cruised to an unprecedented level of success. When the pair moved on to UMass, things changed – except the part about the unprecedented level of success.

Passanese and MacNabb have gone from being the pride of B'Ville to the pride of Amherst, helping lead the Minutewomen to their second straight winning season in 1999 as juniors, after rebuilding from scratch in 1993 after a two-year team dispansion. This time, though, they had to do it from different sides of the ball.

"When I played defense in high school I loved it," MacNabb said. "Our high school coach didn't play us in a traditional point-counterpoint-third man defense, he played us more like the men do. I played right next to less. I loved it."

In college, the coach of the team when the duo arrived, Francesca McClellan, split the reasonably close pair up.

"When I came here, I was recruited to play defense," MacNabb said. "I ended up playing pretty much every position on the field except goalie."

"Sara initially came here as a defender," Barnes said. "Last year after a couple of games we had the crazy idea to move her to attack, and it's worked out well. She's got great stick skills, and is just a smart, head's up player.

"The plan was to have her on defense, but it became evident that we really needed her on attack – we needed leadership down there. She really understands the game of lacrosse."

Said MacNabb, "Phil always says I'm a natural attacker, and that I'm a versatile player with my stick skills and my height and my view of the field, and they claim that's why they move me everywhere."

While MacNabb has experienced motion sickness from the amount of time she's spent shifting her role on the team in her three and a half seasons as a Minutewoman, Passanese has entrenched herself exactly where she began – on defense.

"Jessica's been an important part of our defense the past three years," Barnes said. "She's a great person, but put her out on the lacrosse field, and she becomes extremely competitive and takes a lot of pride in her play."

"A lot of people get rattled if the game gets more physical, but I feel it helps me focus so much more," Passanese said. "It makes me really get mad and pumped up... occasionally, you'll check a girl in the head, and not really mean it, but they'll get all mad and discombobulated."

Passanese speaks of the side of the ball that has become the pride and joy of UMass in the recent history, ranking sixth in the nation in 1999 in goals allowed, and currently sitting dominantly at fourth. Passanese is anchored at the heart of a defense that allows only 6.62 goals every time out, including a game that saw No. 18 Temple – a team that lit up reigning Atlantic 10 Tournament Champion Virginia Tech for 18 – only score three against the Maroon and White.

Unfortunately, stats like those, that describe the dominance of a defense, are hard to come by, and generally don't grab headlines.

"I think that the glory that defenders receive is different than the glory that attackers receive," Passanese said. "We really don't have that many stats. They have their goals scored and assists – if we have interceptions or blocked shots, we don't get any publicity for that. I think a lot of the glory comes from the way we support each other. We fire each other up all the time, or try to build each other up."

A lot of people think defense is tough because you're always stuck in the back, and you don't get to make any points for your team. At the same time, there's so much teamwork and chemistry. Defense is really intense."

MacNabb, who has been thoroughly acclimated to offense, now has a different vantage point on the whole subject.

"With defenders, there's a lot of trash-talking," MacNabb said. "They'll try to grab your shirt and force you around, and their intentions are to try and take you out of your game. You have to just laugh at them, and then it turns it around. Then they get mad and you get them out of their game because they're trying so hard to rattle you."

Passanese's response?

Racioppi brings the award ruckus

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Turns out seven is enough for something.

While Alex Racioppi's seven-goal performance couldn't propel the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team to an upset of fifth-ranked Georgetown this past weekend, it was, however, plenty for the Eastern College Athletic Conference to recognize the midfielder as its Player of the Week. In addition, he was named WHMP/UMass Athlete of the Week.

Paired with a two-goal afternoon against Harvard a week ago, Racioppi helped the Minutemen to a 1-1 record. It was an explosion against the Hoyas on Saturday that drew attention to the Winchester native. Needing only a period to notch his second career hat trick, Racioppi didn't stop there. By the time the final gun sounded, the junior had put a seven-spot on the board against not only one of the nation's top defenses, but as a midfielder.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Alex Racioppi

"It's the best midfield performance we've ever had here at UMass," coach Greg Cannella said. "He got in the right spots and finished when he had to."

The seven goals scored is the most by a Minuteman since Mark Millon tallied seven in a 10-9 victory over Notre Dame in 1995.

It's been quite a stretch for Racioppi, who redshirted last season. With Marc Morley likely suspended for the rest of the season, Cannella needed someone to step forward. After Morley was yanked for the Minutemen's contest with Loyola, Racioppi's impact was made evident. Posting four goals in UMass' first eight games, the middie found the net 12 times in the past three, his first hat trick coming in the Minutemen's 21-10 loss to the Greyhounds earlier this month.

"It'd be great if he can replicate [the seven-goal outburst] in any fashion," Cannella said. "We anticipated it earlier in the year, but with Marc Morley out, we needed guys to step up."

His late surge has plopped him in third place among Minutemen for goals, trailing only Rich Kunkel (21) and John Madigan (17) in that category. It doubles his previous season high of eight, set two years back in his sophomore season.

It took four games for Racioppi finally to hit the back of the net, but now he's definitely hitting his stride. Since scoring his first goal of the season against Vermont, the junior jumped into the goal column in five of the UMass' next seven games.

He and the Minutemen next take the field on Saturday for a 4 p.m. start with No. 2 Syracuse. The Orangemen are coming off a 16-4 rout of No. 5 Princeton on Saturday.

UMass locked on Yale, A-10s

By Regan McKendry
Collegian Correspondent

Bigger isn't always better. This saying has been applied to many areas, such as debts and cell phones. The newest member added to the list is the Penn Relays. Often known as one of the top track and field competitions of the spring season, it seems that the annual Penn State event has grown too large for some, including Massachusetts women's outdoor track coach Julie LaFreniere.

"We've been disappointed in the Penn Relays in recent years," remarked LaFreniere. "They've just grown too big."

Rather than take the trip down to State Park, Pa. and compete in the two-day event, the Minutewomen will spend the time preparing for this Sunday's Yale Invitational. The meet in New Haven, Conn. will be the final tune-up for the Maroon and White before it travels to Virginia Tech for the Atlantic 10 Championships.

While UMass would love to repeat as A-10 Champions, LaFreniere is realistic about her team's chances:

"Our chances (for a repeat championship) are not good. This has been a rebuilding season for us. Last year we had a lot of seniors and 30 out of our 32 athletes scored points – this year there's just not enough ponies in the stable."

When asked about this year's team, LaFreniere responded that her Minutewomen "are a good enough team to at least come in third."

Despite a lower performance overall this season, LaFreniere mentioned a trio of stars who have shone brightly for UMass this season. Starting with the senior, all things seem to have fallen into place for Melissa Ward. LaFreniere commented about Ward, saying that this is "the best I've ever seen her compete."

In addition, underclassmen Rhianna DaCruz and Maggie Curry have been strong this season. DaCruz set a school record in the pole vault with a height of 11-foot-2. Freshman Maggie Curry has also continued to amaze. The newcomer has qualified for the ECAC Championships in the discus.

After their foray in the Yale Invitational this Sunday, UMass will be spending the weekend sharpening up for the A-10 championships. And though the odds of the Minutewomen repeating as victors may not be great, LaFrienere still has nothing but good words for her team.

"They may not be the most talented team I've coached, but they have nothing but good attitudes."

Softball hosts UConn

Aces Holtz, Cook set for mound battle

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

In what will be the biggest game to date in the brief history of the new complex, the Massachusetts softball team will host border-rival Connecticut today at 5 p.m.

By the same token, the stakes will be high. In a rare non-doubleheader, the Minutewomen and the Huskies will lay it all on the line, as both programs fight for NCAA Tournament at-large bids and to remain near the tops of their respective conferences.

And neither team could enter the contest with greater momentum from previous from victories.

Finally boasting a winning record, UMass (22-19, 8-2 Atlantic 10) has cruised since a 0-9 start. The Minutewomen have won seven straight, including a pair of romps over host La Salle last weekend. With each game already decided by the end of the first inning, UMass won both contests by the eight-run mercy rule, 9-0, 11-0.

UConn (29-13, 10-4 Big East), on the other hand, will be riding an emotional high after two come-from-behind wins over conference rival Providence Monday. Jamine Blesoff was the hero for the Huskies, driving in both game-winning runs in the bottom of the seventh inning in both games. UConn swept the Friars 2-1 and 4-3.

While Connecticut has relied on timely hitting, UMass has rolled with the help of offensive explosions and outstanding pitching.

In game one against the Explorers, Minutewoman pitching ace Kaila Holtz, a freshman, allowed only one hit. The reigning A-10 Rookie-of-the-Week, and a two-time conference player-of-the-week, Holtz has elegantly stepped into the role of the team's top pitcher. At the peak of her game after a few early growing pains, Holtz has matured on the mound. She now boasts a record of 11-6 with an earned run average that is just under two runs.

But the improved pitching doesn't end with her. Junior Carrie Jeffries,

Freshman pitcher Kaila Holtz stands nice and ready in the batter's box. Her fellow Minutewomen will have to be ready today when rival UConn marches into Amherst for a 5 p.m. battle.

Fac. Senate debates prof's tenure

Jane Giacobbe-Miller, spokeswoman for the MSP spoke to the Faculty Senate yesterday on granting Deirdre Almedia, a School of Education professor, tenure status

SGA, GSS defend Almedia's academic record

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

The Faculty Senate converged yesterday to discuss issues surrounding the tenure of University of Massachusetts professor Deirdre Almedia.

Early in the meeting comments were made by the President of the Graduate Student Senate (GSS), the Student Trustee, and the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP) arguing the necessity for a review of the decision.

Almedia, a professor in the department of Teacher Education and Curriculum Studies, was denied tenure this year with the explanation that her service and research contributions were too "narrowly focused."

Complaints regarding her service to the University included criticisms about the fact that her work was focused primarily on Native American, Cape Verdean, ALANA, and women's communities. Provost Cora Marrett made the final decision regarding her employment.

The decision was made following a review done in January of 1999 that accessed the areas of Almedia's teaching, service, and research/creative activity. The areas were accessed and voted on in order to come to the decision of whether or not to secure tenure for the professor. The Department Personnel Committee, the Chair, the School Personnel Committee, and the Dean passed down recommendations.

The only section to recommend that Almedia's tenure not be extended was the School Personnel Committee that voted against the renewal of her tenure by a 1-4 no vote. The reasoning was that in the area of research/creative activity was ruled as "not strong."

Mike Tjivitua, President of GSS, commented that the circumstances surrounding the situation were overall unfair and that as a student of Almedia himself, he personally felt that the decision was wrong.

"There is no doubt that Professor Almedia is uniquely qualified," he said in her defense.

He went on to say that he felt that the decision was much more to do with the politics on campus and less to do with the quality of education that Almedia was offering to her students.

"We [GSS] are of the opinion that UMass should be a place where education should be more important than political manipulation," he said.

He suggested that the decision be reviewed by an outside organization in order to address the issues of both fairness and impartiality and urged that the faculty senate support GSS in their attempts.

Student Trustee Seth Avakian made similar statements about Almedia, commenting that although he was not qualified to speak on the quality of her research, he had spoken to many students about her overall abilities as an educator.

"I have spoken to several students who told me point-blank that they would not be here if it not for Professor Almedia," he said. "Her record has been nothing but exceptional."

He also commented that he felt that the case had been handled poorly and that the University had treated her poorly.

"I am deeply disturbed about how this case has been handled," he said. "I worry about the way that employees have been treated at this University."

Clothesline project today

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

In a society in which there is no easy medium through which sexual assault victims can express their voice, one University of Massachusetts graduate student is taking the awareness of such issues to another level.

The third-annual Five College Clothesline Project will take place today from 8:30 a.m. to 4 p.m. at the Campus Pond Lawn.

Organizer Tara Kavanaugh, a graduate student in the School of Public Health, has been working on the project for the past two years as part of her Master's thesis.

"When I first started with the clothesline project and it was decided that there was a need for a way to raise awareness of sexual violence in the five college community," Kavanaugh said. "They decided the best way to raise this awareness within the five college community and the best way was through this display."

The project is co-sponsored by the University Health Education Department at the University Health Services. She said the purpose of the event will be for victims of sexual violence to represent their traumatic experiences through the use of decorating t-shirts and hanging them on a clothesline around the campus pond.

"What's neat about this display is that it's only survivors in the five college community that have painted the t-shirts," Kavanaugh said. "These are people's personal experiences that they written down on their t-shirts. They are telling their own personal experiences and trying to give voice to a problem that's kept silent."

Each t-shirt will be categorized based on the form of violence that the survivors have experienced. The different array of colors will raise awareness as to the kinds of violence that are taking place in the community.

According to Kavanaugh, there's a national project aimed at accomplishing the same message and it was decided within the five college community, that this would be a great tool in which to send these messages through.

"200 t-shirts will be hung tomorrow around the campus pond," Kavanaugh said. "The goal is to help survivors heal by giving them a chance to shed some of their pain and express it on the shirts and leave it hanging on line for people to see."

T-shirts and painting supplies will be available for all students who wish to display their message, along with other victims of sexual violent acts.

Survivors of rape and sexual assault will be represented through the red-coded shirts. Blue and green will represent survivors of incest or sexual child abuse. Yellow, brown and beige will represent survivors of domestic violent disputes.

Violence towards survivors of sexual orientation will be represented through purple and lavender colored shirts. Black shirts will be significant in recognition of those survivors of gang rape.

Kavanaugh said that she didn't want to limit all colored shirts to only those victims and survivors of sexual violent acts. As a result, it was decided that individuals should also have the opportunity to recognize any survivors of sexual violence that are no longer alive. These memorial shirts will be represented in white.

This is the fifth display that Kavanaugh has been involved with and she said that she is hoping for a large turnout.

"I did a display at Umass last April and I did another in November," Kavanaugh said. "They were both very successful."

While it may be traumatic or difficult for many past survivors to come forth and represent their voice, Kavanaugh said she recognizes this.

"I understand that it may be challenging for people who aren't ready to break their silence and start the healing process, but this is a support system for survivors," Kavanaugh said.

The Everywoman's Center will be on-hand to answer any questions and to offer support. She said the event is meant to be a supportive avenue for survivors at whatever stage in the healing process they may be in.

Extravaganja reaches peak of its popularity

By Alicia Upano
Collegian Staff

The Cannabis Reform Coalition's annual Extravaganja kicks off at noon tomorrow on the Amherst Common, promising the usual doses of music, food and speakers. Also, the largest turnout in the event's history is expected due to the club's recent success at the polls.

The CRC's increased efforts in the past two years and the passing of the non-binding referendum regarding marijuana legalization last month in Amherst, has given the CRC the widespread exposure it now enjoys. Chris Tarnstrom, CRC member, estimates that 2,500 people will attend this weekend's festivities.

Although Tarnstrom said this year will be more organized, little has changed from previous years. From noon to sunset, the event has nearly 10 bands to play a variety of music, several speakers on marijuana issues, food and other vendors; and for the first time, the Artemis Fund is holding their craft fair in conjunction with Extravaganja.

Vernon Collier, CRC president, said the CRC's cause at the event is consciousness raising, political awareness and fun.

The speakers at Extravaganja represent different aspects of the politics surrounding marijuana prohibition. There will be two speakers from the Massachusetts Cannabis Coalition, President Bill Downing and Co-founder Steve S. Epstein. Representing the New Hampshire Hemp Council is Mark Lathrup. Richard Evans from the National Organization of Marijuana Laws will also be on hand. Marcia Duda will speak on medical marijuana issues and State Representative Ellen Story has prepared a statement to be read at the event.

AC Prof wins Pulitzer

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

An Amherst College professor has won the 2000 Pulitzer Prize in music. Lewis Spratlan, a Peter R. Pouncey Professor of Music at Amherst, received the award for his musical composition, Life Is a Dream, Opera in Three Acts: Act Two, Concert Version.

According to Spratlan, he was "blown away" when he received word on his receiving the award.

Any composer who premieres a work within the twelve months prior to the awarding is considered.

The work, which premiered at the college in January, was originally written in 1978 as the result of an appointment by the New Haven Opera Theater made in 1975. The piece was never performed as the theater folded before it could happen.

Life Is a Dream is Spratlan's version of Calderon de la Barca's 1636 work, La vida es sueño.

A native of Miami, Spratlan studied under Mel Powell and Gunthar Schuller at the Yale University School of Music.

Spratlan has instructed and performed at Tanglewood Center for the Performing Arts, the Yale Summer School of Music and Art, and Amherst College, where he has been teaching since 1970.

Orchestras in New York, Los Angeles, Washington, Pittsburgh, Miami, London, Moscow, Montreal, Toronto, and Boston have performed his works.

He has received assignments from such Boston based ensembles as Boston Musica Viva, Dinosaur Annex Music Ensemble, opera singer Karol Bennett, and John McDonald, a pianist.

Other New England based companies, including the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, the Lydian String Quartet, the Windsor Quartet, and Ancora, have performed Spratlan's works.

He has received fellowships from the Guggenheim, the NEA, the Massachusetts Artists Foundation, and MacDowell.

Life is a Dream was recognized in the Rockfeller Foundation-New England Conservatory Opera Competition.

Another of his works, Apollo and Daphne Variations, won the prize for new readings at the New England Composers Orchestra Competition.

Spratlan toured in Russia in October of 1989, performing with the Soviet Composer's Union.

His works Toccapsody, and Apollo and Daphne Variations made their premiere on the tour. Emin Khatchatourian conducted Spratlan's work Penelope's Knees in Rachmaninoff Hall, Moscow.

In recent years, Spratlan has been keeping himself busy with various premieres and performances.

In December of 1993, Spratlan saw the release of his recording Night Music.

In May of 1994, Spratlan's Apollo and Daphne Variations made its American debut, as performed by the Florida Orchestra, conducted by Jahja Ling.

Mohawk Trail Concerts commissioned an adaptation of Richard Wilbur's A Barred Owl, performed by Ian Opalach, made its premiere in July of 1994.

Other premieres included for Concertino, in April of 1995, Psalm 42, in April of 1996, and Vocalise with Duck, in January of 1998.

Spratlan has been recorded on Opus One and Gasparo Records.

He has also teamed up with Dinosaur Annex Music Ensemble for a multitude of performances of When Crows Gather and Penelope's Knees.

The Pulitzer was awarded to Spratlan for the second act of his three-act operetta, Life Is a Dream.

The second act opens with a nobleman, Clotado telling the king that his son and the hero of the opera, Segismundo, was given a concoction and brought to the palace in a state of confusion.

As he regains consciousness, Segismundo comments on the situation, and Clotaldo tries to explain what happened, but is attacked by the prince in retaliation for his earlier treatment. A servant, who Segismundo threatens, admonishes this action.

Astolfo, the prince's cousin, establishes himself with Segismundo, who does not receive him particularly warmly, the servant again scolds the prince for his actions, and the prince responds by threatening the servant yet again.

The scene ends with Segismundo killing the servant, after he was warned a third time for improper behavior, two fist fights between the prince and other members of his family, and the first meeting of Segismundo and his father Basilio.

While munching on hot dogs or Bananarama's chocolate-covered bananas, people can expect to hear rock and hip-hop from Davinci, reggae from The Equalites, rock from Sugar Maple Voodoo, rhythm and blues and funk from Soulwork, drumming and singing from Gaia Root and also music from Electric Blue and the Kosmic Truth, Rob Skeleton, Steve Crow and the Basement Dwellers.

This year, the CRC is having a special event at 4:20 p.m. People can expect the UMass Juggling Club and a drumming circle.

A goal for this year's Extravaganja, according to a CRC member is "to keep people smart about what they do there." Arrests have marked the event in the past two years, in 1998 there were nine arrests for possession of a class D substance and last year had a few less.

However, this year there will be student security to insure an organized presence on the Common, hopefully leading to fewer arrests and no crowds following the arrests, which happened last year. Tarmstrom added that the bands, which said negative things about the police while on stage were not invited back to play this year.

At Extravaganja, the CRC will also be promoting the statewide binding question that will appear on the ballot in November regarding forfeiture law and drug rehabilitation. The political effort was sponsored by Americans for Drug Rehabilitation, which the CRC helped to gather signatures as they did for their own drive.

Extravaganja 2000 will take place at the Amherst Common from noon to sunset. The event is free and open to the public.

The Massachusetts Society of Professors also made comments about the legal aspects of the case in a resolution passed by the executive board of the organization. Jane Glacobbe-Miller, the spokesperson for the MSP, explained, "the resolution is based on a review of the entire tenure file."

She commented that because of the denial of tenure to the professor, "a grievance currently stands at the president's level."

The organization, in previous documents stating information about the issue, commented that Almedia was an excellent educator at the University. She is the only junior member in the history of the School of Education to publish an article in the Harvard Education Review, and is the 'only Native American female faculty member on campus.

Glacobbe-Miller explained the organization's position, as stated in their resolution, is that Provost Marrett made an unfair decision in the case by, "retroactively applying inconsistent and altered standards that obscured Professor Almedia's contributions."

The organization also claims that the Provost made contract violations in the case of Almedia.

Their resolution stated, "Provost Marrett committed substantive and procedural contract violations in rendering her negative decision, such as applying ad hoc standards, improper use of the AFR as a prescriptive guide, and failure to consider the whole record."

Marrett, although she was in attendance at the meeting, made no comment on the tenure issue.

Faculty Senator Jack Tager, a professor in the History Department, commented on the issue, explaining that the Faculty Senate could do little about the situation that would make a difference to the case.

The Presiding Officer of the Faculty Senate, Ernest May concurred with Tager, saying, "It is certainly out of order for the faculty senate to make a ruling on this, this is for informational purposes."

Amherst clean-up starts tomorrow

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

The seventh annual Into Amherst project will take place tomorrow, at 9 a.m. in the center of Amherst.

The project, sponsored by the Community Service Learning Department, has been cleaning up areas around Amherst for the past six years, involving student volunteers from UMass and the other four area colleges.

The Into Amherst project has involved over forty sites in the immediate area, such as ponds, streams, YMCA's, and public schools.

"Traditionally [Into Amherst] has done spring cleaning type things with nonprofit organizations," organizer Meliah Thorpe said.

One of the first projects done by the group was to construct a playground for the Crocker Farm Elementary School in Amherst, Thorpe said. This year the group plans to do some maintenance on the playground.

Every year the list of sites that ask for volunteers grows, Christina Macginnis, one of the site organizers said.

Hop Brook, in South Amherst, was added this year.

"It's kind of like an old farm property that the town conservation department purchased to make it a conservation land," Macginnis said.

"The idea is to get students out to do community service," she continued.

Another way the organizers hope to get campus volunteers is to have a site on campus, to make it easier for students who would have a difficult time getting to the center of town to volunteer time.

The on-campus site is Sylvan Brook, which runs behind the Sylvan living area and into Mark's Meadow.

"We're planning to have about 100 volunteers between the two sites," Macginnis said.

She said they chose Sylvan Brook as the on campus site because "so many people go out there and party and hang out around the cross the cross country trail area, and they leave broken bottles behind, or chip bags, or beer bottles and beer cans around."

"It brings it home to students, when they're the ones picking up the garbage, when it's not simply the UMass landscape services picking up all the students garbage," she continued.

According to Macginnis, they have requested the help of resident assistants from the Sylvan, Orchard Hill, and Northeast living areas to get their floors out and help out with the clean up.

There will be free coffee and bagels provided by the Black Sheep restaurant in the center of Amherst at 9 a.m. Saturday for the volunteers that decide to go to off campus sites. These volunteers should meet at the fountain across from the Black Sheep restaurant at 9 a.m.

Those students that want to volunteer at the Sylvan Brooke site should arrive at the trail entrance across from Sylvan at 9:30 a.m. Saturday. There will be a bus that will take them to the center of town at noon to meet up with the other volunteers for a free lunch.

Biologist to speak Monday

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Renowned biologist, author and National Geographic photographer Dr. Mark Moffett will speak at the University of Massachusetts at 3:30 p.m. on Monday in Fernald Hall room 11 lecture hall. He will also speak at Hampshire College that evening at 7:30 p.m. at the Franklin Patterson Main Lecture Hall.

The talk, titled "Ants and Foraging: From the Self Motivated to the Team Spirited," will be based on his research conducted on ants and their behavioral patterns.

The Hampshire College presentation will feature of a slide show titled, "Life in the Tree Tops: Exploring the Tropical Forest Canopy," will focus on his research performed in tropical Asia, Africa and the New World Tropics.

Through his studies, Moffett has conducted research on ants, spiders, lizards, Asiatic sea snakes, Fer-de-lance snakes and butterflies. He is the author of a book about canopy biology entitled, "The High Frontier." Scientific papers written by Moffett have discussed subjects such as spiders and ants.

Performing research for several years at Harvard University, Moffett was the associate curator and research associate at the Museum of Comparative Zoology. He is currently a research associate at the Museum of Vertebrate Zoology at UCLA Berkeley.

Aside from performing research on tropical organisms, Moffett has published several photo essays and articles in magazines such as Smithsonian International Wildlife. He has also had the opportunity to work as a photojournalist, where his photos have appeared in National Geographic magazine. According to a statement from the UMass News Office, Dr. Moffett is appreciated for his work in different ways.

"The slide presentations of Dr. Moffett are particulars appreciated for the humor and dynamic style that he brings to them," the statement reads. "For this reason, Mark is in great demand as a speaker at international biology conferences and universities and was chosen to give the Master of Photography lecture for the National Geographic Society."

The Five College Lecture Fund, the UMass Entomology Department, UMass Organismal and Evolutionary Biology Graduate Program and the Five-College Biology Departments are sponsoring the presentation.

Editorial/Opinion

Our Opinion
Taking Risks

As most of you are probably aware, Rudolph Giuliani, the Mayor of New York City, announced that he had been diagnosed with prostate cancer. Thousands of men die from this disease every year, but the fact that a famous mayor has come down with this life-threatening disease shows us that everyone is at risk of getting cancer. Many people assume that little that can be done to prevent this and other forms of cancer. Or is there?

Although certain forms of cancer, such as prostate and colon cancers, cannot be prevented, there are many precautions that people can take to decrease the risk of coming down with other forms of this ailment. Take lung cancer for example: research has shown that cigarette smokers have an extremely elevated risk for the disease. Furthermore, over 90 percent of people afflicted with lung cancer are (or were at one time) smokers! With this knowledge, why is it that so many people smoke on a regular basis? If you simply refrain from smoking, your chances of developing lung cancer are next to nothing. You think that would be enough of a deterrent for people.

Although lung cancer is one of the leading causes of death in this country, it is certainly not fair to only pick on the smokers. Like cancer, there are a number of diseases that could be prevented almost entirely if people were more cautious of their actions. Take syphilis and other sexually transmitted diseases for example. These diseases, most of which cannot be transmitted via casual contact, have the capability of causing sterility, scars, birth defects in infected mothers, and even death. Knowing these possible consequences, it is rather perplexing that some people don't use condoms or abstain from sex altogether.

Also, Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS), probably the most well known disease in the world can virtually be prevented if people changed some of their behaviors. Although this disease can be passed through sexual means, sharing needles can also transmit it as well. This disease affects approximately 1 million Americans and over 30 million people worldwide. To explain it another way, approximately 30 million people across the world will probably die from a disease that could essentially be prevented by using condoms or clean needles. The fact that so many people ignore this is sad indeed, and shows how little people actually care about their health and the health of others.

Scientific research is advancing at astronomical speeds, and medical technology is improving almost every day. But the need for these developments would be drastically decreased if only people were more cautious and aware of their actions. It is said that 15,000 people across the globe are diagnosed with HIV every day – most of whom will eventually die from the virus. But if people just smartened up and lived safer lives, the problem would essentially be eradicated.

You see, Major Giuliani had no choice, but many people do. The world would be a much healthier place if only people paid attention to their actions. Let's hope that changes soon.

McDonald's and other cultures

(U-WIRE) EAST LANSING, Mich. – A headline screamed to me on the front of Sunday New York Times a few weeks ago: "More and More, Europeans Find Fault With U.S." The profile of a French book called "No Thanks, Uncle Sam," is described in detail. Written by Noël Mamère and Olivier Warin, the book is a page-by-page description of what is perceived by many to be the poison of the United States. Throughout Europe, people are being bombarded with American culture – and not always by choice. Just as Americans think their way is the best, everyone else thinks theirs is, too.

Should we be performing cultural genocide on other countries? I always imagined Americans left the United States to experience how other people live. Escaping strip malls, fast-food chains, poorly directed television commercials and reckless sport utility vehicles has always appealed to me.

There is already one United States. We do not need to create a mini-America throughout the world. I assure you, the pizza in Italy should not change – and it is much better than anything you'll find around here.

Throughout The New York Times article, there are countless examples of America's ignorance of everything European. Mamère cites his American landlady when he lived in San Diego. She asked him how his queen was, although France has been without royalty since the 19th century. I've had MSU students ask me what language they speak in Italy.

The American obnoxiousness was always evident with kids I went to high school with overseas. It often extended to their parents as well. They spent most of their time complaining about how Italy was backward. There is that three-hour break in the afternoon where businesses are closed and – the biggest problem of all: there is no mall.

What can you wear if there isn't an Abercrombie and Fitch down the street? Life is not worth living because even thousands of years of culture are just a nuisance if there isn't a great pair of overpriced, already-torn jeans ready to be purchased.

Lindy O'Donnell

They never attempted to say anything in Italian. Instead, they spent most of their time trying to get Italians – in their own country – to understand English. I am always embarrassed to hear or see Americans mimicking Italian customs, culture and desecrating pieces of history. There is an ignorance and, unfortunately, an attitude of American superiority – as if we are so much better than everyone else.

We are not.

Our crime rates are higher: We have more drug use, violence and poverty. We bully other nations and have no sense of history. We obsess over the sex life of our president and turn the loss of a little boy's mother into a political statement.

But I do know many Americans who are not ignorant and take the time to learn about other cultures, their history and just enough language to say, "I don't speak much [insert foreign language here], can you speak slowly please?"

It is hard to understand how so many Europeans can resent the United States when so much of American culture is openly embraced across the pond. Without doing much thinking or research, I can count four different locations of a McDonald's restaurant in Venice, Italy, and one more across the lagoon in the Mestre train station. When they began to pop up across Italy in 1997, I was thrilled, if only to have a taste of home each time I went to Venice.

Nothing is more comforting than a McDonald's cheeseburger after going six months without one. The crunchy pickles, freeze-dried onions and a micro-mini hamburger patty on day-old bread topped with an orange plastic-like substance called "cheese" was all I craved when the only fast-food restaurant within 50 miles was Burger King.

After I returned for my second Christmas break in Italy, I was appalled by a glowing yellow "M" sign only 50 yards from the 1,000 year-old San Marco Basilica. No longer do I view McDonald's as a piece of home, but a tumor on the side of historical Venice – as if Americans have ever had any right to invade a foreign country with their culture.

But maybe it is a little unfair to criticize just the United States in matters like this. Wandering the streets throughout Europe, you can see teenagers in Nikes, Levi jeans and other products considered "American."

Very few times have I been to McDonald's in Europe when I didn't have to stand in line – or push my way through a crowd to get to the front – and this even includes the McDonald's in Versailles, France. I, unfortunately, know the location of every McDonald's in many large cities in Europe. In some ways, the Foot Locker in Florence, Italy, is more impressive than the one in the Meridian Mall, 1982 W. Grand River Ave. in Okemos.

The world is getting smaller. We must preserve our own sense of culture, but also remember other countries have a way of life just as important as our own. Eating McDonald's fries in Italy is okay, just as long as you remember to try a plate of prosciutto and melon, and a cup of lemon gelato.

Lindy O'Donnell writes for Michigan State University's The State News.

More Notes from the Campus Center Basement

I never meant to be a Collegian writer. That just sort of happened. I never meant to become an editor either. That also just sort of happened.

I used to be freaked out down here because there are no windows. I'm like a plant, I need a lot of water and sunlight. The lack of windows used to just drive me nuts. You get used to things though.

When I was a freshman I didn't even know what the Collegian was. Then I discovered the cross-word puzzle, and I used to sit in the Cape Cod lounge in the sunlight and fill in those little boxes, sometimes a rush of helter-skelter letters all at once, sometimes I'd sit for five minutes and stare.

I never go to the Cape Cod lounge anymore. I always hated the hair that's all over those couches.

I remember doing one of my first double spread layouts last year. Good old Mike Messaros was at my side, cracking me up. He could dish it out, but I could dish it right back. Gary knows that. Anyway, the power went out, so not only was I stuck doing the double spread, which is a daunting task when you first start out, but there was a big delay. We sat down here in the dark for the longest time.

Remember, no windows.

Tanya and I used to have some good chats. There's a picture of me sitting in her apartment in my fake leather pants sipping wine. The picture was developed sienna-style, so it's in shades of brown. And I'm there with that big old glass of wine.

Brian McDermott's in Cameroon, I think. The picture he took of me that day looking wistfully at the library with a tear streaming down my face is still hanging on the wall. Gary wishes he could burn it, but I think he's just jealous. That's going to be worth something someday.

There were some fun parties last year. The people this year are cool too, but it's a different crowd. Props to Rob and Ryan, and good luck next year.

I saw the Chancellor once at the grocery store with his wife. Last spring. He was buying paper towels with his wife. I hoped he didn't recognize me as working for the Collegian. I think that was after last year's April Fools edition, which sucked. People down here were too funny to put out that kind of trash.

So here's the part where I say that if you think Gary's hot now, you should see the prom picture with his ex-girlfriend that's hanging on the wall in the sports section. Just think Kenny G crossbred with an Italian actor in Miami in the 80s. You get the idea.

Gary, you know I'm giving you that men's gymnastics poster that's hanging on the wall of my room. Oh, you want it.

And now for those of you who aren't Collegian folk, but who have supported me these past couple of years. Actually, I've known Colleen since freshman year. She always reads my stuff and leaves me notes down here. Thanks, chica.

So things are winding down in the old CC basement. Will I miss this place? Maybe. I'm not so sentimental as I was when I was a kid. When I was a kid I used to be sentimental about each day that passed in an endless imaginary world that was limitless and yet consisted of a patch of land no bigger than an acre. My knees were always cut from falling off my bike.

I'm still a klutz. Oh stop laughing, Colleen. You're just as bad.

Cape Verdean panel discusses cultural identity issues

Affecting issues identified by group

By Daniel Ryan
Collegian Correspondent

A panel of more than a dozen students from the Cape Verdean Students Alliance (CVSA) turned out Tuesday night to discuss cultural identity issues facing the Cape Verdean community. The event, second in a series of activities lined up for Cape Verdean Awareness Week 2000, was moderated by Edgar Barros who posed a number of questions that the community is facing.

The panel participants were all immigrants or first generation Cape Verdean-Americans. Many had immigrated to other countries before coming to Massachusetts. They not only share the cultural heritage of their families and communities, but also the experience of living in immigrant communities around the world.

Barros opened the discussion by asking panelists if their perception of Cape Verdean identity was different than that of their peers.

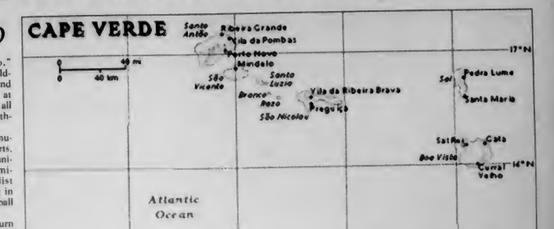
CVSA President Clpriano Andrade answered, "Most of my friends were raised with the same mentality I was raised with. They were brought up in the Cape Verdean tradition."

Benjamin Teixeira '01, who grew up in Portugal before coming to the US, added: "In Portugal family is a lot closer than here. Third and fourth cousins are like brothers."

"I grew up in Portugal, too," Emanuel Gomes added, "in a building that was all Cape Verdean, and everyone shared everything. Here at UMass you see the same thing, we all live together and share stuff together."

Panelists saw strength in community customs and traditions. Sports, especially soccer, bring the community together. But, as young immigrants in America, many panelist shared experiences of not fitting in because they couldn't play basketball or football like their peers.

"Also, how Cape Verdeans mourn their dead keeps us together," Paolo Fonseca said, "Seven days after someone dies, they go to their house and mourn and cry. It's different from other cultures than what I've seen."



Francisca Barros observed "After moving to the US, Cape Verdeans get Americanized, but a tradition like after someone dies, that will never be Americanized."

Racial identity was an issue that almost everyone had to answer. Cipriano Andrade felt that "In my household, we're black. People think we are African American, but that's not what I am saying. I consider myself a black man, Cape Verdean, born in Africa."

But Joao Baptista said "I was born in Cape Verde and went to Senegal when I was two. I was told everyday I was a white person (because I was much lighter than the Senegalese). Now I come here and I'm considered a black person."

Senior Neusa Decosta added, "A lot of people think that Cape Verdeans look a certain way, light skinned, but it's just not true."

The panelists also shared their views on the issues facing the young Cape Verdean community here in Massachusetts, especially between Cape Verdean-Americans and recent immigrants. They all shared the similar childhood experience of initially being closer with other immigrant students in their ESL classes than with Cape Verdeans-Americans. "Americanization" was a concern for the panelist as well, citing examples from their youth.

Cape Verde

Barbosa recalled that as a young student, Portuguese and Cape Verdean immigrant classmates were more helpful than Cape Verdean-American students.

"Cape Verdean-Americans would make fun more than anybody else, because we couldn't speak English or we played soccer " Baptista said.

"But now there are more Cape Verdeans coming out and representing. The same kids who were always making fun are now more Cape Verdean than me. Playing Cape Verdean music and driving around with Cape Verdean flags on their license plates," Andrade said.

Towards the end of the night the panelists began turning their attention from their past experiences to future hopes for the community. Moderator Edgar Barros asked, "How can we have a more cohesive Cape Verdean community?"

"First off, respect for one and the other," Joao Baptista said. "If we don't respect each other we can't have any community."

Sid Ferreira, Operations Manager at the UStore, stressed the importance of education within the community. A generation older than most of the panelists, he encouraged others to take an active interest in the history, culture, traditional music, and intellectual advances that are part of the Cape Verdean heritage.

Andrade agreed that a deeper awareness was necessary among the community, "A lot of Cape Verdeans have to feel proud, not just say they are proud."

The panelist also saw a need to educate the larger community as well. "I'm sure there are a lot of people who don't know where Cape Verde is," one panelist said.

"I was in UHS the other day and the doctor told me I must be Portuguese." Edgar Barros said, "I said, 'No, I'm Cape Verdean,' and it kind of caught him off guard."

In closing, Barros said, "We've got to stand up and let them know who we are, our history and culture… We're here having this intellectual forum, what we have to do now is carry it with us out there."

The Cape Verdean Students Alliance is hosting several events to promote Cape Verdean Awareness:

Tomorrow from 7p.m. to 2 a.m. Cape Verdean Cultural Night at the Bluewall with live dance performances, music, and traditional food.

May 7 Sugar Cane Fest African, Caribbean and Cape Verdean Cookout and Soccer Tournament at Boyden Field.

Some Navajo urge for plant to be shut down

By Bobby Cuza
Los Angeles Times

A half a dozen Navajo Indians staged a demonstration Thursday to demand that Southern California Edison shut down its Mohave Generating Station near Laughlin, Nev., saying the plant's operation is draining local groundwater and imperiling their way of life.

The enormous coal-fired power plant, which lights more than 1 million homes in Southern California, Arizona and Nevada, is the single largest source of sulfur dioxide pollution in the Southwest, making it a prime target of environmentalists. It is partially responsible for haze over the Grand Canyon, about 75 miles away.

But Edison, which owns a controlling interest in the plant, has generally counted as allies the Hopi and Navajo tribes that depend on the Mohave plant for jobs and royalties. Now, a small Navajo faction who make their home on Big Mountain in the Black Mesa area of northeastern Arizona is calling for the plant's immediate closure.

"More than 3 billion gallons of aquifer water are being drained every year. All the surface water is gone. And that's all so that Southern California Edison can do business," said Sharon Lungo of the Action Resource Center, an environmental group that helped organize the demonstration at Edison's Rosemead headquarters.

The problem is how the coal is transported to the Mohave plant.

The Peabody Western Coal Co. crushes coal then mixes it with drinking-quality water pumped from aquifers. The so-called slurry mix is transported via a 273-mile pipeline the only one of its kind in the world.

Edison officials note the pipeline avoids pollution that would be created by transporting coal via trucks or train. But protesters say the slurry line is also drying up this Navajo community's water supply.

"We're talking about life here about trees, about animals. The whole life of Black Mesa," said Leonard Benally, one of six Navajo Indians, including two grandmothers, who drove from Big Mountain for the demonstration. "You're talking about ecology devastation. When I was a kid, I remember flowing streams. Those things dried up."

Benally said in order to retrieve water these days, he must drive 25 miles to a school operated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Benally's community also bemoans the power plant's assault on its ancient way of life. The Navajo regard coal as the "liver of Mother Earth," and are dismayed to see it mined on the land they have inhabited for generations.

Most Navajo, however, aren't complaining. Many work at Peabody's Black Mesa coal mine, earning as much as $60,000 a year in a region of high unemployment and poverty-level wages. The Mohave plant also pays tens of millions of dollars in royalties to the Navajo and Hopi each year.

Demonstrators said the royalties are too small, and they complain that tribal councils fail to distribute the money fairly.

"They pay $45 million a year to the Navajo nation, and I don't see a red cent of that," said Benally.

Nader Mansour, Edison's manager of environmental regulations, said the utility is committed to finding another source of groundwater for its slurry pipeline. He said all parties _ including the Navajo and Hopi _ have agreed in principle to a long-discussed plan that would use water from Lake Powell. The utility is awaiting funding from the U.S. Department of Interior, Mansour said.

Edison, which owns a 56 percent interest in the Mohave plant, is currently considering bids for its stake in the facility. The value of the plant is estimated to be $150 million.

Illegal immigrants should not get special treatment

By Joseph Dolman
Newsday

Is this a great country or what? Late last week, maybe 150 demonstrators gathered in rain-swept Manhattan to march on behalf of amnesty for America's newest victim group- illegal immigrants.

Naturally, some paraders took the opportunity to share their stories with the media.

They spoke of clandestine journeys past "la migra" (the border police) in the Arizona desert, and they talked about the harsh lives they now must lead as illegal menial workers in the delis, restaurants, factories and homes of New York City and its suburban penumbra. They mentioned their constant vulnerability to exploitation.

"We are tired of being abused," one protester told a Newsday reporter.

As they demanded amnesty, they had another message for New Yorkers as well: "You can see it, you can hear it," they said. "Mexico is right here."

I won't argue with that.

Brother Joel Magallan _ a Jesuit who leads Tepeyac, the pro-amnesty group that staged the rally _ thinks perhaps 500,000 Mexicans have migrated to this region in the last decade. More than 95 percent of them lack documents, he says.

OK, who really knows? The last time New York City addressed the matter of illegal aliens was in 1992, when it reckoned that about 400,000 (of every possible nationality) lived within the five boroughs. Advocates estimate that Long Island is now home to as many as 40,000 undocumented Latinos. Whatever the real figure is, we're talking about tens of thousands of uninvited people.

And now they're aggrieved.

Sorry, but the sound you hear is what's left of my beleaguered social conscience slowly melting down. With a few more "humanitarian" causes like this one, I'm afraid it will disappear entirely.

Please understand, immigration has saved New York City _ there's not a doubt about that.

It has revitalized waning neighborhoods and it has energized the city's job base in fields ranging from microbiology to tourism. Without this tidal wave of new workers, the region and the nation could never have sustained one of the longest runs of prosperity in history.

Legal immigration should proceed at full tilt.

But it is bad when immigrants sneak past the U.S. Border Patrol and work here illegally. Why? Because illegal workers have few formal rights. When they arrive in great numbers, the nation winds up with a mass of second-class residents who must live on the fringes of the American dream. That is bad for them. And, as their anger inevitably rises, it is bad for us.

As Magallan explained in a telephone conversation the other day, few bosses pay illegal workers overtime. In fact, undocumented workers often put in 80 hours a week and get paid for 40.

If they leave a job before payday, they might not get paid for the short week they worked. Some bosses withhold Social Security from weekly checks, even though their workers lack real Social Security numbers. And on and on.

There are political problems as well. No matter how long they live here, illegals can't vote. Which means governments may ignore their interests. Most do not pay taxes. And because they're wary of officialdom, many silently forgo the benefits of police protection, parent-teacher conferences and other necessities of a safe and decent life.

No, this isn't fair - but how can you blame the United States for this predicament if you ignored its laws and violated borders? Oh, forget it. They're here. So wouldn't an amnesty solve the practical problem of a large illegal population?

Nope. Congress went that route in 1986 when it legalized about 3 million illegal aliens and set out to hold employers accountable for hiring legal workers. If that gambit had worked, the issue wouldn't be with us now. This time around, the AFL-CIO and some employer groups have joined the clamor to suspend the rules again, but let's hope that Congress resists the pressure.

Another amnesty would merely acknowledge that our laws don't work and we've given up. It would only invite more border jumping.

Enormous immigration in keeping with the law is a good thing. Enormous immigration based on who can outsmart la migra is not. Strong supporters of immigration - and again, count me among them - should not be shy about saying that.

Magallan, a native of Mexico, can talk eloquently about the economic plight of ordinary workers there. People should have the right to go where the jobs are, he says. Agreed.

But I think the United States, and New York in particular, have long been excellent hosts. The issue now is whether immigration should happen within the law. It should. We shouldn't feel guilty about that.

Dali's two sides explored in exhibit

By Paul Richard
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON - Salvador Dali (1904-1989) was the painter as magician. This is only partial praise.

He strode the art world's stage like the most flamboyant of vaudevillians. He wore leopard skins and funny hats, and twiddled his mustache. The man was unembarrassable. He'd screech about his genius and his masturbations, and wait for the applause. His shabby bag of tricks held an inexhaustible supply of Vegas-kitschy props: elephants on stilts, Stegfried-and-Roy tigers, obelisks and boiled beans, melting watches, ants.

Modernist sophisticates soon tired of his shtick, but Dali scarcely noticed. He'd lecture on the rhino. He'd hurl himself through windows. And then, all of a sudden, he'd do something so amazing one could not believe one's eyes.

In "Dali's Optical Illusions," at the Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden, you can see his act again.

His secret was the flip.

You'd be looking at a napkin, and then you'd see a sea gull. Or he'd present you with a donkey that - flip - became a monk.

He painted the old-fashioned way. He'd stand there at his easel with a palette in his left hand and a paintbrush in his right, calculating shadows and pondering perspective just as he'd been taught to do as a careful, timid student at his art school in Madrid. Dali's methods were traditional, yet he fashioned in his pictures some of the key newnesses of 20th-century art.

His show is pretty fabulous. It's also, in a charming way, eerily familiar. We all have been to Daliland. The beachlike zone he showed us so often in his paintings has become a place we share. We visit it in ads, in movies and in nightmares. Its lone and level sands still stretch to the horizon. Its enigmatic objects - that half-buried amphora, the white horse in the distance, the blasted leafless trees - still cast their stretching shadows beneath the silent sun. Something in his art is endlessly available. Dali at his easel set the landscape of our dreams.

Freud spoke of the unconscious. Dali, more than any other painter of his era, made that world beyond the rational appear before our eyes. His exhibit at the Hirshhorn shows us how he did it.

SALVADOR DALI

Salvador Dali's illusions and personal quirks are explored in an exhibit at Washington, D.C.'s Hirshorn Gallery.

There are more than 60 oils and drawings, ephemera, and even one green hologram in "Dali's Optical Illusions," but the Hirshhorn's exhibition is not a retrospective. It excludes his melting watches and much of his best painting. Dali's "Rainy Taxi" (its living snails trailing slime) is not on display. Nor is the razor that slices through an eye in the 1929 Dali-Bunuel film "An Andalusian Dog." The ocelot the painter liked to hurl into his swimming pool is missing from the show. So is his stuffed giraffe.

The focus here is tighter. The subject of this show is the half-old-fashioned science of his partly modern art.

Much modern art is abstract. Dali's is insistently, painstakingly depictive. Much abstract art is big. Dali preferred miniatures. When you step into the gallery, nothing grabs your eye. The smallest of his pictures - you have to step right up to them - are just dots on the wall.

Your Guide to all that's going on in the Pioneer Valley

Natalie Portman concentrates really hard on her acting as Novalee Nation in Where the Heart Is.

COURTESY 20TH CENTURY FOX

Where The Heart Is emotional tar

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

Where the Heart Is Directed by Matt Williams with Ashley Judd, Natalie Portman
Playing at AMC Mountains Farms, Hadley

Watching this movie is like spending two hours being beaten over the head with a 20-pound sledgehammer, onto the head of which has been fixed a scratch-n-sniff sticker of a smiley face smelling like gumdrops. Where the Heart Is could not possibly be a more textbook exercise in syrupy, manipulative melodrama, and aside from a "you go, girl!" chick flick appeal, it has nothing to offer. This movie is to film what Jewel's book of poems is to poetry.

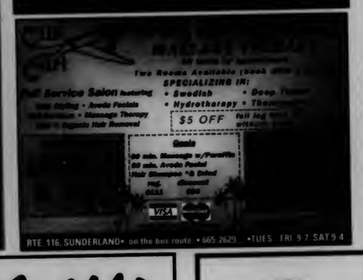
Natalie Portman plays Novalee Nation, a pregnant southern girl who sets out with her guitar-slinging, mullet-sporting boyfriend Willie Jack Pickens (Dylan Bruno) for sunny California. He abandons her at a Wal-Mart while she shops for a new pair of flip-flops, and Novalee has no other option than to live at the store, keeping meticulous records of how much money she owes Wal-Mart for food and clothing. Eventually it comes time to deliver her baby, thus introducing her to Lexi Coop (Ashley Judd), the nurse who cares for her after Novalee and the baby are discovered, and Forney (James Frain), the soft-spoken librarian who delivers the child after heroically crashing through a plate glass window. Novalee moves in with Sister Husband (Stockard Channing), a local woman whose generosity is matched only by the obnoxiousness of her name, and goes to work at Wal-Mart while pursing her budding ambitions as a photographer.

Where the Heart Is progresses with an endless series of easily digestible, touchy-feely dramatic developments, hammering home the moral punchline that home really is where the heart is. I'm feeling swell just thinking about it.

Admittedly, though, much of the movie is rendered enjoyable by the charismatic acting of Portman and Judd. It's especially encouraging to see Judd play a character of true substance, however saccharine that substance may be; for too long she has wallowed in a series of paper-thin action leads (Double Jeopardy and Eye of the Beholder come to mind), and her performance in this movie will hopefully further springboard her career toward more emotionally challenging roles. Portman does equally well for herself, displaying a restraint and hesitancy both perfectly befitting her character and indicative of this 18 year-old actress's already considerable talent.

Likewise, the supporting cast does the best they can with their often one-dimension characters. Joan Cusack, especially, lends her eccentric comedic style to the role of Ruth Meyers, the record company manager who takes Willie Jack Pickens under her wing and turns him into a commercially viable musician. (Willie Jack and Novalee later meet face to face in a particularly heinous piece of emotional sludge.)

Where the Heart Is makes the mistake of believing that subjecting characters to one emotionally and spiritually trying experience after another makes a suitable substitute for an actual plot, and the inescapable feeling of being taken by the hand and told precisely what to feel and when to feel it becomes increasingly tiring as the movie drags on. The only thread that holds the various chapters of the story together is the notion that Novalee, Lexi and Forney are decent people who deserve better than the hand life dealt them, and the amount of feel-good scenes of spiritual triumph, although at times entertaining, crowd out the sort of meaningful character interaction and growth that would have made the movie truly successful.



Melodramatic pulp, even with a tasty candy shell, is still melodramatic pulp. C

Open arms bring diversity to local theater and children

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

Tonight, at 7:30pm, at St. Bridges church in Amherst, the Open Arms Project will unveil their triumphant finished product.

Led by Ezzell Foranina, the Open Arms Project at Amherst Leisure Services spent the past year putting together a variety show for the public, where the stars are very unique. The play that they will present tonight is part of a Celebration of Diversity Theater. The students in the class work with local residents with special needs, and help them to display their talents for the world to see. The show comes complete with moral messages and social commentary on the treatment of people with special needs.

There are several instances in the show where the performers ask the audience to help them point out what is wrong with the way that people are being treated.

One of the members of the class, Jodi Fellows, a senior Psychology major at the University of Massachusetts said, "Little did I know that after interviewing for this internship, I would look back on the experience and not even recall how many credits I would be receiving toward graduation but so much more."

The Experiences working hands-on with the theater class has been one of great significance for me. I feel that it is important for the community to know the many ways in which theater is changing the lives of their own

City of Lost Children

Collegian Correspondent

The City of Lost Children remains true to our dreams if not our sense of reality. Created by the mischievous French duo Jeunet & Caro, the film has the visual flourish of Terry Gilliam's Brazil or 12 Monkeys; a post-apocalyptic nameless Gotham where the sun does not appear to exist and there are more alleyways than streets; the buildings look as if the Industrial Revolution stopped to take a leak on them, but then moved on without shaking off

Like their first feature, the sublime if somewhat flawed

Delicatessen, Jeunet & Caro use their camera to paint – the last shot is an iris-eye of an impossibly cute little boy emitting an impossibly perfect burp, as if we had just fed him a bowl of cheerios and he was paying us the supreme compliment of a satisfied diner. Also included for our sensual delight are stunning matte paintings of a distant tower, concave

P.O.V. shots and moderate CGI effects, used not for explosions and car chases, but to create an industrious flea, a nightmare-mist and a single tear drop. All of this is captured in variations of brilliant red, green and blue that, with the invaluable aid of costume designer Jean-Paul Gaultier and composer Angelo Badalamenti, bring Jeunet & Caro's world to life.

This visual and formal grace is in the service of the story, which is, happily, a fairy tale in the tradition of Edward Scissorhands and The Princess Bride. In an anonymous city on the water, children are mysteriously disappearing. When the younger brother of a simple strongman One (Ron Perlman, who you may have seen in Jeunet's recent addition to the Alien series, Alien: Ressurection) is kidnapped by enigmatic black leather-clad men with microphone guns and strangle monocles, One teams up with a plucky street thief Miette (Judith Vittet) to find him. In their quest, Miette and One discover the secret underground Brotherhood of the Blind, who dress in black leather and willingly blind themselves in order to accentuate the other four senses; they believe the eyes tell lies and instead, as an initiation ritual, attach large monocles to their heads and "see" a grainy green image akin to a security camera, while using high-powered microphones to heighten sound. The brotherhood, who Miette dubs "Cyclops", steal children and sell them for technology to a diminutive woman (Mirelle Mosse) and a timid man (Dominique Pinon).

After witnessing the trade, Miette and One are captured and made to walk the plank, which they escape from with the help of a washed-up carnival ringleader Marcello (Jean-Claude Dreyfus) and his mind controlling fleas. Miette and One are then separated, reunite, and infiltrate the distant floating tower where the children are taken. There they find the mad scientist Krank (Daniel Emilfork) – who attempts to steal the children's dreams because he cannot dream himself, but succeeds in only causing nightmares – a talking brain (the voice of Jean-Louis Trintignant), the small woman and the timid man, who is one of six clones (all played by Pinon, with the aid of CGI). As Miette and One attempt to free the children the Diver (played again by the busy Dominique Pinon) is hard at work destroying the tower, as he recently recovered his memory and realized that he originally inhabited the tower, created the woman for a wife, the clones for children, Krank as the perfect man, and the brain for something or other. But all his creations went slightly wrong; the woman became only a fourth of her intended size, the clones have a habit of spontaneously passing out, the brain gets migraines, and Krank cannot dream: he has no soul. In flashback we see Krank attacking the Diver, and with the help of the small woman, dumping him in the water. The climax comes when Miette confronts Krank inside One's brother's dream (in a beautiful sequence I wouldn't dream (pun intended) of ruining for you.

So that's the story, but the film is really told by characters, not plot. Along with the ones mentioned above, there are also two women who play siamese twins (Genevieve Breunet and Odile Mallet). Formerly in Marcello's circus, the twins now run the orphanage keeping Miette. They exploit the children for money, turning them onto the street to steal but providing them with a home, like Fagin in Oliver Twist. They also provide some of the best visual wizardry in the film, including a scene when one inhales on a cigarette and the other exhales the smoke. Along with the tragic Krank, they provide a contrast to the children; the few adults in the film have lost their souls somewhere in the process of growing up and attempt to take the children's through corrupting their innocence, whether it be teaching them how to steal or invading their minds.

Now that you know what The City of Lost Children looks like and what it is about, go rent it (I believe that it is in stock at Pleasant St. Video in Northampton and Video to Go or Advanced Video in Amherst). Don't worry about already knowing what's going to happen, for I have only laid you a barebones sketch of the plot – the actual narrative unfolds much differently, beginning with a dream and ending with a burp. This is a magical film, full of innocence and beauty, and it deals with the imagination of dreaming and the loneliness of adulthood maturely and gracefully without bothering to draw the line to thickly between the conscious and the unconscious...and, it will make you smile.

The class meets every Thursday night at the Bangs center in Amherst, and there is constant mention of the play that will take place tonight. The play is the main goal of the program, and it will act as the most refreshing reward to all of the participants who have put so much work in. The actors are representing themselves and presenting the talents that some of them hide within. Some of the characters that are represented include Conrad from Bye Bye Birdie, Buddy Holly, and others. Fellows says, "These characters represent strength to be who ever you want to be, to sing, dance be accepted and loved by others, but most of all not seen as someone labeled with a disability. The skit will represent a coming out. Not only from a shy withdrawn individual, to a dancing movie star, but a chance to show the community that there are ways to communicate."

As the time for the play comes closer, you would think that the participants of the project are looking forward closer, but that is certainly not true. There is quite a bit of stress on the fact that learning never ends. Ezzell Floranina said to her students last week, "When the play is over it's not the end of anything. It's the beginning of something great that we will do again."

As a player, Garner was a gamer known as Scrap Iron.

He once traded punches with Dodger teammate Mike Marshall, believing the big first baseman was malingering.

He won't go down without a fight now, but it is illustrative of the frustration level with a team that is last in the league in virtually every offensive category and was hitting .173 with runners in scoring position that Garner and coaches Bill Madlock and Doug Mansolino were all ejected from a 10-4 loss Monday night at Anaheim.

Said Garner later:

"I'm pretty much at wit's end. My job is to keep them positive, but I'm out of arguing, tired of screaming. I've never experienced a tougher stretch with a mature team. The Brewers were a lot younger."

With their new park, the Tigers have much at stake.

The stumbling start threatens midsummer attendance (the team sold out Jeffy opening day on their first home stands, and Gonzalez could become a season-long distraction.

Acquired in a nine-player trade with Texas as a star for the Comerica marquee and reportedly offered a $140-million contract, Gonzalez has already been the focus of considerable consternation.

It's early, of course, but many in baseball believe Gonzalez, who is also struggling with three homers, six RBIs and a .261 average, would be smart to take the $140 million because it is doubtful he will be offered that much as a free agent next winter.

The Tigers, in turn, will be roasted if Gonzalez leaves and they get only draft choices for a player who cost them outfielder Gabe Kapler, pitcher Justin Thompson and four others.

He is clearly on management's mind.

Publicist Jim Anderson got off an elevator in Chicago on Saturday and was greeted by pitcher Jim Poole.

"Did you hear that they came in and took Gonzalez?" asked Poole.

"Juan?" replied a stunned Anderson.

"No, Elian," said Poole.

Mistaken identity has been a problem during a rebuilding process aimed at re-arming.

Of the seven pitchers selected in the first round of the nine June drafts since 1991, only three remain in the organization and only two – Jeff Weaver and Matt Anderson – are on the current staff, of which a resilient Hideo Nomo is the ace, so to speak. Similarly, only three members of the regular lineup came out of the Tiger system.

Randy Smith, in his fifth year as Tiger general manager and on a hot seat with the Gonzalez deal and other moves, insists the foundation was in place for an improved season of .500 or better with a lineup that includes four all-stars but has been together for only those two games through Tuesday.

"I still think this is a team capable of taking a significant step forward," Smith said. "Maybe not to take on Cleveland or reach the playoffs, but with Gonzalez to be on the plus side of .500. We haven't played well, that's obvious. We need to turn it around and fast, but if this was football we'd be only in the fourth quarter of our second game. Hopefully, we can collect our lineup and make a move."

In the meantime, he continues to preach patience, asking increasingly skeptical Detroit fans to look to the future.

In a city that knows lemons, it has become an increasingly sour pitch.

Loaded Carolina visits Totman

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Last year, Maryland won the National Championship in women's lacrosse after going a perfect 21-0, which is the third time since 1995 that the Terrapins had gone undefeated.

Like possibly no other team in the history of college sports, Maryland has dominated the field of women's lacrosse – this year, the Terps have lost only once, against 16 victories. That loss? Against North Carolina.

The Tar Heels' 14-13 quadruple overtime victory against the mighty red squad is the only blemish on the face of the Maryland Empire in the past two years; an empire that has recorded over 20 points four times this season, and has exceeded 14 goals 14 times.

"They've beaten Maryland three or four times," Minutewoman coach Phil Barnes said. "They're the only team to consistently beat Maryland."

Today, North Carolina will come to Totman Field to bring its Atlantic Coast Conference brand of lacrosse to UMass. That brand of lax features an offense that hits the net more often than a tightrope walker with bad balance.

Consider this starting lineup: Meghann Mohler, 40 points, Erin McGinnis, 38 points, Kristin Off, 35 points, Kellie Thompson, 26 points and Gray MacNair, 21 points.

The high octane Tar Heel attack has led the baby blue to a team ranking of sixth nationally.

"It's a very diverse group," Barnes said. "They've got scoring on attack. They're great players, great on attack. It's that classic battle, offense versus defense, defense versus offense. We're just looking to go out and play our game and play some good 'D'."

As has been the theme of the season, the epic battle will be between the opposing sniper unit and the stingy Minutewoman defense, ranked fourth in the country, thanks in large part to the efforts of a nine-player senior class – some of which is responsible for offense, as well – that will be honored today for their time in the maroon and white.

"The senior class has really helped put UMass women's lacrosse back on the national scene, and they've done a great job the last four years," Barnes said. "The program is thankful of their play."

Those seniors will have to not only deal with the likes of North Carolina, but also a Sunday afternoon Atlantic 10 match-up with La Salle that will finish off the regular season for the Minutewomen.

The contest with the Explorers should finalize where UMass will rank among its A-10 competition in the placing for the upcoming conference tourney at Totman Field. With that in mind, the tie-breakers indicate that the Minutewomen, despite a record that, so far, includes only one A-10 loss, will line up at the No. 2 or 3 spot, the other of which will most definitely fall into the hands of Virginia Tech.

"It's our final A-10 game, and we want to compete at the highest level we possibly can," Barnes said. "La Salle played Duquesne tight, and they've played a couple other games tight."

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Attackman Fay Naber is third on the team in points, scoring 12 goals and seven assists in her junior season.

Tigers still lost in woods

By Ross Newhan
Los Angeles Times

ANAHEIM, Calif. –The Detroit Tigers ended an eight-game losing streak Tuesday night at Edison Field, but make no mistake: One win or even two isn't going to stop people from wondering if the Tigers haven't rolled another Edsel off the Motor City assembly line.

In a long and painful rebuilding process since winning their last division title under Sparky Anderson in 1987, the Tigers have finished better than .500 only three times and twice lost more than 100 games.

They opened the 1998 season with a 3-17 record on their way to 97 losses, lost 92 last year and faced the Angels Wednesday night with a 5-14 record, baseball's worst.

New Manager Phil Garner called it a disaster.

"Pitching, hitting, defense," Garner spat at Edison Field.

"The only area that hasn't been a problem is baserunning, and that's only because we haven't had many baserunners."

Garner knows disasters.

After all, he managed Bud Selig's underfinanced and undermanned Milwaukee Brewers for eight seasons.

And in 1992, his Houston home was destroyed by fire, which would have been a real disaster if a passing police officer hadn't noticed the flames, crashed through the front door and helped evacuate Garner and his sleeping family.

"Sometimes we have a guardian angel," he said. "I just wish that angel would show up again. We could use a little divine intervention here."

Garner would settle for a clutch hit or complete game.

In the eight-game losing streak, the Tigers set a one-season franchise record by giving up seven or more runs in all eight games.

No surprise, wrote longtime Detroit columnist Joe Falls in the harshest blast, because the Tigers are "a team of losers."

Falls absolved Garner, Juan Gonzalez and Dean Palmer, but asked:

What has the rest of the Tiger cast ever done?

Legitimate question, although Garner had predicted in the spring that this cast would be good enough to contend in the American League Central and was better, in fact, than the dominant Cleveland Indians.

"I've had to eat some crow, and I don't like the taste," he said. "It's been discouraging, but it's still early. You never like to have a rotten run like this, but it's better to have it at the start when you have the rest of the season to recover."

Garner agreed to a four-year contract as Larry Parrish's successor because he felt the Tigers, despite 189 losses the last two seasons, had potential and the opening of Comerica Park would provide added revenue to restock the team.

Things could get worse before they get better, though, at least from a manpower standpoint.

Several players are expected to be suspended after Saturday's brawl with the Chicago White Sox, disassembling a lineup that played together for only the second time Tuesday night when second baseman Damion Easley returned from the disabled list and Tony Clark (.125) and Luis Polonia (.174) were provided another chance to cure their ailing bats.

While some felt, at least, that the brawl enhanced Tiger togetherness, veteran Gregg Jefferies took a dim view.

"We can be buddies in the cellar," he told Danny Knobler of Booth News Service. "I'd rather be enemies in first place.

"You talk about momentum, about bringing a team together, all that garbage. If you don't win, it doesn't mean anything."

The manager has kicked rears and patted backs.

Beanpot in its wake, UMass resumes A-10

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

Four days removed from winning the 2000 Beanpot Championship, the Massachusetts baseball team will resume play this weekend as it travels to Bill Beck Field in Kingston, R.I. to take on the Rhode Island Rams in a three-game series.

The Minutemen (18-15-1 overall, 6-5-1 Atlantic 10) are winners of four straight, and have taken five of their last six contests. The push away from the .500 mark began on April 19 with an 8-2 win over the University of Vermont, and continued through this past week with a 13-8 conquest of the Northeastern Huskies on Tuesday. Head coach Mike Stone said that the recent streak has provided his team with a much needed morale boost.

"I think it's good, you get in a groove," said Stone. "You get used to winning. The Beanpot was a taste of a championship for these guys, something to look to and play for. It's big."

The Rams (19-19-1) are coming off of a winning streak as well, winners of their past three. Much like UMass, Rhode Island has flirted with .500 all season, unable to make substantial progress once crossing the line. However, as the Minutemen learned last week against a feisty Fordham club, a record does not reveal the nuances that truly complete the makeup of a club.

"They swept us last year, they're going to be ready," said Stone. "It's a big series no matter who we play. They're a good ball club."

While UMass has been mounting more offense as of late, the centerpiece to its streak has been solid defense. On April 13 against Northeastern, Stone moved shortstop Aaron Senez to third and inserted freshman Matt Boulanger at short. Since then, Boulanger has improved in every game, and Senez has been rock solid at the corner.

"I had a number of conversations with the people involved," said Stone of his decision to readjust his infield. "I felt Matt is the shortstop of the future, and the future is now. Even if he mishandles a ball, his arm is still strong enough to make the throw. It seems Aaron is more comfortable at third; he's a more reactionary guy. I feel good about it."

Opening up the weekend on the mound for UMass will be senior Travis Veracka. Veracka, who enters the weekend with a 3-3 record and an ERA of 4.59, is a pitcher far superior to the numbers he is carrying, something that Stone is well aware of.

"It's nice to have him on the mound in the first game," said Stone. "We just need to score some runs for him, we haven't really done that. We also need to play good defense behind him."

Following Veracka will be junior Craig Szado in game two, and sophomore Brian Hourigan on Sunday.

Pacing the Rams offensively this season has been junior John Scullin. Scullin, who has served his team as both a centerfielder and pitcher, has a .361 batting average with four home runs and 34 runs batted in. On the mound, Scullin has compiled a 5-4 record, with a 4.74 ERA and 41 strikeouts.

Behind Scullin is junior Mike LaBarbera. The shortstop is batting .325 with two home runs and 30 RBI in the leadoff position, giving the Rams a legitimate chance at early on-base opportunities. Freshmen Justin Lamboy, Mike DeLorenzo are the only other two Rams batting over .300, although their plate appearances have been limited due to sparse playing time early in the season. Leading Rhode Island in the longball column is Jason Chamsarian, with five homers.

Also dictating games from the mound for the Rams has been sophomore Peter Kehoe. In nine appearances, Kehoe has compiled a 4-1 record and a 2.71 ERA. On April 12, Kehoe secured his third win of the season by firing a three-hit, complete game against Brown in an 11-1 win.

The first pitch of tomorrow's double-header is scheduled for noon.

On Tuesday at Fenway Park, first baseman Kevin O'Connell drove a shot into the netting in left for his third home run of the season.

White's stellar senior quartet are Marci Hupp and Laurie Anderson, who combined for 51 goals, 57 steals and 16 assists on the year. Hupp's raw power at the 2-meter and Anderson's poor vision from the field have made the UMass offense too multi-dimensional for opposing teams to effectively counter.

Providing further firepower for McOsker's corps are underclassmen Kelly Chavez, Amy Black and Attie Berthold, who have teamed to rip opposing defenses for 69 goals between them.

But as any member of the team is quick to point out, defense has been the key to the Maroon and White's season-long stranglehold on East Coast collegiate water polo. The Minutewomen as a unit have compiled a massive tally of 284 steals to only 128 turnovers, as well as 21 blocks and 21 penalty shots drawn.

Individual defense has started without a doubt in the UMass net, where sophomore sensation Dana Sinkevich has stymied the best of the league to the tune of 189 saves through 104 quarters of play.

One factor that has provided some resistance to UMass' quest for domination has been the league's officiating. Especially for players like Grogan who learned the game on the West Coast, the "hands off" style of play demanded by referees in the CWPA has required some serious fine tuning style-wise to avoid ejections.

"We've had to adjust our defense a lot to the style of refereeing here," Grogan said. "In California, they really just let you play. Here, if you breathe on someone hard, it's a foul."

But even stricter officiating has done little to slow down the Maroon and White juggernaut on its road back to the National Tournament, to be held this year in Indianapolis the weekend of May 6. The top three teams from this weekend's Eastern tourney earn automatic bids to Nationals, where UMass finished in the top-10 last season against a predominantly West Coast field.

Kaila Holtz gave up three runs in the sixth, but helped her own cause at the plate, going 2 for 2 at the plate in the Minutewomen's 5-4 win over UConn.

Cross's two-run swat carries UMass to tight victory over archrival UConn

By Aaron Saykin

Although Brandi Cross' home run might not have seemed like the game-winner when she hit it in the fifth inning, by the end of the contest no one could debate its worth.

The fence-clearing blast from the standout freshman first baseman proved to be the difference as the Massachusetts softball team hung on to beat rival Connecticut, 5-4, yesterday at the new UMass softball complex.

After a slow start, the Maroon and White have bolted in the right direction, winning eight in a row and 12 of their last 14.

Ahead 3-1 at the time of Cross' rocket over the right field wall, the Minutewomen extended their lead to 5-1, and seemed certain to cruise to an easy win. But after a three-run UConn (29-14) rally in the sixth inning, the UMass (23-19) cushion wasn't nearly as comfy. And the Cross home run suddenly earned added significance.

UConn	4

"I thought we were going to hold them a bit better on defense," Cross said, thinking the Huskies were finished. "... It was a mistake pitch [that I hit for the homerun], and that's what you're supposed to do: make them pay for their mistakes. Your eyes get big, and you try to hit it hard somewhere."

The big sixth inning for UConn began when eighth-hitter Lisa Girolamo singled, driving in the first of their three runs in the frame. And after leadoff hitter Jessica Yanosy drove in a pair of runs to pull the Huskies within a run, Minutewoman pitcher Kaila Holtz was able to get the final out.

While the game may have been a bit closer than she would have liked, UMass coach Elaine Sortino was enthused by the outcome. Any win over rival Connecticut, she said, is important for her program – especially for a team with a handful of talented underclassmen.

"We always have great games with UConn. It's a healthy rivalry. This team gets better every time we play, and as long as they do that... well," Sortino said, pausing as she realized just how close the game became. "Anyway, I thought we played well today. We showed up to play. I think we beat a very good team... it's gonna be tough to beat us."

After allowing four earned runs through six innings, Holtz did not return to the mound in the seventh. Instead, Sortino put the ball in the hand of her co-captain, sophomore Jen Hadley, who spoiled any UConn comeback hopes.

Although she had not pitched in over a week, Hadley said she felt comfortable taking the mound for the late-game save.

"I was calm. I was ready. I was having a pretty good warm-up in the bullpen," she said. "It was getting dark, and we wanted to get this game over with... I think we all handle pressure pretty well – having to be put in [the game] like that."

Much of the contest's excitement stemmed not from the heroics of Cross and the UConn rally, but from the fact that the bill did schedule a double-header. Instead of leaving the fans with a split, UMass was able to excite with a close win. Sortino was also pleased by the format, and enjoyed the 5 p.m. start rather than the usual 3:30 p.m. beginning, which does not always give the fans an opportunity to watch the team play.

"I like it. There's a finality to it," she said. "Splitting, I can't stand it... I think you're gonna see more of it. It would be great to play some day under the lights."

Sophomore center fielder Teri Rooney also added a two-run homer for the Minutewomen, connecting on a two-strike pitch and sending the ball well over the center-field fence. Rooney finished the game two for three from the plate with both RBI coming from the blast.

"It was like a long fly ball," Rooney said of the shot at which many were surprised by the fact that it drifted past the wall. "I was just trying to move the runner over [to tag up], but it worked, I guess."

The other Minutewoman run was scored in the third inning, when Holtz drove in freshman Emily Robustelli with a base hit.

UMass will host a pair of double-headers this weekend. Saturday St. Bonaventure will visit for a noon start. Another Atlantic 10 team, Dayton, will travel to Amherst for Sunday's pair of contests that also begin at noon. The Flyers are currently in first place in the conference.

UMass locked and loaded to defend Eastern crown

By Adam White

Success is all about perspective.

For any other water polo team west of the Mississippi, capturing an Eastern Championship would be a truly stunning achievement. But for the Minutewomen of Massachusetts, anything less would constitute not only defeat, but failure.

The No. 13 Maroon and White will look to make it three titles in a row at this weekend's Collegiate Water Polo Association (CWPA) Eastern Championships at Princeton, NJ. The defending champion Minutewomen (23-6, 10-0 CWPA) will battle Slippery Rock at 6 p.m. tonight and Iona at 8:30 a.m. tomorrow in round-robin action, in hopes of ascending through tomorrow night's semifinal to Sunday's noon title game.

Anne Dettloff

At last year's Eastern tourney, UMass crushed Slippery Rock 12-5 and Iona 14-2 before squeaking by Princeton 5-4 in the final round-robin game. The Maroon and White then outlasted Harvard 6-5 in a double-overtime thriller before capturing the crown with a 5-2 win over the Terrapins of Maryland in the final.

Despite the team's record of past success against the Eastern field, players like All-American Katie Grogan are fully aware that the slightest lapse in intensity could spell doom for the defending champs.

"We can't take anybody for granted; we need to play our game and not let anyone push us around," said the co-captain from Costa Mesa, CA. "Iona and Slippery Rock are by no means All-Star teams, but if we don't show up to play, anyone can beat us."

But in all actuality, this weekend's tourney is essentially a two-horse race between the Minutewomen and the host Tigers. UMass has laced six of the field's 14 teams this season, and is undefeated (14-0) against five of the six. But in two showdowns with Princeton, Coach Dan McOsker's squad has come up on the short end of 5-4 and 8-5 tallies.

As the only East Coast crew to topple the mighty Minutewomen, the Tigers will indeed be the hunted among this year's Eastern field, forcing UMass into the unfamiliar situation of having something to prove.

"There's no question that Princeton is, right now, the top team in the East," McOsker said. "We're the ones now who have to come in and show that we have what it takes to move on to Nationals."

That winning formula undoubtedly starts with Grogan, who captured last year's Eastern Tournament Most Valuable Player award by exploding for 11 goals over the team's five-game title run. The senior 2-meter paces this year's group with 51 goals on .495 shooting over 93 quarters of play, along with team-highs in assists (22) and ejections drawn (24). Her 44 steals are also tops on the team, making her a total package of water polo power that few teams can stop.

While Grogan shines brightly as the Maroon and White's uncontested biggest star, her supporting cast is nothing short of spectacular. Her partner in captainship, Guam native Claudia Clement, ranks second on the squad in scoring with 50 points on 43 goals and seven assists. The senior field standout has also wreaked havoc on opposing offenses to the tune of 39 steals, good for second in that category among the Minutewomen.

UMass looks to dome-inate Orange

The road does not get any easier for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse as they travel west to the Carrier Dome for a matchup with the No. 2 Orangemen of Syracuse.

The Minutemen are coming off their toughest week of the season, a week that saw them pull out a tremendous victory over No. 13 Harvard and suffer a heartbreaking loss in Washington, D.C. at the hands of No. 5 Georgetown.

In both games the Maroon and White showed that they were able to compete with the nation's best, scoring a combined 28 goals while giving up 28 as well. The win over the Crimson was a hard fought 10-9 contest that saw UMass (5-6, 1-4 Eastern College Athletic Conference) have its best defensive stand of the year allowing a paltry two goals in the second half. But the glory of the two-goal second half would soon subside. The offensive would take center stage in this one, posting a season-high in goals in the 19-18 loss to the Hoyas.

"We played well, but we still lost," head coach Greg Cannella said of his team's effort against Georgetown.

In the contest with Syracuse (10-1) the Minutemen should expect much of the same pace that was thrown at them by both the Hoyas and the Loyola Greyhounds.

"Syracuse loves to push the ball up the field," Cannella said. "We're going to have to get back in transition to stop them."

The Orangemen are fresh off a win against No. 4 Princeton, a 16-4 victory at on the Tigers' home turf.

With their efforts in the past two contests the Maroon and White have come out of their shells, possessing the confidence that they lacked in a mid-season slide that saw them drop games to Penn State, Maryland-Baltimore County and Loyola. Before the drought UMass was poised with a three-game winning streak, with wins over Vermont, Butler and Boston College.

Despite their 5-6 record the Minutemen have moved back into the polls, coming in this week at No. 20. The last time that the Maroon and White were ranked was the UMBC game on April 8.

But when the schedule came out UMass knew that it would be a five-game stretch that would make or break its season. With post-season hopes left behind the Maroon and White face a ranked opponent for the fifth consecutive week.

The Orangemen come into the contest as one the nation's best scoring teams. Senior quint-captain Ryan Powell scored an astounding 85 points last year (39 goals, 46 assists) and comes into this year's game with 68 points (29-39). Aside from Powell, UMass must also contend with sophomore midfielder Michael Springer, who has posted 44 points this season with 34 goals and 10 assists to his credit. Follow sophomore Liam Banks ranks as the Orangemen's third leading scorer with 39 points (22-17).

The Maroon and White are no strangers to having a trio of scorers that compete at the caliber of the Syracuse triumvirate. Andy Flick, Peter Velepec and Scott Urick. The Minutemen were able to control this potency of these players, but it was the role players that dominated the scoring column in that contest.

The lone Orange loss came at the hands came at the hands of No. 9 Cornell on April 11. It was a 13-12 loss in Ithaca, NY, a game that the 'Cuse had an opportunity to win. 'Cuse avoided another setback by scoring 10 goals in the fourth quarter against Loyola to grab a 16-9 victory.

The task at hand will not be easy for the Minutemen, but will be especially tough for UMass netminder Chris Campolettano. Behind the cages are metal bleachers that make is very difficult for the goalies to see shots.

"It has an effect on the goalies. It is hard for them to pick up the ball on overhand shots," Cannella said.

Campolettano has had the daunting task of playing in the dome last season, a 5-4 loss to the Big Red. So it is not as if it is unfamiliar territory, but by no means is it going to be smooth sailing.

Aside from the fact that the metal bleachers make it difficult for the goalies the acoustics within the dome make it even harder for the coaches to communicate with their players.

"The acoustics in the dome are very bad," Cannella said. It's going to be difficult; we're probably going to use hand signals.

"Communication on the field needs to be better and that starts with the goalie," Cannella added.

Cannella wants his team to attack the cage and take somewhere in the vicinity of 40-45 shots. Attacking the cage is no easy task, but it needs to start from the inside out, rather than vice versa.

Game time is scheduled for 4:00 p.m.

JARET BARR/COLLEGIAN

Alex Racioppi scored seven goals last week against Georgetown. He may need more when the Minutemen face second-ranked Syracuse tomorrow at the Carrier Dome.

Body image focus of WOST project

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

A group of students in Women's Studies 187 class at the University of Massachusetts has been organizing a project focusing on educating students by building awareness of women's violence issues on campus and the ways in which women are portrayed in the media.

The project was one of numerous endeavors initiated by the class. This particular group's project involved creating flyers depicting different images of women in the media and asking students how they relate to the photos and how these images can contribute to violence against women.

The class, taught by Professor Alexandra DesChamps from the Women's Studies Department, deals with understanding how the media and culture portray women and how the media sets standards through these images that women can't live up to.

Freshman management major Tamara Baytth is taking the class and has been involved in gathering images of women and using them to create a collage aimed at projecting awareness of how these images clash in attempting to display a certain product, but instead use sexually oriented images.

The images presented by the project are open to interpretation by students as to their negative or positive representation of the female gender.

"Women see these stereotypes on a daily basis and feel that they have to live up to these standards when they really can't," Baytth said. "They're unrealistic stereotypes of women as sexual objects."

One of the images on the flyers is a close-up shot of a woman's leg, and half of a shoe can be observed on the bottom portion of the picture. Baytth said it is these kinds of images that are attempting to commercialize a product, but end up selling the subject as a sex object.

"We have a flyer of this leg and you can hardly even see the shoe," Baythh said. "What's the point if this is what a lot people like to look at, but a lot of women don't have this firm shaped leg that's long and slender looking."

Another picture of a flyer conveys a woman dressed in a provocative outfit and posing in front of a doorway. The flyer asks whether people would assume that she is a slut based on the way she dresses.

"You have this girl that looks slutty and you automatically think that she's a slut and that she has a lot of sex," Baythh said. "You're saying she must fill this role and we're saying that's wrong to do. Just because you dress a certain way doesn't mean you act that way."

According to her, they have gotten a lot of positive and negative reactions to the flyers. In the Central Residence Hall area, Baythh stated that numerous flyers were torn down hours after they were put up. Others considered them to be thought provoking and felt that they helped to shed light on issues that are generally overlooked in society.

Karim Mattar, a freshman computer system engineering major, is one of only 8 males in the class. Two female friends encouraged him to take the class, but he said he receives negative feedback from other men as a result of his involvement in the Women's Studies class.

"Most guys really don't care and they think women want to be alone and don't want men involved [with women's issues], which is really not true," Mattar said. "Men generally tend to stay away from anything that has to do with women's studies or women's relations."

According to him, some male students were attracted to the table by the picture of half-naked females.

"Men subconsciously view women as objects of pleasure to be viewed and analyzed for [their] beauty and that degradation of women from human beings to objects has stripped women of their individuality," Mattar said. "That sense of wanting to be accepted in

Party discusses women's issues

By Jason Trenkle

The Spring Holiday Party for Women took place Friday afternoon at the University of Massachusetts Campus Pond and celebrated the need to bring awareness to the issue of violence against women.

The event was open to all "women and their allies" in an attempt to draw the campus together to explore issues of violence and the oppression of women in society.

Shahanna McKinney, interim central coordinator of the multi-lingual volunteer interpreter's project, is one of the organizers of the event. She said that society is unaware of the need to address issues of women's oppression.

"I really think that one of the ways oppression works is it keeps us isolated as individuals and as groups," McKinney said. "We decided to have a celebration of our connection in the form of a multicultural celebration to provide a contradiction to that isolation which keeps us from ourselves."

Some organizations that are available to help survivors of violence include the Everywoman's Center at UMass, Necessities/Necesidades of Hampshire County and New England Learning Center for Women in Transition (NELCWIT).

According to McKinney, NELCWIT in Greenfield and Necessities/Necesidades in Northampton act as designated violence shelters, providing service to battered women. The Everywoman's Center is the designated rape crisis center of Hampshire County, in partnership with Necessities/Necesidades.

Everywoman's Center offers resource referral, leadership development, counseling, educating and interpreting. She said there are instances in which they conduct cross-referrals between the three resources so that women can be provided with the most information.

Jessamyn Smith, assistant director of the educator advocate program at the Everywoman's Center said that the images of women on this campus are no different than those depicted in the media and in fact, college-aged women are especially targeted because "they have the most moldable purchasing power," Smyth said.

According to Smyth, she said it is absolutely essential to discuss the destructive impact media images of women have towards the images of real women and real bodies.

"Does the media cause violence?" Smyth asked. "No matter how you feel about that, it's absolutely important to engage in that conversation and listen to the voices of women that have been impacted by the media and people may find their defenses challenged when they hear those women."

Universities investigated

By Pete Covrett
The Collegian (U. Toledo)

(U-WIRE) TOLEDO, Ohio – Fraternity deaths nationwide have raised questions of university responsibility for greek event what should be done to correct mishaps.

* A 19-year-old John Carroll student collapsed and died at a Kent State fraternity party April 9. The cause of death is unknown.

The university is not claiming responsibility, saying there was no oversight or negligence involved.

* A University of Florida student was found dead in a bunk bed April 20 in an Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity house, with the cause of death unknown.

The student was at a brother's birthday party the night before and was pronounced dead the next afternoon.

* An Ohio State University student died Friday at the Delta Tau Delta fraternity house after reportedly consuming too much Gamma-HydroxyButyric, a drug causing dizziness, nausea, and in some cases, death.

Mick Dier, a University of Toledo police officer, said no incidents resembling the events happening across the country have occurred at UT. Dier said the last major fraternity accident at UT involved the alcohol poisoning of a 16-year-old boy about 15 years ago.

The boy was the brother of a UT student who was a member of a fraternity. The accident occurred when fraternity housing was located by the Toledo Museum of Art, Dier said.

Dier added that a fraternity or sorority chapter could face a number of different punishments from an incident on university property, including being disbanded.

"A lot of different things could happen to them. It becomes more of a civil prosecution than a criminal prosecution," he said.

Todd Adams, coordinator of Greek life, said "liability goes in several different ways. It depends on who owns the property."

Adams said since the university owns McComas Village, UT could be held partially responsible; however, only 14 of the 28 registered Greek organizations are located in the village.

The capacity for McComas Village is about 374 students; however, the average occupancy rate is around 340 students.

The other organizations, many of which are major-specific, are located in the Student Union Building or off campus.

Lori Edgeworth, director of student activities, said each university situation is different and those involved must ask, "what are the circumstances? What caused [the incident]?"

Edgeworth said a Greek chapter might be disbanded because of an incident, but a determination of fault is not made without looking at each individual case's facts.

Amy Schuller, assistant coordinator of Greek life, agreed.

"It depends on the situation. It ultimately falls upon the fraternities and sororities," Schuller said.

Schuller said alcohol is only allowed at social functions by an "f permit" from the state. An f permit allows Greek organizations, through state authorization, to hold social functions.

Schuller said the only other time residents in McComas Village may drink is if they are 21 or over, and in their room with the door closed.

The village also conducts weekly safety checks in the buildings to make sure everything is safe and in order, Adams said.

"We have fire inspectors at least once a semester. We certainty meet all safety codes," he added.

McComas Village also has 14 house managers elected by each fraternity in the village.

The managers spend up to two weeks before the semester begins learning CPR, first aid and how to use fire extinguishers.

Shooting spree hits Pennsylvania

By Joie Tyrrell
Newsday

MOUNT LEBANON, Pa. – When Pat Finlay heard loud noises coming from the Indian grocery just a few doors down from her quaint needlecraft shop in suburban Pittsburgh, she thought it was routine construction.

But those simple sounds turned out to be the crack of gunshots as Richard S. Baumhammers allegedly shot two men at the grocery – one part of what authorities are calling a racially motivated attack that left five people dead and one critically wounded Friday afternoon.

The slayings cut a swath across a typical suburban landscape, past furniture stores, synagogues and open-air shopping centers. Authorities are left to wonder what prompted the violence that has rocked residents of this quiet community.

"We didn't know what it was," Finlay said. "We never heard gunshots before."

Baumhammers, 34, of this posh Pittsburgh suburb, was taken into custody Friday night by police in Beaver County after the two-county crime spree that claimed victims from five ethnic groups: a Jewish woman in her home, an Indian man at the grocery, a Chinese man and a Vietnamese man working at a restaurant and a black man at a martial arts school. One victim shot at the grocery remains in critical condition.

At a news conference Saturday, Allegheny County District Attorney Stephen Zappala said authorities had recovered a great deal of evidence from Baumhammers' home, including writings and literature that have been turned over to the FBI.

Ken Fulton, assistant superintendent of the Allegheny County Police, said Baumhammers had retained a lawyer and would not say what prompted the attacks.

"We have no clue," Fulton said. "He won't talk to us."

Baumhammers is being held without bail in the jail in Beaver County, where the last killing, at the martial arts school, occurred. He was arraigned Friday on charges of criminal homicide and reckless endangerment in that slaying. He is expected to be arraigned next week on charges ranging from four counts of criminal homicide to ethnic intimidation in the Allegheny County shootings.

As of October, 1998, Baumhammers was listed on a Web site of Latvian lawyers as an attorney in Atlanta who specialized in import-export and immigration issues.

But more recently, he had apparently been living with his parents in a white-shuttered home on a quiet, tree-lined street here. His father, Andrejs Baumhammers, is a periodontist who teaches at the dental school at the University of Pittsburgh.

Curiosity-seekers visited the Baumhammers' block all day Saturday. No one answered the door at their house. At the neighboring home of Anita Gordon, the first victim, family members pulled out of a long driveway in two sport-utility vehicles but did not speak to a reporter as they left.

A passerby who declined to give her name said she had given Baumhammers piano lessons when he was a boy. She said she also taught Gordon's children.

"These are good families," the woman said. "These are upper crust. How the hell did this happen?"

According to McKinney, NELCWIT in Greenfield and Necessities/Necesidades in Northampton act as designated violence shelters, providing service to battered women. The Everywoman's Center is the designated rape crisis center of Hampshire County, in partnership with Necessities/Necesidades.

Everywoman's Center offers resource referral, leadership development, counseling, educating and interpreting. She said there are instances in which they conduct cross-referrals between the three resources so that women can be provided with the most information.

Jessamyn Smyth, assistant director of the educator advocate program at the Everywoman's Center said that the images of women on this campus are no different than those depicted in the media and in fact, college-aged women are especially targeted because "they have the most moldable purchasing power," Smyth said.

According to Smyth, she said it is "absolutely essential to discuss the destructive impact media images of women have towards the images of real women and real bodies.

"Does the media cause violence?" Smyth asked. "No matter how you feel about that, it's absolutely important to engage in that conversation and listen to the voices of women that have been impacted by the media and people may find their defenses challenged when they hear those women."

Universities investigated

By Pete Covrett
The Collegian (U Toledo)

(U-WIRE) TOLEDO, Ohio – Fraternity deaths nationwide have raised questions of university responsibility for greek event what should be done to correct mishaps.

" A 19-year-old John Carroll student collapsed and died at a Kent State fraternity party April 9. The cause of death is unknown.

The university is not claiming responsibility, saying there was no oversight or negligence involved.

" A University of Florida student was found dead in a bunk bed April 20 in an Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity house, with the cause of death unknown.

The student was at a brother's birthday party the night before and was pronounced dead the next afternoon.

" An Ohio State University student died Friday at the Delta Tau Delta fraternity house after reportedly consuming too much Gamma-HydroxyButyric, a drug causing dizziness, nausea, and in some cases, death.

Mick Dier, a University of Toledo police officer, said no incidents resembling the events happening across the country have occurred at UT. Dier said the last major fraternity accident at UT involved the alcohol poisoning of a 16-year-old boy about 15 years ago.

The boy was the brother of a UT student who was a member of a fraternity. The accident occurred when fraternity housing was located by the Toledo Museum of Art, Dier said.

Dier added that a fraternity or sorority chapter could face a number of different punishments from an incident on university property, including being disbanded.

"A lot of different things could happen to them. It becomes more of a civil prosecution than a criminal prosecution," he said.

Todd Adams, coordinator of Greek life, said "liability goes in several different ways. It depends on who owns the property."

Adams said since the university owns McComas Village, UT could be held partially responsible, however, only 14 of the 28 registered Greek organizations are located in the village.

The capacity for McComas Village is about 374 students, however, the average occupancy rate is around 340 students.

The other organizations, many of which are major-specific, are located in the Student Union Building or off campus.

Lori Edgeworth, director of student activities, said each university situation is different and those involved must ask, "what are the circumstances? What caused [the incident]?"

Edgeworth said a Greek chapter might be disbanded because of an incident, but a determination of fault is not made without looking at each individual case's facts.

Amy Schuller, assistant coordinator of Greek life, agreed.

"It depends on the situation. It ultimately falls upon the fraternities and sororities," Schuller said.

Schuller said alcohol is only allowed at social functions by an "f permit" from the state. An f permit allows Greek organizations, through state authorization, to hold social functions.

Schuller said the only other time residents in McComas Village may drink is if they are 21 or over, and in their room with the door closed.

The village also conducts weekly safety checks in the buildings to make sure everything is safe and in order, Adams said.

"We have fire inspectors at least once a semester. We certainty meet all safety codes," he added.

McComas Village also has 14 house managers elected by each fraternity in the village.

The managers spend up to two weeks before the semester begins learning CPR, first aid and how to use fire extinguishers.

Shooting spree hits Pennsylvania

By Joie Tyrrell
Newsday

MOUNT LEBANON, Pa. – When Pat Finlay heard loud noises coming from the Indian grocery just a few doors down from her quaint needlecraft shop in suburban Pittsburgh, she thought it was routine construction.

But those simple sounds turned out to be the crack of gunshots as Richard S. Baumhammers allegedly shot two men at the grocery – one part of what authorities are calling a racially motivated attack that left five people dead and one critically wounded Friday afternoon.

The slayings cut a swath across a typical suburban landscape, past furniture stores, synagogues and open-air shopping centers. Authorities are left to wonder what prompted the violence that has rocked residents of this quiet community.

"We didn't know what it was," Finlay said. "We never heard gunshots before."

Baumhammers, 34, of this posh Pittsburgh suburb, was taken into custody Friday night by police in Beaver County after the two-county crime spree that claimed victims from five ethnic groups: a Jewish woman in her home, an Indian man at the grocery, a Chinese man and a Vietnamese man working at a restaurant and a black man at a martial arts school. One victim shot at the grocery remains in critical condition.

At a news conference Saturday, Allegheny County District Attorney Stephen Zappala said authorities had recovered a great deal of evidence from Baumhammers' home, including writings and literature that have been turned over to the FBI.

Ken Fulton, assistant superintendent of the Allegheny County Police, said Baumhammers had retained a lawyer and would not say what prompted the attacks.

"We have no clue," Fulton said. "He won't talk to us."

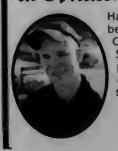
Baumhammers is being held without bail in the jail in Beaver County, where the last killing, at the martial arts school, occurred. He was arraigned Friday on charges of criminal homicide and reckless endangerment in that slaying. He is expected to be arraigned next week on charges ranging from four counts of criminal homicide to ethnic intimidation in the Allegheny County shootings.

As of October, 1998, Baumhammers was listed on a Web site of Latvian lawyers as an attorney in Atlanta who specialized in import-export and immigration issues.

But more recently, he had apparently been living with his parents in a white-shuttered home on a quiet, tree-lined street here. His father, Andrejs Baumhammers, is a periodontist who teaches at the dental school at the University of Pittsburgh.

Curiosity-seekers visited the Baumhammers' block all day Saturday. No one answered the door at their house. At the neighboring home of Anita Gordon, the first victim, family members pulled out of a long driveway in two sport-utility vehicles but did not speak to a reporter as they left.

A passerby who declined to give her name said she had given Baumhammers piano lessons when he was a boy. She said she also taught Gordon's children.



"These are good families," the woman said. "These are upper crust. How the hell did this happen?"

Others viewed the images as communicating a message of beauty and therefore should not be viewed as bad advertising, but more as a form of art. Some students evaluated the project as effective and could relate to the images as portraying women in the media as sex symbols. Participants offered feedback to the students as to how they could improve the project, including making the message more clear.

Cloned cow appears normal

By Rick Weiss
Washington Post

Cloned cows don't show the signs of premature aging that scientists found in Dolly the cloned sheep, and they may even be born genetically "younger" than conventionally produced calves, according to research published Friday.

The new work suggests that at least some cells are mysteriously rejuvenated through cloning. And it hints that cells taken from cloned human embryos may be particularly valuable as replacement cells in people suffering from diseases of old age. That could heat up a simmering political and ethical debate over the appropriateness of growing cloned human embryos for medical purposes.

Already, a bioethics group in Britain has recommended that scientists there be allowed to create cloned human embryos and then destroy them to retrieve potentially curative cells.

The technique could allow patients to replace their failing tissues with cells that are young, healthy and genetically identical to themselves, because they would have been grown from embryos cloned from themselves.

That procedure, called therapeutic cloning, is considered by some to be less controversial than "reproductive cloning," in which a cloned human embryo would be allowed to develop fully to birth.

Still, many Americans – including many in Congress – are opposed to the creation of human embryos for research.

The new findings contrast with others generated two years ago, when scientists made the surprising discovery that cells from Dolly, the famous cloned sheep, had the molecular hallmarks of being six years older than she was. That raised the peculiar prospect that Dolly had somehow "inherited" the six years that had been lived by the adult ewe from which she was cloned.

On a more practical level, the Dolly work led some scientists to believe that cloned human cells might also be constitutively old, thus relatively useless for the treatment of diseases of aging.

The new finding that some cells from clones may be especially youthful "is an argument for making human therapeutic cloning legal," said Michael West, president and chief executive officer of Advanced Cell Technology, a biotechnology company in Worcester, Mass., that sponsored the research.

West and his colleagues created six cloned calves from laboratory-grown cow cells that were first allowed to grow to old age. A few months after the cloned calves were born, the team removed some blood cells and measured the lengths of their telomeres – structures on the tips of chromosomes, which carry most of the genes inside cells.

Telomeres shrink each a cell divides, so their length gives an approximation of a cell's remaining life span. Dolly's had proven to be surprisingly short for her age. But the calves' telomeres were slightly longer than those in conventionally bred calves born at the same time, the team reports in Friday's issue of the journal Science.

The finding doesn't necessarily mean that cloned calves will live longer than other calves, or that Dolly is doomed to die young.

"Life span is determined by many factors, of which telomere length may be one under some circumstances," said Ian Wilmut, the Scottish scientist who oversaw the cloning of Dolly.

Moreover, methods for measuring telomere length remain crude, and lengths can vary significantly from cell to cell in a single animal, said Jerry Shay of the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center in Dallas. That makes it difficult to draw firm conclusions from two experiments involving a total of just seven animals.

But in unpublished research, University of Connecticut scientist Xiangzhong Yang also has found that telomeres in cloned calves are normal length or longer, and others have found elongated telomeres in cloned mice. It's unclear why Dolly was different, Yang said. But he agreed with West that scientists can no longer presume that cloned human embryo cells will be too short-lived to be of medical benefit.

West said that despite complaints from some activists, his company is still conducting experiments in which scientists combine human cells and cow eggs to make cloned, mostly human early embryos.

The goal is to understand how cloning "rewinds the biological clock," he said, so scientists can develop less controversial methods for adding years of life to dying cells.

Democratic Revolutionary Party's anti-drug stance puzzling to Mexican public

By Mary Beth Sheridan
Los Angeles Times

MEXICO CITY – Francisco Labastida was no stranger to violence. As governor of Sinaloa state, Mexico's legendary drug capital, he had received the whispered warnings, opened the scribbled death threats. But this new peril was different.

Mexican intelligence agencies had learned of a plot to kill Labastida, who had just left office. And his wife, Maria Teresa Uriarte, was party to a chilling hint of that threat: a mysterious man had snapped pictures of her in an outdoor market and then fled.

For Labastida, it was the last straw. "He said to me, 'I can live with a threat to my life. I can't live with a threat to yours. We're leaving Mexico,'" his wife says, recalling that moment in 1993. Labastida took a job as ambassador to Portugal, his political career stalling.

Seven years later, he's back. Capping a swift rise through the Cabinet, Labastida is the frontrunner for the presidential election in July. He could become the first Mexican leader to face the wrath of the drug underworld and survive.

And yet controversy swirls around Labastida's anti-narcotics actions. Opposition politicians have made drugs a major issue, accusing the candidate and his long-ruling Institutional Revolutionary Party of having gone easy on traffickers.

Labastida angrily denies such accusations. And indeed, there appears to be no solid evidence that he made deals with narcotics groups. Still, interviews with nearly two dozen politicians, analysts and U.S. and Mexican officials, along with a study of newspaper archives, suggest that Labastida was less than the heroic crusader he has portrayed in his ads.

For American authorities, who blame Mexican traffickers for 70 percent of the illegal drugs smuggled into the United States, Labastida's experience is of keen interest. Would it inspire him, if elected, to go after narcotics gangs?

The candidate says it would. But others believe Labastida's experience illustrates why it has been so difficult for Mexican authorities to make progress against drug cartels.

"I don't think any Mexican president is crazy enough to declare an all-out war on drugs. What are the costs? What are the benefits? Add all that up," said Jorge Castaneda, a political scientist who advises one of Labastida's rivals. "Society is not clamoring for a war."

Labastida, an economist, did not set out to be an anti-drug warrior. But when the longtime federal bureaucrat returned to his native Sinaloa in 1986, running for governor on a law-and-order platform, he was thrust into a landscape of drug violence. One morning he set out for a political event, leaving his car at home. He returned to find it sprayed with bullets. "It was a message."

Labastida recalled in a recent interview on his campaign plane.

In the recent interview, the candidate struggled to talk about two close aides who died during his tenure as governor of the state of Sinaloa fighting the drug traffickers and their protectors.

One of the victims was Labastida's bodyguard, Capt. Adelaido Valverde. On Sept. 17, 1990, the guard and state police officers intercepted a convoy they believed was protecting narcotics trafficker Hector Luis "El Guero" Palma, according to Culiacan newspaper reports. But the carloads of armed men were federal police; it was never clear if they were guarding the trafficker. A gunfight broke out between the police forces, and Valverde was killed.

"Here there are two extremes," said Labastida. "There is the extreme of the people who are corrupt, and the extreme of the people who are honest and courageous."

But others say Labastida's state police were typical of Mexico's underpaid, poorly trained, officers susceptible to being corrupted by rivers of drug money.

"Drug traffickers have more power than any governor here," said Gregorio Urias, the former head of the left-wing Democratic Revolution Party (PRD) in Sinaloa.

He agreed that Labastida's state police fought Palma, but alleged that it was not out of duty. Rather, he charged, they were allied with a rival trafficking group loyal to Felix Gallardo.

"There was a war between bands of drug traffickers. The state government openly combated one group," said Urias, who worked in the campaign of one of Labastida's rivals, PRD candidate Cuauhtemoc Cardenas.

Weapons agreement reached

By Colum Lynchrstan
Special to The Washington Post

UNITED NATIONS – Faced with mounting international pressure on Israel to declare its secret nuclear weapons program, the United States has reached an "understanding" with Egypt not to scuttle an Arab initiative in the United Nations to formally identify Israel as a nuclear power and urge it to open its nuclear facilities to international inspectors, according to U.S. and U.N. diplomats.

The United States has actively blocked past attempts by Arab governments to spotlight Israel's nuclear program at conferences held by signatories of the 1970 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT), arguing that Middle East disarmament issues should be resolved within the framework of the Arab-Israeli peace process.

But with delegates set to begin discussing nuclear developments in the Middle East on Monday, Washington has indicated it is prepared to back Egypt's proposal on the condition that any final U.N. document naming Israel is "balanced" and recognizes three other countries, Pakistan, India and Cuba, that have not signed the nuclear agreement, according to U.N. diplomats.

"We have had some discussions on this subject, we have some elements of understanding, but there is still more to be done," said U.S. Undersecretary for Arms Control John Holum. "It's not a 'resolved matter.'"

Arms control advocates and foreign disarmament experts say the United States is seeking to avoid another international dust-up over the Middle East when it is already under fire for pressing ahead with a limited national missile defense system and for failing to impose deep cuts in its own nuclear arsenal.

In 1995, Arab countries, led by Egypt, threatened to torpedo U.S. efforts to achieve a pact to extend the NPT indefinitely until Washington agreed to approve a U.N. resolution calling for all Middle East countries to permit international scrutiny of their nuclear programs, an indirect reference to Israel.

"The Middle East is the issue that most worries the Americans, more so than disarmament," said David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Studies. "Egypt is always upping the ante and they see the NPT as a place to score some points. I'm worried the issue could bring the whole review conference down."

The 1970 nuclear accord commits the 182 signatories without nuclear weapons never to develop them. In exchange, the five declared nuclear powers – the United States, Russia, Britain, France and China – pledged to take steps toward the dismantling of their own nuclear arsenals.

Since 1995, other Middle East countries – Oman, the United Arab Emirates and Djibouti – have signed the NPT, making Israel the only country in the region that has not joined the nuclear treaty body.

Russians celebrate traditional May holidays

By Will Englund
Baltimore Sun

MOSCOW – Suddenly, spring has broken out here, as it does only in Russia, with weeks and weeks of pent-up expectation finally giving way in all places at once, with flowers and verdant grasses and green growth erupting everywhere, with darkness in full retreat before ever-lengthening hours of daylight, with sunbathers and lovers on every bench.

Just in time, Russians have before them the chance to celebrate not one, not two – but six holidays between now and May 9.

Head to the dacha, head to the lake, head to the park, turn the soil, plant potatoes, fix the car. Forget about work – just forget about it. But one thing, please: no more ideology.

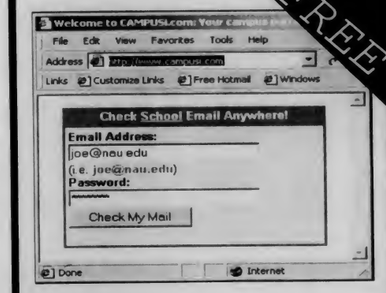
The Russian holiday has undergone a sparkling transformation. From a not-always-so-solemn religious festival in centuries past to a satiric carnival under the Bolsheviks to a parade of slogans and banners under Stalin to a time of bitter debate under perestroika, it has become simply a celebration of whatever happens to be at hand.

The Russian holidas has less content than ever, and all the more reason for enjoying it.

"May Day," says a young mother named Alla Koryagina, referring to the second of the holi days, "is just a tradition now, a pretext to lay out a feast, invite your friends and rejoice."

Sunday, by coincidence, was Orthodox Easter, growing rapidly in prominence but associated in most people's minds with dyeing eggs and eating a cake called kulich. May Day came Monday. Tuesday was May Day, Part II, a holiday that's supposed to be about sobering up from the day before: but if the weather stays fair, it could be a good excuse for extending the bash.

A few paltry days of work follow.



Then, May 7, which Vladimir V. Putin has chosen for his inauguration as president, is the Day of the Russian Army (not to be confused with the Day of the Defenders of the Fatherland, Feb. 23, or with the Day of the Armed Forces of the Russian Federation, a holiday Putin is reported to be planning to propose for celebration Oct. 1, which this year is the 430th anniversary of the founding of Russia's regular fighting force by Ivan the Terrible).

May 8 is Eve of Victory Day (as in the victory over Nazi Germany), and May 9 is Victory Day proper. May 10 is the first day back at any kind of serious work, but no one is scheduling anything significant until the 11th at the earliest.

It's not fair to say that these holidays are meaningless. For believers, Easter is the most important holiday of the year. And the three holidays over the second weekend have a certain martial tinge to them –but not so much that most people would let it get between them and a picnic in the countryside.

Our Opinion

Bad textbooks

On April 26, a panel of scientists announced their conclusions regarding the failure of some students to learn algebra. The fault, it seems, lies in the textbooks used. A review panel of mathematicians, college math teachers, and K-12 math teachers examined 12 commonly used algebra textbooks and found that they did not effectively communicate to students that algebra is useful in every day life.

The results showed that five of the 12 books evaluated (including the three most widely used) were inadequate to the point of being useless for student learning. The remaining books were deemed adequate, and none of the books met the panel's criteria for being excellent.

Book publishers claim they are not to blame and given the confused state of public education today, they may have an argument on their side. The publishers claim that textbooks are designed to meet the criteria set by state legislatures. The books chosen are often from the largest publishing houses and have been marketed aggressively, which increases the overall cost of the books.

Thus schools that purchase books may not pick the best books for their students because there is little guidance as to which books are the most effective at teaching students. Books are picked more for their name recognition than their content; it is not surprising that students struggle with their work.

Since an increasing number of students are required to take advanced math courses on the college level, it is important that they receive a solid foundation in algebra. New mathematical concepts build on previously learned concepts in a direct way; if students do not understand the basics, there is little chance that they will understand what follows.

Therefore it is essential that guidelines for evaluating textbooks are implemented. With guidelines in place, book publishers can change their textbooks to better suit students' needs, and schools will be able to compare and contrast textbooks based on a clear set of standards.

Millions of dollars are spent each year on textbooks, and this money should go towards the best bang for the public's buck. But beyond the consideration of money, there is the future of the students to consider. Algebra offers problem-solving tools that can be of practical importance whether the student ultimately becomes an airplane pilot, an engineer or a butcher. It can help students who stop taking math in high school, and it is a necessary prerequisite for students interested in taking college math.

Many people find math to be a difficult subject in and of itself. There is no sense in compounding the problem by providing inadequate textbooks. Therefore the Collegian believes that the sooner some guidelines are put into place the better. It is important to ensure that students are receiving the best education possible in algebra.

Your Opinion

Site not censored

To the editor:

Since the Boston Globe story about my "racy" website has occasioned some comment in this newspaper, I thought it would be worth pointing out that I have indeed moved my site to a private server, the spa.com, which offered to host it free of charge. The new URL is http://www.naughtyprofessor.com. As you may gather from my new domain name, my site is not intended to be viewed by the literal minded or irony impaired.

I also wanted to make clear that I was not censored by UMass, as has often been alleged in this paper and elsewhere. I volunteered to take the site down temporarily. No one ever asked me to do so or even hinted that I might. The University has rightly come out squarely behind the First Amendment in terms of what it will allow professors to post on their websites. The day after the Globe story ran, I reached an agreement with the University administration allowing me to put my website back up on the University server any time I wish. They suggested that I put up a disclaimer if and when I did so, and I agreed that I would adopt their suggestion if and when I did put my website back up. It was, in my view, a reasonable compromise.

Censorious pressures may be out there. Indeed, the Globe story might be construed as one of them. But pressure to censor faculty websites is not, to its lasting credit, coming from this University.

UMass porn stars in training

Ladies and gentlemen, allow me now the pleasure of presenting to you a certain man. A great man. A man of vision. A man of destiny. Dear sweet reader, please allow me to present to you my personal hero, Danny Tehranian, Founder and President of the University of Massachusetts Adult Film Club.

You heard me. Danny is the Chief Executive of the UMass Adult Film Club, one of the fastest-growing and most influential organizations on this campus (membership is currently "about 40," with one third of that being female). Using every connection and journalistic dirty trick at my disposal (such as knocking on his door) I recently succeeded in gaining a face-to-face interview with Mr. Tehranian, which is the basis for the following completely factual (I cannot stress enough that, while what you are about to read may indeed be funny, none of it is fiction) sketch of a truly unique campus organization.

I have in my hands a copy of the AFC Constitution (also available on the club's official website at www.umassafc.dhs.org). The club has three main constitutional objectives, these being, quote, "1) To spread appreciation, understanding, and tolerance for the perverted arts. 2) To spread a greater awareness for the Adult Film Industry, and 3) To spread diversity and to serve the UMass community, at large."

Yes: not just appreciation and tolerance for the "perverted arts," but understanding. It brings a tear to the eye.

But first some background on Danny, the man behind it all. He doesn't have a personal favorite film, but his favorite star is definitely Jenna Jameson "'cuz she's a good actress," as well as for other reasons which he assured me I could never print in a family-oriented newspaper such as The Collegian. His hopes for the AFC include "starting a tradition" the did not get specific as to the nature of this tradition, but any UMass tradition involving porn is fine with me) and making "meaningful contributions to UMass" (again non-specified, but hopefully porn-related). Danny comes off, to an interviewer, as slightly nervous about being portrayed as a pervert, but still very self-assured and with a deep inner sense of rightness in his views. His personal conviction is infectious; I recommend that those morally opposed to the perverted arts steer clear of Danny for fear of being converted.

Rob Schulze

And what of his brain-child, the AFC, you ask? Well, it isn't an actual RSO yet, although Danny assured me that their paperwork is almost done and they're getting ready to apply for RSO status. When asked if he expected the application to be approved, Danny responded with an emphatic "We can't be denied!" I would care to agree – I can't think of a single person in the SGA fascist enough to reject the formation of a porno movie club. I've never attended an SGA meeting, but from what I hear, verbal masturbation is all the rage, and I can't see why they wouldn't also go for the real thing.

Just on a side note, any candidate for any SGA post who's poster read something along the lines of "John Candidate: I Jerk Off In My Dorm Room" or "Jenny Candidate: I Have A Large Purple Vibrator" would without question get my vote. I'd make sure I used sanitizer after shaking their hands, though.

But back to the Adult Film Club. Not at all afraid to ask the hard questions, I drilled Danny on how the AFC would spend the funding it hopes to acquire as an RSO. First on the budget list was T-shirts that say "Pornstar In Training" on them, followed by (of course) adult films, and then refreshments for meetings. (I would imagine that one would build up quite a thirst watching all those moneyshots without anything to drink oneself.) Also, the Club plans to request an auditorium or lecture hall from the university, which Danny says is free of charge for student organizations, so that mass viewings of the perverted arts could be put on for the interested.

The Club is more than just a bunch of horny college kids watching naked people writhe and squeal; they're also a community organization. Danny wants his AFC to give back to the society that spawned it, by such activities as being volunteers at the Orchard Hill Bowl Day. "Are you kind of like the Boy Scouts, then?" I asked Mr. Tehranian. "Yeah, we've got our hands in everything" came the response from Danny, who evidently has an exquisite capacity for the unknowing ironic dirty double entendre. It's a blessing few share.

I asked about another hot issue on campus these days, diversity, and how it related to the porn club. "Is your club diverse; i.e., gay porn, transvestite porn, pregnant porn, etc?" was how I phrased my question, which I expected to maybe knock Danny around a little, but no, he was unruffled. There is, in fact, a member of the AFC currently in charge of, quote, "midget porn" (and allow me to assure you that it does not get any more diverse than midget porn), and I was told that his club is always open to growth at the demand of the membership. A true man of the people, Danny Tehranian is.

So was I converted? Will I attend the next meeting of the UMass Adult Film Club (meetings, incidentally, take place every Thursday at eight o'clock in the seventh floor lounge of Emily Dickinson Hall on Orchard Hill), pay my dues, and hope to acquire my own "Pornstar In Training" shirt? Well, no. Due to a combination of being very moral and having an actual, flesh-and-blood girlfriend who, needless to say, puts Jenna Jameson to shame, I find that my appreciation for the perverted arts has declined somewhat since its peak when I was fifteen. That doesn't mean that you should follow in my footsteps, though; I wholeheartedly encourage every single person who is reading this column to sign up and join Danny's legions of connoisseurs of "art." This club, in my opinion, defines UMass and the UMass spirit.

Danny Tehranian, I salute you, but with my hand only – unlike all your male club members while watching your movies. (The author hereby apologizes for the preceding erection joke, but c'mon, it was just too perfect).

Defining sodomy in VT

If Vermont isn't the most progressive state in the nation, lord knows which one is. In the next few weeks, Vermont's Governor will sign legislation making it legal for a couple of guys or a couple of gals to get married.

Why it took this long, I'll never know. It seems to be a fairly simple issue. If two people love one another and want to make a commitment to one another that will prevent suffering for the rest of their lives, then let them. If they're both males or both females or the "traditional" mix, whatever. It's about love.

Unless, of course, you're conservative.

If you are, then it's impossible for a couple of queers or a couple of dykes to love one another and be married. Only straight people can love one another; emotions are reserved for the "normal" so all the weirdos be damned. If we didn't damn them, imagine the possibilities: "they" would ruin marriage forever. Previously made marriages would simply dissolve in the face of the marriages of Adam and Steve or Madam and Eve. All heterosexual marriages would cease to exist, including really strong marriages where couples still were able to, against all odds, love one another. They would all collapse. The whole system would collapse. All of it.

Sam Wilkinson

This kind of nay-saying about marriage has been heard before, but it never comes through; it certainly didn't happen when interracial marriages started to be legalized. Conservatives were up in arms when blacks and whites started getting married, but interracial unions have not undermined the institution of marriage, which leads me to conclude that conservatives – social ones anyway – are a really neurotic bunch. They fear the strangest things – like the imminent crumbling of traditional marriage if we let a few more couples get married each year. There is no real threat that any of this is going to happen. Women and men, against all odds, will continue to fall in love and get married, in spite of gay marriage, and the couples who are already married, despite high divorce rates, are a tough bunch. It's going to take more than the marriage of same gender individuals to ruin the institution of marriage.

But even in Vermont there are critics of the Same-Sex Union bill. While the bill was still in the Vermont House of Representatives, Nancy Sheltra made an impassioned plea for the bill to fail. As a backdrop to her soon-to-be-quoted-here argument, she pointed out that in the 19th century, sodomy was an act punishable by death in Vermont.

I'm guessing her logic was that, upon the presentation of that stellar knowledge nugget, gays would be so pleased that they are no longer being burned at the stake as to settle for their current position, rather than pushing for marriage.

Then, to bolster her apparently already strong argument, she wondered "Why would you encourage anal sex, sexually transmitted diseases and AIDS among a part of our society?

Now, I'm going to try to breath calmly. I'm going to try to simply read that without punching a hole into something. But it won't be easy.

Because her argument is so mind-numbingly stupid that I can't believe she even said it.

Nevermind the fact that couples getting married probably have, against her wishes, already had sex. As we all know, fewer and fewer couples are abstaining until marriage these days, and for gay couples, that could mean living forever blue-balled or lipped, depending. Just forget that, and while you're at it, forget the fact that marriage probably, if anything, doesn't encourage sexually transmitted disease, as people are settling down with one (1) partner, thus reducing the potential risk. Oh, and ignore the giant homophobic "encourage...AIDS" statement. I was pretty sure that those ideas had died out, since I'm fairly sure that we all realize now that AIDS doesn't just "kill fags dead," as is cleverly written on bathroom stalls. I'm sure we all know that AIDS kills people dead.

Instead, consider the definition of sodomy. Here is what Merriam Webster's Collegiate Dictionary had to say: "sod-omy – 1. copulation with a member of the same sex or with an animal. 2. noncoital and especially anal or oral copulation with a member of the opposite sex." Thus sodomy is defined as sexual relations between individuals of the same gender or between an individual and an animal, or (this is the good part) anal or oral sex. As defined, I'm sure Sheltra will tell us that sodomy is "bad" and "evil" and maybe even a "sin."

Now, I'll freely admit that I don't know too much about sex. However, I'm willing to bet that while anal sex isn't necessarily the most popular style amongst straights, these days, oral is certainly up there. The key isn't even that it's up there; it's that it's up there among both presumably good straights and the presumably evil gays. However, once straights are included for their oral, and occasionally anal, sexuality, the number of Sodomites on this campus has increased by a factor of a million, bare minimum. Hell, Bill Clinton is a member of the Sodomite Club, and you know what, chances are if you're reading this, you are too. Better yet, if you aren't yet a member, I'll bet you wish you were.

Why?

Because we're humans and because we like it. That's the most obvious reason I can think of. I've met Christians, Jews, Atheists, Catholics, Baptists; all of them love the idea of somebody going down on them. Blacks, whites, yellows or reds? It doesn't matter. All colors like it too.

So here's what I figure; I haven't seen what this lady looks like, this Sheltra. She's clearly a good conservative, she's against sodomy, which probably means she's married to a good conservative man who's too afraid to kiss her neck, much less anywhere further south. They have sex maybe twice a month, it's no fun, both hate it, and that's the end of it.

This woman needs help. This woman needs to join the Sodomite Club; if she hates it after the fact, bash away, but at least she'd know what it's like.

Right now, I'm willing to be she doesn't engage in acts of sodomy, and that's unfortunate. It's a great sex, sexually transmitted diseases and AIDS among a part of our society?

Now, I'm going to try to breath calmly. I'm going to try to simply read that without punching a hole into something. But it won't be easy.

Because her argument is so mind-numbingly stupid that I can't believe she even said it.

Nevermind the fact that couples getting married probably have, against her wishes, already had sex. As we all know, fewer and fewer couples are abstaining until marriage these days, and for gay couples, that could mean living forever blue-balled or lipped,

Fact is that there just isn't a good argument against gay marriage; if there is, homophobia and hate certainly aren't it.

Career forum presented for students

By Christine Connare
Collegian Correspondent

A select group of UMass graduates recently returned to campus to offer some helpful advice for current students on how to carve a successful path towards a fulfilling career. The event, the Edwin M. Rossman Alumi/Ae Career Forum, held on Wednesday, April 26, was geared towards women studies and STPEC, social thought and political economy, majors.

The panel was comprised of former women studies majors Tina Cincotti '97 and Tinker Ready '81, and former STEPC majors Rob Goetz '81, Cara Siano '94, and Stacey Zelbow '90. Each member spoke for a few minutes about their experiences at UMass and the job positions they have obtained since graduating college.

The first speaker was Tinker Ready, freelance health and science reporter. Ready discussed the challenges in the field of journalism. According to Ready, she developed the essential skills of reporting while working at the Journal Inquirer in Manchester, Connecticut.

"My advice if you are pursuing a career in journalism is that you should love it. It is hard and it doesn't pay well," said Ready.

Ready has a varied and interesting career. At one point she worked as a special projects editor at The Cambodia Daily, while living in Cambodia. Currently she writes for the Boston Phoenix, The Boston Globe, Nature Medicine, and WebMD.

Ready explains that she simply fell into health and science reporting. She believes a strong background in science is not absolutely required for health and science reporting. In fact, Ready feels that not having a deep scientific grasp may actually benefit the outcome of an article. The distance will enable the journalist to report the story in a straightforward and direct manner to the general public. Ready explained that the field of science writing is expanding.

"There is such a demand for health information right now, especially on the Internet," said Ready.

The second women studies graduate on the panel was Tina Cincotti, Project Coordinator of the Abortion Access Project. Cincotti explained that her interest in a women's right to abortion was fueled by John Salvi's abortion shootings in Brookline, Massachusetts, during her sophomore year at UMass. The anti-abortion sentiment that she witnessed in her state horrified her, and she felt she had to take action.

According to Cincotti, her academic and extra-curricular activities in college, including the takeover of an academic building, have taught her a number of valuable skills that she applies to her work now. She feels she has cultivated great organizational and interpersonal skills. She was enthusiastic to return to campus for the event.

"I got great feedback from advisors in the women studies department and I wanted to come back and give some advice. It's important to know that you can have a progressive, paid job," said Cincotti.

In the fall, Cincotti will be leaving her position at the Abortion Access Project and enrolling in a Masters program at Brandeis College.

The Campus Career Network also had representatives present at the event with helpful suggestions.

"I want students to have the idea that their degrees are marketable. They must educate potential employers about the value of their humanities degree," said Susan Hammond, Assistant Director for Career Planning at the Campus Career Network.

Hammond also encourages graduating seniors to fill out a senior survey with the Campus Career Network before leaving UMass. The survey allows the CCN to keep track of the origin and number of job offers made to UMass students.

The forum was sponsored by the Campus Career Network, the UMass Alumni Association, the Women Studies Program, and the Social Thought and Political Economy Program (STPEC). The event was moderated by Sara Lennox, Program Director of STPEC.

Freelance journalist Tinker Ready spoke at the career forum Wednesday.

Sex trafficking to be focus of talk

By Christine Connare
Collegian Correspondent

Janice Raymond, Ph.D., of the UMass Women Studies Program, will deliver a seminar today titled, "The Health Effects of Sex Trafficking." Dr. Raymond has devoted her life to researching and attempting to eradicate sex trafficking. Dr. Raymond will discuss the health consequences and politics involved with sex trafficking.

"This is a problem not only in developing nations on the other side of the globe. It is a problem right here in the United States. It is also a form of violence against women. It is glamorized as voluntary prostitution, when in reality women suffer the same injuries, infections, and harm as in other forms of violence against women," said Dr. Raymond.

As Co-Director of the Coalition Against Trafficking in Women and as a professor at UMass, Dr. Raymond has attempted to inform the public of the complexities involved with the international issue of sex trafficking. Sex trafficking combines economic, political, and international factors.

Every year thousands of children's lives are stolen from their country of origin, with the hope of providing a better life for their family, only to end up as sex slaves in a foreign country. According to Dr. Raymond, the women and children are smuggled, isolated, and culturally deprived of any resources. Simply stated this is a massive exploitation of women, and children. Aside from analyzing the conditions and consequences of sex trafficking Dr. Raymond urges people to look at all the participants, not merely the victims.

"We must look at why there is such a demand for it worldwide. The person largely invisible in this is the buyer," said Dr. Raymond.

The penalties for those involved with the smuggling of these women and children are not severe enough in Dr. Raymond's opinion.

"Penalties for drug trafficking are more severe than penalties for sex trafficking. You can use a drug once, but you can use a woman over and over again," said Raymond.

Dr. Raymond feels that the media coverage of sex trafficking is somewhat skewed. Raymond urges the public to consider the complexities of each sex trafficking case, not simply the stories that are printed on the front page.

"Recent media interest focused on sensational cases. Cases with bondage and women kept in slave-like conditions. This has become the portrait of the industry. There are many cases that are not so sensational," said Dr. Raymond.

Dr. Raymond work has received national support for her work. In the past, Dr. Raymond has received a $188,000 grant from the National Institute of Justice for a project on Sex Trafficking in three regional U.S. cities and a $225,000 grant from the Ford Foundation to research, "Women in the International Migration Process: Patterns, Profiles, and Health Consequences of Sexual Exploitation."

The seminar is part of the Spring Seminar 2000: Ethical Issues in Women's Health. The seminar series is sponsored by the Center for Research and Education in Women's Health, of the School of Public Health and Health Sciences at UMass. The seminar will begin at 4:00 p.m. in Campus Center Room 917.

Benefit concert held at UMass

By Julie O'Connor
Collegian Correspondent

Courage to Heal Adventure Programs, a local organization, recently held a benefit concert here at UMass. On April 20th four performers took the stage in the Campus Center Auditorium to publicly lend their support to the program. The goal of the concert was to raise money for the organization, which encourages women survivors of abuse to increase their self-esteem through activities in a natural environment. The benefit concert featured vocalists Pamela Means and Lori McKenna, slam poet Alix Olson, and included a special musical performance by UMass student Jake Eberly.

The program hoped for a large crowd at the concert. There were less than 100 people in the audience. Although the proceeds of the concert did not reach the organization's expectations, the concert did provide an opportunity to highlight the need to assist abused women. There are high expectations for future fundraisers and the growth potential of the organization.

"The Director and I are enthusiastic about having the program expand in the future," said Jess Kuttner, Assistant Director of the Courage to Heal Program and UMass senior.

The participation of UMass student Jake Eberly added a unique dimension to the evening. Eberly was the only male performer on stage for the benefit concert.

"I think that it was important that the male population was represented at the concert. Any person that wants to help and participate against abused women is great," said Eberly.

After a friend informed him about the program, Jake became immediately interested in helping the organization. He strongly advocates the importance of public awareness and involvement in organizations like the Courage to Heal Adventure Programs. Eberly has performed his music for seven years. Locally he has played at such places as The Black Sheep and Claudia's Cafe. Eberly has also made available his self-released, self-titled album. The devotion of Jess Kuttner, Assistant Director of the Courage to Heal Program, also inspired Eberly to participate in the event.

"Jess Kuttner is one of the most generous and involved people in this organization. She does all of this out of the goodness of her heart," said Eberly.

Pamela Means and Lori McKenna took the stage to share a few stories and deliver a sample of their music. Slam poet Alix Olson offered a strong verbal performance. After winning the 1998 National Poetry Slam for the Nuyorican team, Olson became one of the popular additions to the poetry slam scene. She has worked with folksingers, Christine Lavin and Pete Seeger and hip-hop diva Queen Latifah. Olson has released a book and tape titled Only the Starving Favor Peace.

Courage to Heal Adventure Programs was established in 1996, to promote participation in outdoor adventure activities for women that have suffered from abuse. Through these programs, mistreated women of all ages can come to build their confidence and work to heal the mental and physical wounds of their past. The outdoor adventure activities combine trust building exercises, therapeutic games, and discussions. These methods of growing and healing in nature range from rock climbing and canoeing to snow shoeing and camping. The program also provides women with an educational and entertaining environment. Women have the opportunity to work with a therapist, an outdoors professional team, and qualified female instructors.

The impact of globalization on women

The following editorial is by three UMass students: Diene Hughes, Laura Diamondis, and Chauncy Young. Collectively they have produced this editorial as a group project for a women studies course, The Social Construction of Whiteness.

Globalization of the economy through western dominated organizations such as the World Trade Organization (WTO), the World Bank (WB) and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) inevitably reflects the interests of one economic structure, one societal structure, and one power structure. Under the name of development, free trade, and economic improvement and efficiency countries of the Global South have been mandated by Structural Adjustment Programs to promote their entry into the global economy. Yet, what appears a benevolent gesture has extremely severe social and economic consequences for the people of these nations. The WTO, IMF and World Bank serve to perpetuate the white supremacist, capitalist, patriarchy of the United States and other G-7 nations upon the rest of the world's population. The G-7 represent the seven most "highly developed" countries and consists of Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, the United Kingdom, and the United States. The so-called Global Economy serves these powers, the Global North, the industrialized nations and the multinational corporations that they support. The global trade system perceives women and people of color as playing a key role within this structure: they serve as an inexpensive and disposable labor force.

Women are among those most affected by Globalization. According to the Mobilization for Global Justice, women currently constitute 70% of the world's 1.3 billion people in absolute poverty. Without exception, the deregulation, privatization, and free market structure costs countries not only their economic stability, but also causes the continuation and worsening of gender inequality. Structural Adjustment Programs are given to developing nations with stipulations: devaluation of the nation's currency, privatization of public owned services, relaxation of labor and environmental laws, and preferential treatment for multinational corporations. None of these adjustments are done so for the benefit of women. Women in developing nations have the lowest wages and no job security. On average, women earn 50 to 80% of men's wages and their incomes are more often affected by adjustment policies.

Increasingly women in the Global South, become trapped in unskilled or semi-skilled positions. In many countries companies often select young female labors to take advantage of women's traditional submissive attitude. Women make up the majority of the sweatshop labor force. Here they are forced to work in horrendous conditions and are fired if they become ill or pregnant. Women labor 14 to 16 hour days in the prison-like conditions of multinational corporation's sweatshops for an income that is barely subsistence level. What is often ignored by statistics and thus is rendered invisible is the work that women do outside the labor force, and though this work is essential it remains unpaid. Despite their terrible working requirements, women in developing nations still are responsible for the domestic work. This work includes childcare, housework, and in many cases maintenance of the family's subsistence garden. Meanwhile, healthcare services decline, cease to exist, or become unaffordable. In addition, food costs rapidly rise as these national institutions are privatized and agriculture production is focused on cash crops and exports.

It is essential to also address the connection between Globalization, the global trade system, and the Global Sex Trade. As previously noted, the policies of the IMF, the WB, and the WTO serve to destabilize and not promote the economies of the Global South. The fragile economic situations of these countries often cannot offer women conventional jobs at even a subsistence level when they forced to abide by terms of Structural Adjustment. However, because many of these countries rely heavily on tourism, sex trade related-occupations have become a more prominent occupation for women and men out of necessity. This has led to the expansion of sex tourism, where men and women from industrialized nations travel to countries with the specific purpose of participating in the sex trade. Contrary to popular representation, the majority of the women who work in the sex trade industry do so to support their families. Sex tourism is a perfect example of the Global North's exploitation of the people of the South, where even the people become commodities to be purchased and consumed.

The United States, the IMF, the WB, and the WTO all state that they have a strong commitment to promoting democratic values and institutions. The World Trade Organization has gone as far to state that its policies promote international peace. However, in practice it is obvious that the policies of these institutions provide an ideal setting for exploitation and the continuation of colonialism. The free market has given us environmental devastation, deforestation, ever-expanding income inequalities, sweatshop labor, the sex trade, and has help promote racial and gender inequalities. The policies of the IMF, the WB, and the WTO are dependent on the exploitation of women and people of color and challenging these institutions and the countries and corporations they support should be included in any struggle for gender and racial equality.

Local students attend national women's convention

By Christine Connare and Mary Beth Graves
Collegian Correspondents

Several UMass students had the opportunity to attend an international and interactive feminist convention last month. The Feminist EXPO 2000, was held in Baltimore, Maryland from March 31 to April 2. The EXPO was sponsored and produced by the Feminist Majority Foundation. Students, feminists, and activists from around the globe participated in the event.

The EXPO consisted of general assemblies, roundtables, symposia, discussions, training sessions, and informational booths. Topics of interest ranged from improving women's access to contraceptive methods worldwide to financial planning for women on their own. Women from various fields shared their knowledge and experiences. A sample of women present at the EXPO include feminist Gloria Steinem, author bell hooks, actress Sharon Gless, lawyer Sarah Weddington, and president of the Feminist Majority Foundation, Eleanor Smeal.

UMass junior Risha Nathan, attended the EXPO and believes the knowledge and insights gained from the event are extremely relevant to her feminist perspectives.

"It has been exciting for me to come back to school and share my new knowledge and further my women studies career. I also had a chance to experience new visions of future goals and agendas," said Nathan.

UMass senior Ian Rozin, also attended the event. As a male in the feminist movement he offers a unique perspective.

"The Feminist EXPO showed me how diverse and worldwide the feminist movement is. As a man, I feel it is important to dispel the image of feminist as man-haters. Not once during the EXPO did I feel excluded or alienated," said Rozin.

One symposium held during the EXPO was, Conversations with bell hooks on Feminism and Love. In a crowded room, comprised mostly of young women, bell hooks, a cultural critic and feminist writer, read from her latest work, all about love: New Visions.

Her book offers new ways to think about love and the significance of love in our daily interactions. At the EXPO hooks discussed the importance of love in the community and most importantly the need to bring love into the feminist movement. She also put forward the notion of visionary feminism.

Aside from the symposia held during the EXPO informational booths provided participants with a great deal of knowledge on a variety of feminist issues. Organizations such as Planned Parenthood and NARAL, National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League, distributed literature and addressed questions.

The scale of the Feminist EXPO is impressive. Both the participants and presenters are incredibly enthusiastic. I hope that the positive energy and creative problem solving that I saw here transcends the conference into our daily lives to empower all women and change our society," said Julie Graves, Public Policy Associate of Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

'Take Daughter To Work Day' celebrated on campus

UMass honored Take Our Daughters to Work Day, Thursday, April 27, with a series of events held on campus. The celebration started with a breakfast reception and an information fair in the Mullins Center. Special guest speaker, Representative Ellen Story, participated in the morning activities.

Throughout the day various UMass departments sponsored special programs. The geoscience, computer science, plant and soil science, and the psychology departments all took part in the day-long celebration.

Professor Rachel Clifton, of the psychology department, sponsored a program in her research lab. According to Professor Clifton she had a good turnout and the event was enjoyable.

"They were attentive, understood everything I explained about the research, and best of all, they asked excellent questions," commented Professor Clifton.

In addition, Professor Nancy Forger, of the psychology department, offered a session called, "Tour of a Neuroscience Lab in the Psychology Department." With the assistance of two neuroscience and behavior graduate students, Susan Zup and Amy Bennett, participants in the session were offered a hands-on opportunity to explore techniques in neuroscience. In one part of the session girls and their parents could view brain or spinal cord sections under various microscopes.

"We were delighted with the turnout and response, 11 girls and 11 parents attended and were enthusiastic participants," commented Professor Forger.

Many people in the UMass community recognized the significance and benefit of the celebration.

"As a professional woman, and mother of two daughters, I understand the importance of young girls hearing and seeing about what career possibilities exist for them," said Professor Clifton.

The celebration was hosted by the Faculty Senate Council on the Status of Women.

Local play exemplifies diversity with arms wide open

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

If ever there was a time that I felt extremely fortunate to be a part of the Arts & Living Staff, it was last Friday evening. It is very rare that we are given an opportunity to truly be part of something that celebrates life, and refuses to allow inhumanity prevent an obvious wealth of talent to be displayed. April Follies: A Diverse Cabaret, presented by the Open Arms Project in Amherst did not only present that opportunity to the local community, but the production epitomized it.

The Open Arms Project, led by special needs program director at Amherst Leisure Services, Ezzell Floranina, has spent the past few months developing a variety show where the stars are eccentric members of the local community. The program teaches the performers to accept their differences, and love themselves and everyone else for who they are.

Floranina explained to the audience before the show that the participants of the project "Tried to find out particular things that each person enjoyed, and (they) tried to put them into the show."

The show began with an old South African song called, "My Story," that was sung by the entire cast. The songs title certainly proved to be pertinent to the rest of the show.

The first skit of the night was a puppet show entitled, "The Puppet Parade." The actors lined up behind a table to elucidate the story of "The tortoise and the hare." Floranina asked the audience to help them push the story along, and it was wonderful to see that most of the crowd's response came from young children. After the puppet show was over, Floranina asked the crowd to come up with a way that they hare could help the tortoise, so that it would not feel so bad about losing. She wanted to stress the importance of being a good winner and not hurting anyone's feelings. She said that if an agreement was made on how to be a fair winner, "they all stayed friends and no one was sad because they lost."

The next part of the show had cast member, Heather Lowing, sing a song called "Lullaby Baby," and tell a story about the annexation of Hawaii. Floranina explained that the reason a scene about infants was included was because, "The thing about life and people is that everyone is a baby at some time. We wanted to acknowledge that when there's a baby, everyone is happy. There is no description of ability...or disability."

Lowing also sang "I Will Believe," from The Prince of Egypt later in the show. "Lullaby Baby" moved everyone, and made for a wonderful transition into a poetry break read by Bill Apte.

One very important aspect of April Follies, is the fact that it incorporated personal experiences of the people who were a part of it. The segment, "Take my tray," was a story that was told by one of the participants while they rehearsed for the show. The scene acted out a junior high school cafeteria scene where a student (played by Gerry Theriault) was being treated unfairly, and told, "Slave take my tray," by his peers. The first time the scene was displayed they told the audience to look for what was wrong. The scene was acted out again, and the audience was again asked for help explaining how things could be changed. The scene ended with Theriault confidently proclaiming, "Take your own tray!" He then walked off stage. The audience consequently cheered.

A nearly identical scene called, "You're Late," was about students waiting for a friend, who was consistently late. The peers were quite harsh on the individual and showed the difficulties of large group oppression. The audience was asked for help on the situation, and the group was taught the value of giving a person a chance to explain him or herself before a judgment on their action is made.

Two very entertaining portions of the show came from Lee Williams. Williams played Conrad Birdie, from the 1963 film, Bye Bye Birdie, and he also sang "Looking for Peggy Sue." The cast gathered around Williams in awe as he proudly accepted the role as a star. His "Peggy Sue" appeared in the form of Gail Dawicki, who looked more than ecstatic to be a part of the show. The extension of their roles from everyday life gave them an opportunity to be someone else.

The play continued to be filled with surprises such as Donna Herbert leading a Ballet Class, and Gerry Theriault using puppet animals to introduce everyone to the rite of spring. There was also a portion of the show where one of the workers for the Open Arms Project, Kathy Dion acted as a fun house mirror with Theriault. The act was complete with song and dance.

The show ended with an invitation to the crowd to dance to "I've Had the Time of My Life," the theme from Dirty Dancing.

After the show was over, Ezzell Floranina was presented with sign that says, "Broadway wants you." The sign was presented to her on behalf of the cast from the incredibly beautiful and extraordinarily talented UMass senior Psychology major Jodi Fellows, who, as a participant in the program in conjunction with the University has been a representative for the project. Fellows told Floranina, "The show was a success because of the encouragement you gave us over the last few months."

If you ever doubt that you can experience tremendous things during your years in college that can change your life forever, talk to Jodi for five minutes. The conversation will change your mind because she models everything the University boasts are its best qualities in graduates.

The feeling of satisfaction after seeing the play is indescribable. One member of the audience was heard as saying, "I'm glad I came. I really needed that." Programs such as this may only come once in a great while. However, I was able to be a part of it, which truly makes me very fortunate to work in an environment that can broaden horizons to incredible heights.

Day of the New: upcoming artists storm UMass with music and prizes

The Student Government Association Programming Board will be sponsoring a free concert at the Student Union Ballroom on Monday night May 1st at 8pm. The concert will showcase several new artists and be of the jam band variety that is especially popular in the area. The gathering will allow everyone in attendance to witness some energetic music from upcoming talent as well as allow the bands and the audience to get involved in the Umass community.

Dave Hu and Travelling Matt, both UMass veterans, will be appearing on Monday night. From Long Island is Portnoy Wilson, who has been enjoying some airplay on WMUA as of late. Headlining the show will be another Long Island native, Brendan O'Donnell, who has been touring New England and the East Coast recently. O'Donnell has previously brought his live show to the Iron Horse in Northampton, and those interested will be able to catch that show again when it rolls by Pearl St. on May 6.

Simply by showing up to the show, attendees will be given a raffle ticket for a chance to win various gift certificates. Hot Tubs in Northampton, The Pub, Antonios, Panda East, Friendlys, Judies, and Pinnochios are among the familiar local businesses you could win a gift certificate from, and T-shirts and other prizes will also be given out.

With ten minutes left in the game, Minaker put her 19th tally on the board, with the assist going to senior defender Colleen Wales.

Mohler put the biscuit in the basket for the third time in the game on a free position. Pavlick would get the next free position, and put her third point on the board, with less than two minutes to go in the game, bring the Minutewomen within four, which would be ass close as they got all day.

With less than a minute left, UNC showed why its the sixth-ranked team in the country, scoring two goals in 20 seconds. Havrilla scored her 21st of the year, off a pass from Thompson. McPike followed with her second of the day, putting it right through the five hole on her free position.

The Tar Heels were remarkably accurate with ball, putting up a total of 32 shots, 19 of which were stopped by Nardi. One shot went wide for the Heels, and that shot ricocheted off the post.

"A lot of their shots were really inside, so it's kind of hard to go off cage," Nardi said. "But they were good players, they were good shooters, and I think we handled it well."

UNC dominated the game, picking up an astounding 31 groundballs to the Minutewomen's 19. The Tar Heels posted 32 shots and caused 12 turnovers in their decisive win.

The Minutewomen played at La Salle yesterday; the scores were unavailable at press time.

sizable mismatch, what's almost as indicative is Syracuse's astounding faceoff advantage. Chris Cercy, the nation's leader in winning faceoff percentage (.684) took 22 of 28 draws, putting the Orangemen on the attack for a majority of the contest. He did so against UMass' Jeff Seals, who came in right behind Cercy in the category. As a result of Cercy's dominance, the Minutemen could not climb out of their early hole, unable to do much without having the ball.

Leveille is slowly working his way into the offense, tallying two goals to run his scoring streak to four games.

■ baseball

The Minutemen tacked on their last run of the afternoon in the top of the fourth when freshman Jeff Altieri, who hit two home runs last Tuesday against Northeastern, turned the bases with the help of the Rhode Island infield. Altieri reached on a fielder's choice, advanced to second on a fielding error by pitcher Peter Kehoe, and crossed the plate on an error by the second baseman, giving UMass a 3-0 cushion.

The Rams lackluster offense would produce its only run of the game in the bottom of the fourth inning. Ion Sculling led off the inning with a single, and crossed home plate three batters later when Dave Rodrigues hit a sacrifice fly to left field to pull Rhode Island within two.

Szado cruised to the complete game victory, yielding seven hits and one run while striking out five Rhode Island batters. With the win, Szado improves to 3-3 on the season. Kehoe took the loss for the Rams, allowing eight hits and three runs in six innings of work.

The Minutemen will get back to work tomorrow afternoon when Siena visits Earl Lorden Field. The first pitch is scheduled to be thrown out at 3 p.m.

Zeke's infamous grin not shining on protégé

By Steve Zipay
Newsday

Before the Raptors hosted the Knicks in Toronto yesterday, Isiah Lord Thomas III settled into a cozy chair between Hannah Storm and Mike Fratello in NBC's "NBA Showtime" studio in New York. On air, he'd surely flash his regal smile, the one that has become as familiar as his electrifying game when he played point guard for the Detroit Pistons.

But the surroundings are deceiving. The former Raptors general manager is in a far more uncomfortable position. For the past two weeks, he has faced questions on hot-button issues about Butch Carter, the coach of his former franchise, and Bob Knight, his former coach at Indiana University, who is under investigation for allegedly choking a player during practice. And a few days ago, Thomas, who joined NBC in November 1997, was mentioned as a candidate for a coaching job himself, to replace Lenny Wilkens of the Atlanta Hawks.

So it's not surprising that Thomas has refused requests for interviews this week. He despises Carter, and he's not doing anything that will help him sell his book," a source close to Thomas said.

Ah, the book. Due to be released Monday, "Born to Believe" , co-written by Butch Carter and his brother, Vikings wide receiver Cris Carter , recounts an incident in 1980, when Butch was co-captain of the Indiana basketball team. He writes that Knight stormed into the locker room after a practice and berated another player. He said the player would end up like "all the rest of the... in Chicago, including your brothers." Reporters immediately linked the slur to Thomas, who was the only player from Chicago on that squad.

But when asked, Thomas responded: "First of all, I've never heard Coach Knight use the n-word. So that individual certainly was not me because I've never heard him talk like that. Bobby Knight epitomizes what is good and successful about winning."

To be sure, Thomas understands winning and success. The youngest of nine children raised by his mother, Mary, in an inner-city housing project, Thomas earned a degree in criminal justice at Indiana. After a 13-year All-Star-caliber NBA career, he retired in 1994 and three days later bought 9 percent of the expansion Raptors. Three years later, he left after failing in a bid to buy the franchise.

Perhaps it is that business savvy that led Thomas to remain mum on Butch Carter's $5 million slander suit against the Knicks' Marcus Camby, whom Thomas once signed in Toronto. Camby called Butch Carter "a liar" in the press, but the coach later withdrew the suit after being pressured by NBA executives.

Minutewomen take over first in A10 tournament

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

For weeks now, the Massachusetts softball team has waited patiently for front-runner Dayton to slip up so that they could take over the position of top dog in the Atlantic 10. At long last, that time has come, after the Minutewomen watched Dayton lose a twin bill to Rhode Island on Saturday, and then split a doubleheader with the Flyers on Sunday.

St. Bonaventure	2

Game 2 Saturday
UMass	9

Game 1 Sunday

Game 2 Sunday

The weekend festivities brought the record of the Maroon and White to 26-20 (11-3 A10) while Dayton dropped to 33-20 (10-4 A10) on the year.

Jen Hadley was the main story of the day, shutting out the Flyers on only three hits in the second game of the doubleheader. She brought a no-hitter into the fifth inning, and ended up striking out seven hitters while walking none to lead the team to a 2-0 win.

"This was as good of a performance as I've had," said Hadley, "my pitches were moving, my riseball was working, and I kept them guessing."

Head coach Elaine Sortino heartily agreed with Hadley and added, "This was the best game she has thrown since she put the (UMass) uniform on last year."

The only inning in which Dayton even managed to get a runner on base was the fifth, when the Flyer bench put their rally caps on, and helped cheer the team to three straight singles. This loaded the bases with nobody out, and Hadley seemed to be losing the stuff that had brought her into the fifth without giving up a hit. The next batter, first baseman Erin O'Shea, belted a ground ball to short, but Emily Rubestelli made a great play and threw home for the force out. Hadley then promptly forced a pop out to third for the second out, and K'd pinch-hitter Kerry White to get out of the jam.

"Emily made a great play to throw home," said Hadley.

All of the UMass offense came in the first inning in the form of back-to-back home runs by sluggers Brandi Cross and Cherra Wheeler. It was Cross's team leading seventh round-tripper on the year, while Wheeler connected on her fourth dinger.

"The pitcher came in right over the plate," said Wheeler, "She made a big mistake, and I just sat back, waited on it, and drove it."

Dayton pitcher Karen Hill came into the game in the third and shut down the Minutewomen with a combination of fastballs, changeups and grunts for four innings, but with Hadley on the mound, Hill's pitching performance went for naught.

In the first game of the doubleheader, UMass was the victim of Dayton ace Sara Hatcher, and lost the game 3-1. Hatcher only gave up one run on three hits, struck out seven batters and improved her record to 22-5. Kaila Holtz was valiant in defeat for the Minutewomen, going the distance and striking out four, but a pair of wind aided home runs by Tanya Leet in the first inning and White in the third inning proved to be the difference.

"It was a tough first game," said Sortino. "We came out young and tight and our inexperience really showed out there."

On Satuday, UMass played another pair of conference games, this time against St. Bonaventure. It could be said that the Bonnies were due for a win against the Minutewomen, having been on the losing end of every one of the previous 22 meetings between the teams. In fact, in the history of collegiate softball, St. Bonaventure had never won a game against UMass.

Well, as most Red Sox fans say, maybe next year.

The first game of the doubleheader was close up until the fifth when the Maroon and White exploded for five runs in the following two innings. Nikki Faessler, Ashley Bakken and Wheeler all went two-for-three to lead the offense, and Holtz picked up the 6-2 win on the mound.

The second game was an old fashioned blowout, as the Minutewomen exploded for five runs in the first and never looked back. Teri Rooney led off the second with her fourth homer of the year, and Wheeler followed a couple of hitters later with a shot that bounce off the top of the wall and over. In the fifth the game was called due to the eight-run rule, and UMass had a 9-1 victory, Carrie Jeffries picked up the win for UMass, going all five innings and giving up only one hit.

Minutewomen humbled following loss to UNC

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team played host to an unpratelul guest Friday afternoon at Garber Field, as the Tar Heels of the University of North Carolina rammed through the Maroon and White, 12-6.

Jen Nardi, the Minutewomen's junior goalie, was her usual self, pusing up 19 saves, and Stephanie Pavlick, a senior midfielder and the Minutewomen's highest goal scorer this season, tallied three times in the loss. However, there was too much Carolina blue involved.

N. Carolina	12
UMass	6

"Overall the kids played great," UMass head coach Phil Barnes said after the game.

The Minutewomen got off to a slow start, taking only three shots in the first 30 minutes of the game. The Tar Heels did an excellent job keeping the ball in UMass' end throughout the first half, taking 16 shots on Nardi, who stopped eight of them.

North Carolina started the game off early with an unassisted goal by senior midfielder Meghann Mohler less than a minute into the game.

UMass defense held off the unrelenting Tar Heel attack for another 17 minutes, until sophomore attack Erin McInnes redirected a pass from sophomore attacker Kellie Thompson in to the net.

The score stood at 2-0 for another four minutes, when, off a free position, sophomore midfielder Lindsay Stone launched the sphere past Nardi.

With a three to zero lead, Mohler struck again, single-handedly popping the ball into the UMass cage.

Three minutes later McInnes tallied for her second time in the game, taking the feed from junior midfielder Amy Havrilla and sneaking it past the UMass defense. Carolina had dominated on both ends, carrying a 5-0 lead into intermission.

In the second half, the offense of the Maroon and White came alive, as Pavlick tossed her first goal of the day past the starting sophomore goalie for the Tar Heels, Melissa Coyne. Minutes later, the navy blue responded, with sophomore midfielder Christine McPike's first of two goals, assisted by Thompson.

Fay Naber retaliated with two tallies in two minutes, taking passes from Pavlick and senior midfielder Rebecca Minaker. The pass from Minaker ended in an incredible over-the-shoulder hurl that flew through the one hole, to make the score 6-3, in favor of the Heels.

UNC got one back on a free position that had Nardi placed out of the goal and off to one side, as a result of a shooting infraction. McInnes, scoring her 13th of the year, put the ball into the empty net.

Pavlick tallied her second of the game and 26th of the season, when her unassisted shot jumped past Coyne's left shoulder.

Thompson received a pass from McInnes to put the Tar Heels up 8-4, just past the halfway point in the period.

Sophomore midfielder Julie Kickham put up her fourth goal of the season, of Mohler's pass, to increase North Carolina's lead to five, 9-4.

The No. 2 Syracuse Orangemen took it to the men's lacrosse team, beating them 17-7 at the Carrier Dome.

Orangemen use first half frenzy to crush UMass

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Its confidence soaring into the stratosphere following a tight loss at college lacrosse titan Georgetown and a mid-week win against a ranked Harvard squad, the No. 20 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team ventured a place it had never won – the Carrier Dome – to face a team they hadn't beaten since 1981 – the second-ranked Syracuse Orangemen.

Sounds bad.

Was bad.

Behind a balanced attack and sound defense, the 'Cuse quickly disposed of their guests, jumping out to a 10-2 halftime edge en route to a 17-7 thrashing. The win allows the Orangemen to keep pace with top-ranked Virginia, who trounced Ohio State 13-7.

Syracuse	17

UMass (5-7, 1-4 Eastern College Athletic Conference) got leveled the moment it walked in, surrendering five goals in the first five minutes, answering with just a solo goal. Syracuse's advantage ballooned to 7-1 near quarter's end before UMass responded with a goal of its own.

The second quarter, however, was more of the same old one-sidedness. Syracuse (11-1) buckled down on defense, scoring three consecutive in the second stanza to take a healthy halftime lead. Sophomore attackman Liam Banks took a pass from Michael Springer nine seconds in and beat UMass goalie Chris Campolettano. Springer later added an extra-man goal at the 10:01 mark before finding Devin Darcangelo for his sixth score of the season to close out the half.

Leading the way was sophomore midfielder Josh Coffman. Three of his game-high four goals were netted in the first period, allowing the Orange to stake itself a comfortable advantage on the fiery Minutemen. It also marked Coffman's career-high, topping his three-goal performance against Penn last season. Joining in was Matt Caione, who returned to the scoring column after a two-game hiatus. He did so in a big way, notching a hat trick by the end of the third quarter.

Jeremy Guski tried to mount a comeback early in the third, receiving a feed from Keith Gabrielli and scoring with 12:09 remaining to cut the lead to 10-3. The seven-goal deficit would be the closest the Minutemen would get in the second half. Syracuse led 14-7 with 10:34 remaining after Kevin Leveille and Alex Racioppi scored two consecutive for UMass, but the Orange responded with the game's final three goals, this when much of the benches had been emptied.

Head coach Greg Cannella stressed shooting a higher percentage, but Syracuse's Rob Mulligan had other thoughts. Facing 41 UMass shots, the junior netminder turned away 13 shots before leaving near the six-minute mark of the fourth quarter. Syracuse, on the other hand, fired 50 shots, connecting on over 33 percent of their opportunities. Minuteman goaltender Campolettano made 10 saves after stopping 16 shots against the Hoyas last week.

UMass baseball kept on rolling is it took a pair from Rhode Island on Saturday. Sunday's game results were not available at press time.

Veracka, Szado sizzle in weekend wins

By Matthew Despres

Pitching makes perfect.

Just ask the Massachusetts baseball team.

Following a three-day layoff, the Minutemen stormed into Rhode Island this past weekend, sweeping Saturday's doubleheader against the Rams with help from strong performances by senior Travis Veracka and junior Craig Szado on the mound. Veracka paced UMass to a 3-1 victory in the first game, while Szado picked up a 3-1 win for himself in the nightcap. Results of the third game, scheduled for Sunday at noon, were not available at press time.

Game 1
Rhode Island	1

Game 2
Rhode Island	1

The Minutemen (20-15-1 overall, 8-5-1 Atlantic 10) got on the board first in the third inning, thanks in part to the aggressive base running of senior Shaun Skeffington. With one out, the second baseman was hit by a pitch, leaving him at first and bringing sophomore Mike Kulak to the plate. With the left fielder awaiting the pitch, Skeffington proceeded to steal second and third base. Kulak struck out swinging, drawing junior Nick Gorneault to the plate. Gorneault ripped a single into left, scoring Skeffington and putting the Minutemen ahead 1-0.

The Rams (20-21-1 overall, 4-10 A-10) knotted the game in the bottom of the third, taking advantage of two UMass errors. Justin Lamboy reached second on an error by third baseman Aaron Senez, and scored moments later when teammate Mike Schiappa reached on an error by Skeffington. That would be all the scoring the Rams would do, however, as Veracka tightened up and his team pulled away in the seventh inning.

In the final frame, with one out, Kulak reached first on a fielder's choice. Gorneault followed by blasting his sixth home run of the year over the left field fence, a two-run shot that made the score 3-1 in favor of the Minutemen. The Rams would fail to score in the final half the inning, giving UMass the victory in game one.

Veracka went the distance, the sixth straight time he has done so, to pick up his fourth win of the season. Veracka scattered four hits over seven innings, striking out six Rhode Island batters and walking only one. Rams pitcher Mike Martone was served the loss, allowing two runs on two hits.

The second game of the afternoon brought more of the same for the Minutemen: an early lead, strong pitching, and a 3-1 victory when all was said and done.

UMass wasted little time, scoring two runs in the top of the first to gain control early. Kulak singled to reach base, and stole second to move into scoring position. Gorneault walked to set up catcher Chris Morgan with a pair of men on. The sophomore roped a single to center field, scoring Kulak and advancing Gorneault to second base. Kevin O'Connell added the second run of the inning in the next at bat, hitting an RBI single that scored Gorneault to give UMass an early 2-0 lead.

The Clothesline Project blows in yesterday's breeze.

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The third annual Five College Clothesline Project took place yesterday on the Campus Pond lawn at the University of Massachusetts and despite being rained out last week, the event turned out more than 100 t-shirts, commemorating survivors of sexual violence.

Organizer Tara Kavanaugh started the project last year as part of her Master's project in Public Health and has continued it this year through a graduate assistantship with the Health Education Department and Women's Health Group.

Amanda Collings, a health educator at University Health Services, has also been involved in co-sponsoring the event with Kavanaugh. She said there is an increased effort on this campus to raise awareness on the issues of sexual violence.

"I think there are people on this campus who are extremely committed to ending violence against women," Collings said. "There are groups that are in a daily struggle to fight against violence, but I think there needs to be a sustained effort to fight it. We don't always see that and we see people come together when they're reactant to an incident like last semester."

According to her, there are also other programs available for students including bystander workshops whose purpose is to teach individuals what kinds of actions they can take if they are a bystander of a sexual violent act.

She said in instances like these, men need to step up and take a stance against sexual violence against women.

"Not every man that's out there is a rapist and sometimes they feel that they're targeted that way and the MVP Program has a unique approach by saying here's a group of men that can get involved in the fight against women," Collings said. "We can teach them some valuable tools to deal with violence in society."

Volunteer Crystal Macara, a senior psychology and sociology major, said she is a survivor of child sexual abuse. She said her experience has greatly impacted her on all levels.

"I think these shirts are even more moving because I can see how people are channeling their energy and it make me realize all my options I have rather than sitting home and crying, crying, and being angry," Macara said. "It's just really positive."

She said that she was inspired by the diversity of students that turned out to see the event. There were times that she says she noticed men in large groups discussing the issues and experiences written on the t-shirts and in other instances women discussing with men how they have been impacted and what can be done.

"I think this is a good starter for people because they see the messages and read the experiences and I'm sure they can connect with a few of these shirts," Macara said. "Even if they don't have personal experiences, they know somebody who does whether we want to believe it or not. I think it's a good starting point for people to get togeiher and talk with each other and start support systems."

According to her, one of her favorite shirts on display on the clothesline was a white colored shirt representative of a victim that had died from a sexual violence act. It discussed how the woman was receiving flowers, but didn't implicitly explain for what reasons. Macara said that at the end, it stated how the victim was receiving flowers at her own funeral and Macara says she thought it was impacting to read this.

Other shirts were in different color codings to represent the particular kind of violent act, but most of them conveyed a sense of ever-lasting memory as to how the experience impacted the survivors forever.

"When I was 19 I had my first boyfriend. It was this time of year... spring... two months after our first kiss. He raped me. I had a piano recital the next day that I still played in. The whole school knew we had had sex, but didn't know the whole story."

"My sister has never talked to me about being raped. I pray that she breaks her silence."

These were just a few of the approximately hundreds of t-shirts that were hung side-by-side to represent a circle united against such acts of sexual violence.

Kavanaugh said that she has overall received positive feedback as a result of the display. According to her, she feels it is important for everyone to talk about the issues surrounding sexual violence against individuals with the hopes of better understanding how to deal with it.

"We had several people say thank you for doing the display which is always very touching and we've had people feel the need to talk about it and get the issue out and address the problem and we've talked to them about what it is on their mind and what they're feeling," Kavanaugh said. "I think we've had an overall positive response from people just taking the time to go through and read the t-shirts."

Health care forum held

By Virginia Avadisian
Collegian Staff

A Health Care Forum was held last night in Room 174-176 in the Campus Center to discuss the possible benefits of a universal health care system in the United States.

Many different views were expressed, yet all were in favor of health care reform in Massachusetts, as well as the rest of the country. One of the presenters spoke about the issue of changing the nation's health care from a privatized system to a universal one.

The basic focus of this forum was the education of people on the Health Care Initiative on the November 2000 Ballot. The initiative's mission is solely "to protect the rights of patients and to promote access to quality health care for all residents of the Commonwealth."

The Initiative includes three core points. The first consists of health care access and coverage for all Massachusetts Residents. The ballot measure mandates that high quality, affordable health care coverage be ensured to all Massachusetts residents not later than July 1, 2002, in accordance with six major requirements.

The requirements consist of universal access for all residents, the elimination of barriers to medical services and medications, a choice of physician and providers for patients and clinical freedom for physicians and nurses.

The second core point discussed was a Patient's Bill of Rights and Protections. The ballot measure writes into law 10 strong and specific patient protections, all becoming effective January 1, 2001. These are designed to ensure that key decisions affecting the care of individual patients are made by physicians, nurses and other health care professionals and by patients themselves, not by HMOs or insurance companies.

The third core point discussed was a moratorium on for-profit conversions. This means that the ballot would include a moratorium on any conversion of non-for-profit hospitals, insurers or HMOs to for-profit status until such time as the six requirements of the universal health care mandate have been met.

Another topic that was discussed was the issue of the current nurses' strike going on in Worcester, at St. Vincent's Hospital. The reason for the strike is not because of monetary reasons, but instead it is because nurses are being mandated to work overtime positions.

The current policy states that if a nurse needs to go home for a certain reason, although he or she is allowed to leave, a vacation day must be taken for the time missed.

Another reason for the strike is that workers are upset by the vicious cycle that comes from being mandated to work overtime. Once they work overtime hours (which usually consist of not only 12 hour shifts, but then another six hours on top of that) they are mentally withdrawn and must call in sick. Then, the cycle repeats itself. Presently, nurses working at St. Vincent's have an average of 16 patients assigned to them, while the staff is also being cut back.

Many nursing majors here at the University are also concerned about this issue.

"This is the system abusing their power to subordinate nurses," said Jane Compton, a senior nursing major. "The issue has so many facets and is yet so tough to deal with."

Ginny Chandler, a psychiatric nurse and professor of nursing at UMass, expressed concern. "This kind of care is deplorable for patients as well as the nurses." She went on to ask, "what is happening here, what is happening in this system?"

Dartmouth begins new financial imitative

By Rachel Osterman
The Dartmouth (Dartmouth College)

(U-WIRE) HANOVER, N.H. – With Dartmouth College now entering the implementation process of the Trustees' Initiative financial burden is drawing renewed attention, and costs appear be hovering in the $100 million to $150 million range.

Although specific plans for a revamped social and residential system have yet to be finalized, a rough estimate indicates that the total sum will exceed the initial $100 million estimate, most of which will come from the school's endowment and projected alumni donations.

Tuition, said Treasurer Win Johnson, will not be affected by the Initiative.

In the short term, the largest amount of funds will be directed toward new residential buildings. Within a few years, the College plans to build 500 beds at $100,000 each, totaling approximately $50 million.

A later phase of residential construction could mean 600 more beds at the same per capita price.

Immediate increases in the programming budget – including money for freshman orientation programs – will cost between one and two million dollars annually, in addition to new funding for staff and student positions, according to Johnson.

That alone means $40 million from the endowment, he said. And as the College considers plans for recreation and flat-floor spaces, further funds will be considered for allocation, as initial plans drafted by Centerbrook architects estimated costs would be in the tens of millions of dollars.

"It's a reflection of the College's financial strength in general, but it's also a reflection of the College's commitment to improving the quality of social and residential life," Dean of the College James Larimore said.

Though administrators are considering the future direction of the Initiative, specific plans have not yet been formulated, and costs are by no means definite.

"It's pretty clear that the needs are compelling" for new space, Johnson said. "But the magnitude of the recommendations are such that this will have to be done in a phased program, and I don't know yet how the phasing will work out, and I don't know how much will go to social, dining and recreation."

The sources of the funding, too, remain ambiguous.

"There's certainly hope that donors will take an interest in the needs portrayed by the Trustee report," Johnson explained. "Just in the endowment alone, we know we can afford an important part of it."

If the College is unable to locate sufficient alumni support, the endowment will be able to fund a large portion of the projects, according to Johnson.

But, he said, all that is contingent on a strong economy. If the country faces an extended recession, plans for the Initiative's implementation will be revised.

"We'll probably end up doing it more slowly than we had hoped, but this is a priority that we're going to stay committed to," Johnson said.

Nonetheless, the College remains optimistic that it will find alumni donors.

"I'm very confident," Larimore said. "A number of alumni have expressed an interest in helping us build space, a large flexible flat-floor space. And we haven't gone to anyone with specific requests yet."

Before the construction of new buildings is completed, the College is looking to spend additional money on keeping existing ones open for longer portions of the day, Larimore said.

He also stressed that construction will begin as soon as possible. For new dormitories, that could be within a three-year period. But for larger buildings – such as a possible new student center as well as recreational and dining spaces – the wait will likely be longer.

According to Director of Residential Operations Woody Eckels, the need for the large number of new beds – which could eventually total 1,100 – comes from several factors. One is to relieve the campus-wide housing crunch that currently limits the number of students who can live in College housing, and another is to "decompress" existing rooms, which the steering committee outlined as a major urgency.

Cancer-stricken boy loses battle in Boston

By Elizabeth Mehren
Los Angeles Times

BOSTON – Maybe letting go of his 12-year-old son was more than William Stewart could manage.

Father and son, Stewart and his boy David, rose to the status of local heroes here. David was the ginger-haired boy with AML, acute myelogenous leukemia, an aggressive cancer that is fatal to about 60 percent of its victims. William was the advocate who turned his son's condition into a cause, a crusade to gain state funding for children with catastrophic illnesses whose families cannot afford treatment.

David was the boy who went through radiation, a bone-marrow transplant and stem-cell replacement before volunteering to take part in a risky clinical trial far across the country, at the Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Center in Seattle. William was the father who faced down state Medicaid officials who refused to provide $93,000 for the experimental chemotherapy. Rebuffed by the state, Stewart, a carpenter and single father of five, launched a fund-raising drive that raised $160,000 – much of it from friends and neighbors.

One day after the state House of Representatives voted to set aside $2.5 million per year from an existing health insurance fund to pay for children's care when no other funding source exists, David Stewart died Friday in his father's arms at their home on Cape Cod. Hours later, 43-year-old William Stewart took his own life.

A close family friend, Bob Peredna, told reporters, "I don't think he wanted David to be alone."

The pair was remembered Monday at a double funeral attended by many of the state legislators who now hope to push the "David Stewart bill" to swift passage in the state Senate.

The measure is modeled after similar legislation in New Jersey, where the Catastrophic Illness in Children Relief Fund has operated for more than a decade. During the last fiscal year, the New Jersey program approved more than $5 million in assistance for 231 families. Payments ranged from $250 to $250,000.

The Massachusetts bill, inspired by the Stewart family's saga, would cover everything from primary care to medical supplies and home health care for children under 18. The funds would be allocated according to a formula based on family income.

State Sen. Therese Murray, a Democrat, sponsored the David Stewart bill with the hope that families will seek care for their children even when it is beyond their financial means. Although the majority of people have some form of medical insurance coverage, Murray said, "families lack the protection against the high cost of chronic or single episodes of serious illness that may destroy their resources."

The Stewart family fell squarely under that description. A self-employed carpenter, William Stewart was divorced. Along with David, he was rearing two daughters and another son. A third daughter is married. The family recently moved to the Cape Cod town of Sandwich from Hanover, a small community south of Boston, where much of the fund raising for David's treatment took place.

AML, the cancer that afflicted David, accounts for about 20 percent of childhood leukemia cases. Its high fatality rate distinguishes AML from other forms of childhood leukemia, from which about 70 percent of young victims are cured with treatment.

The Stewart family knew the experimental treatment in Seattle was a longshot. But William Stewart was so determined to seek the "antibody-targeted" chemotherapy for David that he braved an impending hurricane to plead his son's case before the state Medicaid board.

Flying to Seattle last October in a private jet donated for his use, David became the fourth pediatric patient at the Seattle cancer center and the eighth in the United States to be treated with CMA-676, a drug that combines a potent anticancer toxin with an antibody designed to attack only leukemia cells.

The news at first seemed positive. Initial tests showed no traces of leukemia in the boy's blood. But the disease failed to go into remission, and the Stewarts returned home for Thanksgiving.

Court says public employers, not employees, control comp time

By David G. Savage
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON – Public employers can force their hourly workers to take time off to avoid paying them overtime, the Supreme Court ruled Monday.

The 6-3 ruling leaves it to employers, not workers, to decide when "comp time" is used.

Yesterday's decision covers police, firefighters and public hospital workers, as well as the many thousands of other state or local employees who are offered compensatory time off rather than extra pay for their overtime work. Private sector workers are not affected, however.

Until now, some courts had said that those public employees were entitled to use their accumulated comp time whenever they chose to do so. If the comp time goes unused, the employee eventually can receive a cash payment for it.

But the Supreme Court often shields state and local governments from federal authority and yesterday's ruling interprets federal labor law in a way that gives public employers control over how their employees use their comp time.

The issue came before the court in a lawsuit brought by 127 sheriff's deputies in Harris County, Texas, which includes Houston. The deputies challenged their department's policy of giving bureau commanders the power to decide how and when comp time was used. The commanders were told to keep a lid on how much total comp time was accumulated and they were directed to schedule deputies off duty to reduce their comp time.

In their lawsuit, the deputies maintained that they had earned the comp time through working extra hours at the department's behest and that they should be entitled to use the comp time when they chose.

Disagreeing, Justice Clarence Thomas said that, while federal labor law requires public employers to give their employees either extra pay or time off for overtime work, it does not say how this comp time must be handled.

"Nothing in the (federal law)... prohibits an employer from compelling the use of compensatory time," Thomas said.

The decision interprets the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, the nation's landmark labor law. The law was extended to cover public employees in 1985, although Congress acted to ease the financial burden on state and local agencies. It gave these agencies the option of giving comp time to their workers, rather than extra pay. The law also says: "An employee who has accrued compensatory time off... shall be permitted by the employer to use such time within a reasonable period after making the request if (it) does not unduly disrupt the operation of the public agency."

The Clinton administration, the AFL-CIO and the National Association of Police Organizations said this provision means that employees should be free to use their comp time at their discretion, so long as it does not "unduly disrupt" their department's work.

Dissenting in the case (Christensen vs. Harris County, 98-1167) were Justices John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer.

Another stellar year of play at Haigis Hoopla

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

The tenth annual Haigis Hoopla drew to a close on Sunday night, with 19 teams taking home New Balance sneakers and the right to play for free next year, according to a press release issued yesterday.

The 16 divisions ranged from the 10 and under to Spalding Top Flite, the most competitive of the levels.

The Hoopla was set up in a round robin style format, and was single elimination.

This year, actual basketball officials refereed the games; in previous years they were self-refereed with the help of court monitors to settle disputes.

Other sport related activities were held during the weekend, including a Wiffle-Ball homerun hitting contest and a King of Court contest. There were also shooting challenges, like the YooHoo Slam Dunk Contest, judged by UMass basketball coaches James "Bruiser" Hint and Jeanie O'Brien, and representatives from the two of the event's main sponsors (YooHoo and New Balance), the Collegiate Web.com Knockout Challenge, the Spalding 3 Point Shootout, and the Coca-Cola Free Throw Championship).

Off the court, there were vendors asking for stupid human tricks in exchange for tee-shirts, boxer shorts and basketballs.

All profits go to help the Erik Kjeldsen Scholarship, given each year to two Sport Management students at UMass.

There were about 300-400 volunteers, according to Virginia Ridder, who added that "most were UMass students."

The event's winners were made public with the press release.

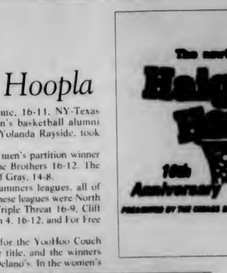
In the Spalding Top Flite men's division, Next Level Basketball took the title by defeating No Need For a Name, 16-11. NY-Texas Connection, including UMass women's basketball alumni Jaywana Bradley, Tonia Thomas and Yolanda Rayside, took the title in the women's bracket.

The Collegiate Web.com Hot Shots men's partition winner was the ECC Ballers, who defeated the Brothers 16-12. The female side saw 4 Strong over Shades of Gray, 14-8.

There were three 99.3 Weekend Jammers leagues, all of them male only. The champions from these leagues were North Bennett Street Bullies, who defeated Triple Threat 16-9, Cliff and the Rhythm Nation, over Superman 4, 16-12, and For Free 2, who topped Firecats, 16-12.

In the first of two men's divisions for the YooHoo Couch Potato level, All Washed Up took the title, and the winners from the second all male league were Delano's. In the women's group, Arec Hoops won, with Hillers coming in second place.

The AC Delco Master Tech league was a male only group, with Spring in the Air winning their game by a score of 16-13.



Fuzzy Lumpkin took the male high school division title, and the Screaming Eagles took the women's level.

The winners in the 13-14 year old division were Cash Money on the male side and Pioneers on the female side.

The 11-12 year old male team, Reflections came in first, with the 3 Musketeers finishing at the top of the women's division.

The 10 and under partition was won by 3 Dudes and A Little Lady.

The media and sponsors division was won by the team from UMass Food Services, beating Cigna by a margin of 6 points, 14-8.

Bilgis Abdul-Qaadir came with a basketball group from Springfield to show off.

Our Opinion

Voter mobilization crucial

Sunday's Millennium March For Equality in Washington D.C. drew more than 300,000 gay rights supporters, a monumentous out-pouring of support for a group that continues to fight for the basic rights that all of us expect.

The fourth such march in Washington, Sunday's events included speakers urging the crowd to take a stand against intolerance, support of hate-crimes legislation and the need for more voting and a giant wedding ceremony for 1,000 same-sex couples. Outlawed in United States, gay-marriage proponents finally caught a break in Vermont where legislation to recognize gay couples no different that straight couples has been passed by that state's House of Representatives.

The event brought together actors, actresses, politicians, and members of communities across the nation in support of progressive gay legislation and was no doubt a success for the organizers.

But will politicians listen?

Hate-crimes legislation have been pushed to back-burner of the American conscious, despite the horror of Matthew Shepard's death two years ago. Anti-gay legislation has been passed more often than failed, most recently in what is supposed to be the "progressive" state of California. Courts have struck down proposals to legalize gay marriage and politicians seem to be doing nothing but avoiding gay issues.

Which is why the gay community has to come together and vote. The Daily Collegian believes that the only change that anyone can expect to see, the only progressive change anyway, is going to require the hard work of the gay community.

Without widespread voting drives and voter turnout, the gay community can never realistically expect to have passed the kind of progressive legislation that has been waiting in the wings; unfortunate as that is, it's also the truth. Today's political atmosphere is, if anything, stagnant in its feelings towards gay, a situation not helped by a lack of voter turnout.

The quickest way to influence a politician is influence their position; if they feel they might lose that position, they'll be more inclined to act in positive ways towards those the communities that threaten them.

But is widespread voter turnout realistic? Of course it is. Like the women voters who heavily influenced the 1996 elections, a concerted effort by gay voters can easily swing elections in their favor. So few Americans vote as it is that a concerted effort by an major group can swing elections; If more than 300,000 people can make it to Washington D.C. for a march, surely numbers larger than that can vote in upcoming elections.

If they don't, none of the change that the gay community expects is realistic. Without their own hard work, they will not be able to reap the benefits of the American political system, and where it's at right now, the gay community should be concerned. Their needs are not being met, but without their own effort, they probably won't be.

An unhappy fan letter

Dear Courtney Cox-Arquette, Jennifer Aniston, Lisa Kudrow, David Schwimmer, Matt LeBlanc and Matthew Perry,

I am writing to you to ask a few simple questions. How do you sleep with yourselves at night? When you stare in the mirror, what do you see? I know that Jennifer and Courtney see rather skinny and emaciated women, but what do Lisa, David, Matt and Matthew see? Do you see selfish, money-grubbing, ungrateful actors? Do you note the fact that what you make in a single episode now is enough to feed several hundred people for a whole year? Are you aware that you are already among the highest paid actors in all of television? I have heard the rumor that you plan to ask to each be paid $800,000 per episode next season. I hate to break it to you, but you are not worth that much.

Your show is amusing. I have laughed at Monica's compulsions, Rachel's vanity, Phoebe's eccentricity, Ross's innocence, Joey's stupidity and Chandler's antics. Friends has been one of the better shows on the air during the last ten years. It has not been as witty as Seinfeld or as unusual as, say, Ally McBeal (though lately Jennifer and Courtney have been giving Calista Flockhart a run for her skinniness). However, I have to give you credit for producing a better show than such classics as Two Guys, A Girl, and A Pizza Place, Charmed or Dick Clark's Winning Lines.

So, you have put out a decent show. You have six seasons under your belt, and at $125,000 dollars an episode, you have been doing pretty well for yourselves. Your show has led you all to movie roles, some good, some horrible (Remember Lost In Space with Matt Leblanc... shall we say forgettable?). You all like each other, so you want to keep everyone on the show for the remaining seasons. All for one, you say. With lucrative movie deals, some of you may be tempted to leave the show. Perhaps you feel like the only way to keep the Friends chemistry is for all of you to stay on the show with incredibly high salaries. It may make sense to you. The gist of what you are doing, however, is immoral and unethical.

Laura Siciliano

Firefighters put their lives at risk and run into burning buildings while making less than one-twentieth of the salary you desire. Nurses work hard to keep us healthy, and make about that much as well. So do teachers, laboring long hours to educate students, and police officers placing themselves in the line of fire. The minimum wage in the United States is so low that one person working full time can barely sustain themselves, let alone a family. These people can rarely get a 1 percent salary raise. Cost of living can rise 5 percent in a year, and most of America is left to struggle with whatever they make.

You do not desire to double or triple your salaries. You want your salaries to be five times higher! Your desire is to raise your salaries from $125,000 per episode to $800,000 an episode? Are you nuts? The fact that you would even ask for that demonstrates your selfishness and how out of touch you are with reality. In the "real world" (not the one on MTV), people do not work 20 weeks a year on a sitcom and make $2.5 million dollars, let alone the $16 million you hope to pull in.

Actors are making $20 million a film; baseball players are earning $20,000 each time they step up to the plate. What kind of country is this? We barely pay the people who save our lives and health a living wage, and yet we turn around and pay Julia Roberts $15 million dollars to wear a revealing shirt and "fight" environmental polluters. It was a great movie, but a heck of a lot of toxic waste could be cleaned up with Julia's salary.

As much as I love to hear you say "How you doin'?" Matt, you are not worth one-tenth of what you get paid now. The raise you are asking for collectively is quite extreme. How about a raise to $200,000, or even $300,000? With that and the money that David Arquette makes from his 1-800-Collect ads, the Arquettes would be more than comfortable. Jennifer, I am sure that Brad Pitt will help you out if the $4 million you would take in annually at $200,000 an episode was not enough. I think you all could live above the poverty line at $200,000 an episode.

Maybe I am asking too much. I guess that is just the way Hollywood works. You are only going for what you know you can get. Everyone seems pretty down to earth on the show; perhaps I just thought that that meant you were more in touch with reality then the rest of the entertainment world. I guess I was wrong.

Sincerely,

A disappointed fan.

Trenkle, Wilkinson out of line

To the Editor:

In response to Jason Trenkle's artice, "Benefits for Athletes?", we feel that he is severely misguided (4/28/00). As athletes of this university we can safely say that UMass continuously has one of the most well respected athletic departments In this country. Aside from continually winning the Atlantic 10 Commissioner's Cup, over the past five years, UMasa ranks far and above the rest of the Atlantic 10, with the most student-athletes on the Athletic Director's Honor Roll (which is studenta above a 3.0 GPA). Apparently, Jason thinks this is a fraud, because tutors cheat for ua and do our work. Sorry, Jason, this is not some bad movie about college sports, where the university cheats for its athletes. If this occurred the NCAA would easily find this out. Take, for example, the University of Minnesota basketball team.

Furthermore, the Athletic Department does not consist of just the football and men's basketball teams. You have overlooked the majority of the athletes at this university, who are not only some of the most respected individuals throughout the Atlantic 10, but some of the best athletes in the country. Nevertheless, you cite some very specific attacks concerning the football and basketball teams, and we are not going to speculate over these Individuals. UMass does not put its athletes on pedestals, as some universities do. UMass monitors all of its athletes and makes sure that we are leaders in the classroom, in our sport, and in the community.

Athletes on this campus are some of the hardest-working individuals at UMass. Our dedication to our sport is the equivalent to a full-time job. It is true that athletes have academic support and health support, but with an overwhelming schedule like ours and a great risk of us getting injured, aren't these support services necessary?

We agree that athletes should not be paid. Only in amateur sports is athletica in its purest form. However, that is no reason to accuse our Athletic Department of violating NCAA regulations and to stereotype student-athletes as violent, dumb jocks. UMass athletica represents the University and prestige. We hope that the rest of the UMass community is more informed than this individuen. As a campus we should support student athletics and other student activities to promote school pride and encourage recruits to attend UMass. Next time Jason feels like writing a juvenile 'editorial' merely for shock value, he should research his subject matter thoroughly.

To the Editor:

Let's see... what can I tell you about myself? I am a dual major currently embarking on Psychology and Education, but truthfully I don't know if I'll stick with thoste, seeing as I am only a freshman. Oh yeah, and I guess I almost forgot to tell you my most prominent feature, which Sam Wilkinson wants to brand across my forehead: I am a Commonwealth Honors Scholar.

Guess I should have said that first... huh? I mean, we Commonwealth Scholars are all of ourselves as privileged and 'harder working' since we are that much smarter than everyone else, right Sam? Hey Sam Wilkinson... do you clearly remember me? I was that girl sitting down the table from you and your friends at dinner about a week ago. After reading your wondrous article, which was incredibly insulting, I guess I really made an impression. Good.

I'm sorry to admit that your article "Hard Work Not Elitist" (4/20/00) bothered me, and made me really angry and upset. You have compromised the standards for respectable journalism.

Boo Downs

Boo Downs is an expensive investment. However it is important to cater to the needs of a few students that help maintain and support the larger student body. With this in mind, I feel that our diversity quotient should be _____. As far as the limited disproportionately fewer minorities and female students in the Commonwealth College are concerned, I feel that this college should _____ its arms to a more diverse population. After all we are a trend-setter for the public universities in this country.

Speaking of setting trends, we had to deal with the string of sexual assaults on campus. Immediately following the incidents, my administration did _____ in order to make UMass a safer place. After all, after the PR success of the Commonwealth College, it would have been a shame for our university to be undesirable. The criticism brought up over these incidents was prevention, rather than just apprehending the perpetrators. My administration, along with the SGA did _____ of the necessary steps needed to preventing future violence against women. I would like to hear Professor Sut Jhally for bringing Jackson Katz to UMass to speak with the student body. Even though the creditability of issue was potentially compromised by a victim recant, we are still pushing to make this campus look good.

Recently, there has been some controversy surrounding budget allocations to the SGA and my administration. Although my administration was given an increased budget, we looked to release elements in several academic departments. We did this for _____ reason, but for the sake of _____ at large. Similar controversy surrounded budgeting for RSOs. I feel that the SGA did the _____ thing in the way they rationalized giving large sums of money to certain groups, while neglecting others. They are just preparing for real life, where you need to know who to fund.

And in other, more mundane issues.....

Presenting the second annual UMass libs

The life of a columnist is hard work. We need to come up with social issues that we have little honest concern, and preach to you why everyone else is wrong. We spend hours constructing arguments, establishing our moral superiority, and trampling over the feelings of our readers. Legitimate letters to the editor pale in comparison to our hundred line columns going into minute-by-minute detail of our last weekend. After all, we columnists are only a handful of students given extremely exaggerated powers. We command huge audiences who read our fluff because they like our pictures, rather than our content. If I were not enjoying my status as a member of the elite, I would be shocked and dismayed at the limited discourse circulating in the Editorial/Opinion page. In consideration for the little people, I, as a concerned member of society, give you a solution. That's right, ladies and gentlemen; I give you the Second Annual UMass Libs!

For those who are not familiar with this long-standing tradition, here is a brief shakedown. The writers of this community have the right to make their voice heard in the wonderful Democracy we live in. Because the rank of columnist for the Collegian is a highly coveted and revered position, the most a citizen can do is to write a letter to the editor. Well, with the extensive powers bestowed to me by my overactive imagination, I decree that today, everyone is an honorary columnist. Thus it is written in the Book of Boo that, "All shalt have the right to think for themselves, thus expressing themselves according-ly."

Being that it is the end of the year, we can look at all the events that have transpired, and reflect on them. Imagine you are the speechwriter for Chancellor David K. Scott (If he does not have a speechwriter, pretend he does). The Chancellor is due to have a press conference with all the major networks and CNN on the state of our University. Part of the speech has _____ already been written, but you need to fill in the holes, making the speech complete. _____ with Are you ready? Lets Go!

"Good evening, I'm Chancellor David K. Scott, of the University of Massachusetts, at Amherst. As with every year, I would like to comment on the events that transpired in the 1999-2000 Academic Year. First of all, I would like to say that I _____ with this year as a whole. There several key issues I would like to speak about today. The issues include our new Commonwealth College, the rash of sexual assaults on campus earlier this year, my thoughts on budget allocations, and any other issue that comes to mind.

The first issue is our Commonwealth College. The creation of this specialized institution is a _____ for our students who seek a small college environment in our large university. We know that the creation of the Commonwealth College was an

Yom HaShoah: Outwitting the challenges of history

Last week, as we celebrated the holiday of Passover, we were taught: "In every generation one should regard himself as if he personally had been brought forth from the land of slavery." And last week we sat at the Seder and did so according to our customs and traditions that dated back to times long before we were born. But have we ever really thought about the statement "In every generation?"

It is a sad fact. In every generation one can regard himself as if he personally had been brought forth from the house of bondage. In every generation there has been a house of bondage, or the horrible rulings of a tyrant. What generation has gone without any anti-Semitism?

None, I can tell you. How do I know? Because I was there, and so were you. I was there when Amalek tried to defeat the Israelite tribes in the desert. I was there when Haman tried to wipe out all of the Jews from Persia. I was there when the Romans came and destroyed our Temple, both times. I was there when we were expelled from Spain in 1492, or England and France and Germany and everywhere else before that. I was there when the United States had its own quota on Jewish immigration. I was there in every generation when our lives were threatened. And you were too.

But I was there when Avram Avinu smashed his father's idols. And I was there every time the Israelites defeated its enemies, rather than the reverse. I was there when Mordechai and Esther proved Haman's evil plot to the King, and I was there on May 14, 1948, when the State of Israel was born.

In 1998, on the seventeenth anniversary of the day of my birth, I was in the same place where my Grandfather nearly lost his life. I was in Auschwitz, Poland, on the steps of the infamous Dr. Mengele's bunker where he performed his horrible tests on twins like me. I saw the seven tons of human ash that was placed in a memorial at the concentration camp Majdanek, and I spent my July 4th remembering freedom in a very different way. I spent that Saturday in the concentration camp Treblinka, wandering among the thousands of stones marking the villages that people were taken from to be murdered.

Robbie Medwed

I stood in many of the same places that members of my family stood many years before. It all became real for me then. Sure, I had heard all of the stories that my Grandmother would tell, and, although they were truly amazing, it didn't mean anything until I was there. No one can understand the atrocities and the possibility of human hatred until they experience it first hand.

I was in the old town section of Warsaw one night. Many tourists were walking around, and, although we probably weren't the only ones, there were very few Americans. Nothing out of the ordinary seemed to happen at all for a while, until I was walking with a friend near one of the darker areas of the main square. What seemed to come from out of nowhere was, in fact, a Polish teenager who walked straight up to me, less than a foot away from my face, and yelled, "Fuck off, Jew!"

One bright morning, I was on my way to my second grade class at the Hebrew Academy of Atlanta, an orthodox Jewish day school. I remember my confusion and fear when I saw "Fuck You, Jews" spray painted on the front entrance to my school. Sure, it ended up being a bunch of drunken high schoolers, but I'll never forget that horrible shade of blood red that stained the doorways and defaced the sidewalks.

It's all still very real and very true. Anti-Semitism and racial prejudice are sadly still just as strong today as they ever were. But that's not to say that we should be depressed and downtrodden for every hour of everyday. It's quite clear to any historian that we don't let it bother us – we keep on going. Nothing will stop us. Nothing as long as we remember what has happened in the past. We are here now, and with understanding, trust, and knowledge we will be here longer than anyone could have ever dreamed.

Yes, I was there, but we are here.

Purple Wildflowers: A UMass student recalls visit to Nazi camps in Poland

It's still hard to look through my pictures, journal entries, and bags of memories from my trip to Poland; six camps in eight days. Everyone was asking me why I chose to go to Poland during the summer before my senior year of high school. I did not know them, and I am only closer to knowing now. But everything that each of us in my group experiences in Poland affected us differently. For some, it was the everyday objects preserved behind a wall of glass; for others, the muffled screams from the past blended with our own pain – grasping for air and clawing for life.

Poland was cold and dreary. The people were standoffish and anti-Semitic, the food was inedible, and the rain was relentless. By the second day in this unwelcoming country, I was wet, cold, hungry, homesick and scared. The first of the camps left me numb, and I feared nothing I would see on the remainder of the trip would affect me. I had read many books to prepare for the trip, seen several movies, visited the Holocaust Museum in Washington – perhaps there was no way this trip would affect me. After a sleepless night, I awoke to visit Maidanek, a camp located directly outside of the city of Lublin.

Constructed in 1942, Maidanek was still intact, from the brick buildings to the original railway signs. The city of Lublin was entirely visible from the camp; it used to rain ashes on the city streets as those who lived there denied the camp's gruesome existence. It served as both a concentration and extermination camp. Our group walked under a rock structure suspended more than twenty feet into the air – huge stones that formed the number: 534,896. At the end of the entrance path was a sign, "Expozycza/Komory Gazowe," with an arrow pointing to the right, and "Mauzoleum/Krematorium" with an arrow to the left. Our leader led us to the right. I could not understand Polish signs, but I knew both what "gas" and "crematorium" were. I realized that I was about to enter one of the killing dens. I felt myself wishing for inner strength; no matter how equipped for the trip I was, I had no idea that I would be walking through as gas chamber.

Our group leader, Iosh, tried to prepare us, "Look guys, we are about to do one of the hardest things you have ever done in your life. Now, we're entering the gas chamber as a group and we're going to exit that way. Many people never got to see the other side of this door. But you will."

We piled in, all 69 of us, and suddenly the door closed. I heard screams when the room became pitch black. I felt for the wall, and as I touched it, I ran my hands over fifty-year-old fingernail marks in the hard surface. People were screaming and wailing in the terrifying darkness. I was not sure which screams were in my mind, and which filled the chamber in reality. I heard Iosh talking through the screams, his voice partly muffled by the sounds around us.

Iosh was saying, "This blue tint on the wall is the remains of Zyclon B gas. All of you are that Zyclon B. The Nazis tried to scrub away the stain of the Jewish people and destroy the evidence of their crimes, but it did not work. Just as the Zyclon B refused to wash away, so do the sixty-nine of you. You are here as evidence that the Nazis did not succeed, and you have a responsibility to remind the world of that. That is why you are all here; you now have responsibility to make certain that no one ever forgets what happened in this place."

Light flooded into the room, and for a second everyone stood looking, adjusting their vision, realizing that we were free to leave. I ran from the chamber to a clearing near the exit, secluded enough to not be disturbed. I fell to the ground and sobbed until I was hysterical. I looked at the sky, the first blue sky in Poland that I can remember. The brightness made the colors and sights break away from the gloomy shadow of the familiar overcast atmosphere. My gaze turned downward. Interspersed in the grass were little purple wildflowers growing among the weeds. They struck my attention as I touched the petals with my fingertips. I wondered how they could bear to grow on this desecrated ground. They were uncommonly beautiful – those specks if purple on the wise earth.

Not knowing what to do next, I released my emotions through a passage in my journal:

Renee Cohn

Somewhere in the darkness and walls, the past and present mixed. Suddenly, my screams were not my own. There was the phantom of the deceased in the chamber who breathed her last breath as I gasped for my own. The dead and I embraced, as we became part of each other; simultaneously her voice became mine. This phantom was the essence of six million people. It was their cries, as they knew that they would no longer have the chance for life. I had no time to feel the guilt.

Time elapsed, and I found that I was now alone as I stood up and continued around the death camp. I saw images that made me sick: barracks filled ceiling to floor at least twenty yards back with baby shoes, rooms of human hair, barracks of glasses, one of false limbs, another of dolls. It did not end there, as I rejoined my group in the crematorium; I actually stood in a room and looked at human ovens, stood and stared at a mound of human ashes.

That night, I had so many questions and so many fears. I wanted to know if six million people surrendered without a fight; but more importantly, I wanted to know what happened to the God that I felt gave up on them. My anger was not directed in the right place. God did not cause the Holocaust; people did. It is people that I should have felt animosity towards. The Nazis destroyed families, robbing the lives of so many people, and prevented the children and their children's children from ever having the chance to take pleasure in life.

It was their cries I heard. I knew that they would no longer have the chance for existence. In those phantoms of souls were scientists, doctors, artists and writers who never had the opportunity to contribute to the world. There were generations of people whose lives were taken in the room in which I stood.

My questions were not answered, and they never would be. A part of my childhood hope was forever eliminated. I felt overwhelmed by the immense question, "why me?" Why did I get to walk out that door and see the sky and the ground? And this trip to Poland – what was I supposed to walk away with? I'm not a scholar or a philosopher, but my answers proved enough to make sense of my visit.

As the light flooded into the gas chamber, I knew I had somehow become one of them and accepted a responsibility, to stand witness to this atrocity and prevent it from ever occurring again. For now I know that I survived, and I survived them.

I went to Poland so that I could see those things, so I could learn what happened, so I could teach it. I survived in memory of the people who didn't. Maidanek will not be standing forever, but I am now the next generation with the responsibility to make sure that no one ever forgets.

Three weeks later, I stood in the Holy Land of Israel and watched the sun creating a reverse rainbow in the sky. The rays touched the dome of the rock and shed a golden light onto the entire Old City. A signal called the beginning of the Sabbath day, and all of Jerusalem fell quiet.

I beheld the last of the color explosion as the sun slowly disappeared behind the mountains. My family continued their Sabbath song. As the last traces of sunlight departed, I remembered a quote that discovered after the liberation of the concentration camps. It was inscribed on the walls of a cellar in Germany where Jews hid from Nazis:

"I believe in the sun, even when it is not shining. I believe in love when feeling it not. I believe in God even when He is silent."

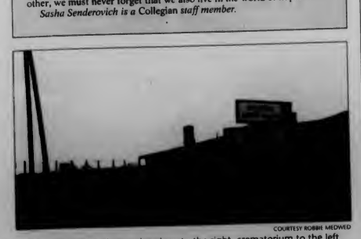
A note from the editor



This is semester's last issue of the Jewish Affairs page. I would like to thank everyone who made this page possible for your contribution and support. I would also like to thank Paul Entis and Cheryl Gordon for their year-long commitment to UMass Hillel, and the Jewish life on campus.

Unfortunately, we have to end this year on a somber note. Today Is Yom HaShoah – Holocaust Memorial Day, and it seemed unfitting to dedicate this page to anything else but this occasion. The tragedy that we are commemorating today ended fifty-five years ago, yet anti-Semitism and all other forms of bigotry are far from being extinct. A few memories come to mind: "Jews, get out!" printed in black coal across from my family's apartment in Russia, my hard-core-communist teacher trying to make my life unbearable after I attended a Passover seder. Many more. Many of us can relate to these stories.

Holocaust is not just a part of history; it is a living memory. With a firebombing of a synagogue in Germany on the anniversary of Hitler's birth two weeks ago, with constantly occurring hate crimes, and with ongoing genocide in many parts of the world, today we must remember that human nature is capable of committing brutalities for which there is no rational explanation. We must not forget what happened during the Holocaust, or, in words of George Santayana, "the one who does not remember history is bound to live through it again."

Yet, despite unexplainable cruelties that human beings inflict on each other, we must never forget that we also live in the world of hope.

Professor Young speaks on how the world remembers Holocaust

By Sasha Senderovich
Collegian Staff

How does the world remember the Holocaust? How is the memory of the Holocaust represented by the surviving generations, and the generations born after the tragedy? These were the questions addressed by James Young, a UMass Professor of English and Chair of Judaic Studies department at last week's Shabbat service at the Jewish Community of Amherst.

Young was first confronted by the commemoration of the Holocaust in 1976, while volunteering on a kibbutz in Israel. He remembers how on the Holocaust Memorial Day, the siren went off around the country, and everyone was motionless for two minutes. "I knew of the day, but I did not know what actually happened on that day" Young noted. Now, Professor Young is a leading authority on Holocaust memorialization. He serves on the international museum boards at Auschwitz and Terezin, as well as on the board of directors for the Association of Jewish Studies. His last book, At Memory's Edge: After-Images of the Holocaust in Contemporary Art and Architecture, is due to be published by Yale University Press on May 9.

To Young, understanding of the Holocaust is multi-dimensional. First, it is important to understand how Germans saw the Jews, how Nazis constructed an image of a group that was to be destroyed. Second, how Jews themselves understood what was happening to them at the time – a difficult task, because nothing similar has happened to Jews in the past. But, most importantly, Young believes it essential to "approach the Holocaust in light of how it was passed down to us," how we ourselves understand the event after it had happened.

Often, as Young pointed out, the perception of the Holocaust is interpreted differently by various nations that are trying to represent it. Such is an example of the first Holocaust memorial in the United States – a tablet in New York City park, commemorating "the Jewish martyrs who died in the name of liberty" – an inscription that goes along with the freedom-filled ideal of America, yet does not replicate the systematic destruction of the Jews instituted by the Nazis. Professor Young sees the Holocaust Museum in Washington, DC in the same light – as a representation of everything that America isn't. Yet, he points out the ambiguity of locating the Holocaust Museum on the Mall in the nation's capital next to all other national monuments, for there is no commemoration of such American phenomena as slavery and persecution of Native Americans.

Professor Young sees Germany's problem of representing the Holocaust in the fact that "nations don't build themselves on the crimes they perpetuate." In 1997, he was invited to speak at the German parliament, the Bundestag, on Germany's Holocaust memorial problem, and was later appointed to the five-member committee for Germany's national Holocaust memorial. The only Jew and the only foreigner on the panel, Young was active in guiding the entry by an American architect Peter Eisenman through the successful vote in the Bundestag. The memorial is scheduled to open in Berlin in 2001.

How is the Holocaust to reflect the national memory in Israel? Professor Young notes that right after the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948, the debates about commemorating the Holocaust went under way. First was the proposal to declare April 19 "a day of the uprising of the ghettos." On April 19, 1943 the Warsaw ghetto uprising took place – the biggest uprising by any group during the war. However, the day of mourning declared on an anniversary of the uprising, would have commemorated only the fighters, leaving out the martyrs destroyed in the concentration camps. Second proposal, says Young, was under way that would have set up the observance of "the day of Holocaust and heroism" commemorating both the martyrs and the heroes. Yet, the day picked for that holiday – April 19 – did not satisfy the religious members of Israeli parliament. April 19, 1943 fell on 15 Nisan in the Iewish calendar – the beginning of Passover. How could a day of mourning be observed on the most joyous holiday? Young noted that the Warsaw ghetto rebels have purposely began their uprising on the holiday that celebrates the deliverance of the Jews from the Egyptian slavery, so that they signify their own deliverance by their own will at the time when they were not saved through divine intervention. The day between Passover and Israeli Independence Day – 27 Nisan – was finally picked for observance of Yom HaShoah – the Holocaust Memorial Day. A two-minute siren is sounded throughout the country, so that everyone stops and remembers those who have died. Young remembers how he had once filmed people's reactions during the siren. "There is no unified response," he said "there is no collective memory, but rather a collected memory" of different memories brought together in the nation-wide moment of mourning.

Yet, believes Young, it is not enough to remember the Holocaust simply by attending memorials and dedicating a day to mourning. Young was present at the unveiling of the Holocaust Memorial in Washington, DC in 1993, where Elie Wiesel – the Holocaust survivor, writer and the Nobel Peace Prize laureate – was asked to speak. During his speech, Wiesel stopped, turned to President Clinton and said that he could not go on before something is done to stop the genocide in Bosnia and Herzegovina. "In my mind," says Young "I could hear the President reply 'We are doing enough by remembering the Holocaust.'" Yet, believes Young, it is important that all of the memorial work does not become a vicarious action that would replace stopping the persecutions that go on in the world in the present day.

3:20pm

Arrive at Newbury Comics in Boston for a special acoustic performance and signing that Travis are putting on. Are informed by Newbury gatekeeper that the store has already reached fire capacity and that myself and two friends will be able to enjoy the brilliant set out on the cold sidewalk. My quick-thinking companion Shawn tries to use his camera and professional-looking Collegian business card to get us in, to no avail.

3:45pm

After hearing wonderful acoustic versions of "As You Are" and "Writing to Reach You" from outside the store, Travis drummer Neil Primrose and guitarist Andy Dunlop exit the store and walk right by the small outdoor crowd, suggesting that the rest of the set will be left up to singer/guitarist Fran Healy and bassist Dougie Payne. Excellent versions of "Driftwood" and "Why Does It Always Rain on Me?" follow, although the undisputed highlight is Travis' rare yet achingly sincere acoustic cover of Britney Spears' "...Baby One More Time." Their set closes with the stripped down yet still powerful "Blue Flashing Light," the hidden track from the recently U.S. released sophmore effort The Man Who.

At the tail end of their signing session, we get to meet the band. Shawn takes shots and gets his CD booklet signed from all four unendingly friendly members, while Rob and I get our tickets for tonight's show adorned with Sharpies. We may have gotten a flat or poster signed, if it weren't for that kid in the Detroit Red Wings jersey, who helped himself to all the merchandise he could pry off the walls.

7:35pm

After meeting up with my other friend Anthony at the Orpheum, we take our seats and Travis begins their outstanding set. The obligatory opener, "All I Wanna Do Is Rock," from their debut album Good Feeling provides ample opportunity for Andy to wail on his guitar and thrash around like a man possessed, a fun occurance for the duration of their 45 minute set. "Good Feeling" has some great piano work and Fran inviting a clap-along from the audience, and will be the final song from the first album before diving headfirst into The Man Who. "Writing To Reach You" is perfect, and while introducing "As You Are," Fran urges people to not worry about how other people see you and just be yourself, because when your time comes you'll look back and regret how you lived. Stellar versions of "Driftwood," "Turn," and "Why Does It Always Rain on Me" are presented to a mostly seated but still enthusiastic audience, some of whom had flags and signs for the band. The melancholy "Slide Show" drifted nicely into the forceful and emotional set closer "Blue Flashing Light," which, appropriately, featured dozens of flashing and moving blue lights.

Oasis leaves the stage after what I now consider to be a great show. I didn't always think it would turn out this way however...

8:45pm

After a very interesting big screen clip reel that accompanied the instrumental opener "Fin' In the Bushes," Oasis 2000 takes the stage to open the night up with the first single from Standing On The Shoulder of Giants, "Go Let It Out." A frenetic slide show plays in the background of sped-up footage of city shots, traffic, and stock tickers, which is confusing but doesn't detract from the excitement. And by excitement I mean Oasis excitement, which is Noel passively studying the audience and his guitar, and Liam's notorious careless stage presence, which suggests to the uninformed complete contempt for the audience and absolute lack of charisma. Those who know better, however, know this is classic Liam, take it or leave it, whose sparse audience interaction save the occasional "cheers" and wide-eyed gazes into the audience are just his style, and shouldn't be mistaken for a lack of love, because it's anything but.

"Who Feels Love?," the beautiful new single, is next, and falls victim to an unfortunate new Oasis trend that dates back to 1997's Be Here Now. The trend is one that compels the band to transform all of their thoughtful, moving ballads into stadium-ready rockers, a disease that also claims the towering "Wonderwall" tonight. On the album, "Love" is a psychedelic and low-key contrast to "Go Let It Out," but in concert it's played after that song like it's somehow supposed to keep the energy going, which it's not meant to do. Thankfully, both "Love" and "Wonderwall" are songs far too good to ruined under most any circumstances, and "Wonderwall" actually was kind of interesting arena-style, since its poetic lyrics deserve to be echoed far and wide.

"Supersonic" is then thrown out rather non-chalantly as the third proper song, and the crowd goes accordingly crazy. "Cigarettes and Alcohol" also shows up as a surprise from Definitely Maybe, and its then, maybe halfway through the show, that Oasis really kick into gear. Previous, it seemed as if they were simply going through the motions, and band interaction was at an all time low with new guitarist Gem and new bassist Andy Bell relegated to the left portion of the stage which, while not that far away physically, could have been miles away according to the vibes given off. Thankfully, a song about tobacco and booze got things going in the right direction, and for the rest of the night they went all out. Noel took the mic for the new "Where Did It All Go Wrong?" and "Don't Look Back in Anger," and Liam sneered through the sprawling "Gas Panic!" and "Roll With It." Be Here Now got royally snubbed with only "Stand By Me" being represented, although when the eternal "Live Forever" closed their set there was little room for complaining.

Noel returns to the stage for three encores, two of which will be cover songs sung by him. The first is the stunning Neil Young cover "Hey Hey My My (Into The Black)," a song that was previously dedicated by the band to Kurt Cobain at a Seattle concert.

Brit-rock band Travis made an in-store appearance before opening for Oasis.

Noel's smooth vocals and somber delivery are the perfect match for the feel of the song, and this certainly ranks up there with their finest covers. Following that was the Beatles' "Helter Skelter," at which point I realized I was going to have to take back all of the bad things I said about their version on last Thursday's "Who Feels Love?" single review. Although it might be nice to hear Liam sing it, Noel's version is top, capturing all the energy that made the song so great to begin with. Liam returns to cap the night off with "Rock 'N' Roll Star," which can only truly be sung by him.

During their roaring farewell applause, Liam cocks back his arm as if to throw his tambourine into the crowd, resulting in a frenzy close to the stage. Sensing the anticipation, he simply drops it on the stage and laughs while he walks off, proving that among the many changes for Oasis as of late, some things thankfully stay the same.

Evening of one acts a production disaster

Scenes in the Gardens:
Three One Acts
April 28
Durfee Gardens

Without the aid of manipulated lights, sound, or a theater, an evening of one acts was presented this weekend in the Durfee Gardens. The production, entirely student designed, exemplified what can go wrong when a stage show is done with the absence of a stage.

Women and Wallace, written by Jonathan March Sherman, the first of the three pieces, was ruthlessly lengthy and seemed to express, somehow, nothing. It was a very predictable study of Wallace, whose mother committed suicide at age 6, and his subsequent struggle to maintain a healthy relationship with other women.

I'd like to assume that, if directed in a more suitable place, Kelly Ristaino could have designed the production so that it was actually engaging, and not just a painful succession of scenes that one could easily hear the first line of and immediately fill in the rest. The cast was without outstanding performances, mostly because any sign of earnest acting was lost in the open atmosphere and complete disconnection of the gardens. Jesse DeAngelis, who lead the cast as Wallace had a few almost moments of genuine emotion, but brought many of the scenes down with his constant pattern of hyperbolic expression.

The Universal Language, by David Iven, was the shining star of the evening. Directed by Nick Adams, the two-character plays had a consistent level of energy that was delivered by Jason Czernich and Sue Palmer in a wonderful display of timing. Both Czernich and Palmer did an exceptional job handling Ives' original gibberish language making the piece the only of the evening to stay true to the form of one acts: brief and impacting.

By the time The Line That's Picked Up 1,000 Babes (and How It Can Work for You), the final portion of the night began, the performance was already running

It's all good with Frequency

By Wes Wrightson
Collegian Correspondent

Frequency
directed by Gregory Hoblit
with Jim Caviezel, Dennis Quaid, and Andre Braugher
playing at Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield

Wow. I got to see two great movies consecutively. Last week it was U-571 and now Frequency. This is the type of movie that has an interesting concept – communicating with a person in another time dimension – and it actually delivers. The director, Gregory Hoblit, does a great job in maintaining the visual consistency while not straying from the overall concept and losing the audience in the process. Frequency is a movie for guys. It has baseball, fire fighting, and time-travel. What more could you ask for?

Frequency plays ingenious games with the latest theoretical physics, speculating on the possibility that there are parallel universes at work in our lives. These parallel universes may also be linked together, and through that linkage we can jump into them. We can travel back and forth from future to the past without leaving ourselves behind. In a cameo in the film, real-life theoretical physicist Brain Greene explains the science of this theory of parallel universes. This is called the Superstring theory, and it suggests that there may be ten or more dimensions in the universe, and some of these dimensions are time dimensions. One could send information backwards in one time dimension by shooting it through another dimension by the means of a black hole. The science is just a convenient set-up for the director, who turns the science-heavy script into an intense and entertaining ride.

The movie converts the life of a man John, who finds his father's old HAM radio one night while drinking beer with his friend (played by Noah Emmerich, who played Truman's friend in The Truman Show). John discovers that through a bizarre solar disturbance, he can communicate with his Dad on this old ham radio. They communicate with each other through the medium of time and not space. John and his father answer questions about each others' lives (John's father was killed 30 years ago), and as it turns out, John ends up saving the life of his father 30 years ago, thus changing the lives of everyone else around them because of this. John proves the validity of this communication by calling the World Series play-by-play to his father.

John is a guy who has gone through his life wondering about the life he could have had with the father that he barely knew. He grew up in the shadow of tragedy; he stumbles through life, drinking beer from the bottle and pondering what could have been. It doesn't take John long to figure out what he needs to do. When he does prevent his father's death, the consequences ripple through the past and by working together, separated by three decades, the father and son attempt to set things right by thwarting a serial killer's attempts to kill someone close to them.

Both Dennis Quaid and Jim Caviezel pull off the father-and-son shtick without any hitches, and Andre Braugher is a natural as a homicide detective (not much of a stretch, considering he played one on TV's Homicide) Noah Emmerich (the brother of first-time scriptwriter, Toby Emmerich) pulls his turns off as the best friend of John, Gordo. Pumpkins rock Lowell

THE SMASHING PUMPKINS
Paul Tsongas Arena
April 29, 2000

The Smashing Pumpkins played to a sold out crowd at the Paul Tsongas Arena in Lowell, MA this Saturday in support of their most recent release, MACHINA/The Machines of God. The album has received lukewarm enthusiasm from mainstream radio listeners, forcing the band, spear headers of alternative rock's push to center stage during the early to mid nineties, into somewhat smaller venues in recent years; for the fans in attendance Saturday, however, the reduction in venue size translated into greater sense of audience/ band rapport.

No opening act was scheduled, and at 9:30 the Pumpkins took the stage and slid into the fluid, hypnotic instrumental "Pale Scales," an unreleased song from the MACHINA recording sessions, before tearing into the appropriately named "Heavy Metal Machine." The Tsongas Arena acoustics aren't outstanding, unfortunately, and much of the band's heavier playing was rendered sludgy, loosing a regrettable amount of its crispness and edge.

The Pumpkins followed maintained the momentum of "HMM" with "The Everlasting Gaze," the first MACHINA track to hit radio stations and in many ways a throwback to the style of angst-anthem songwriting found on their multi-platinum opus, Mellon Collie and the Infinite Sadness.

MACHINA tunes continued to dominate the first half of the set, with "Glass and the Ghost Children," "Blue Skies Bring Tears," "Stand Inside Your Love," and "I of the Mourning," and despite the compromising acoustic situation, Corgan and his cohorts were in excellent form.

COURTESY ANTON CORBIJN

The Smashing Pumpkins, looking only slightly more ridiculous than they did Saturday night.

After finishing "IotM," a smaller drum kit was wheeled to the front of the stage and the band transitioned into an acoustic set featuring a rewritten "To Sheila" (off of 1998's intricate, somber, and poorly received Adore), "Disarm" (off of 1993's breakthrough album Siamese Dream), and "Try, Try, Try," a poppy acoustic guitar-and-piano track from MACHINA.

Corgan, armed once again with his electric guitar, led the band into a cover of Essex's "Rock On," before flavoring the set with a welcome collection of old favorites from previous albums. "Zero," "Today," and "Tear" much energized from its plodding Adore studio equivalent) sent the crowd screaming and leaping. The light show arrangement for the concert was wonderfully creative and atmospheric, and during such favorites as "Zero," included epileptic seizure-inducing levels of strobe lights.

The band tempered the rock and roll with "With Every Light," a charming acoustic number from MACHINA, before moving on to "Bullet With Butterfly Wings," one of their most popular MCIS singles, which in turn bled into a loose cover of "Once in a Lifetime" by the Talking Heads; Corgan improvised most of the lyrics, including such extemporaneous gems as "and you might ask yourself, what was the Boston Tea Party really about?"

Returning for the first encore, Corgan sang "Blank Page," a highlight of Adore, backed by a pre-recorded piano track; the other three members came on individually and gradually added their own embellishments to the song. After this, the band broke into "Cherub Rock," the raucous first track from Siamese Dream and one of the high points of the concert.

For the second encore, the Pumpkins treated the crowd to "Drown," one of their first radio successes; the song can be found on the Singles soundtrack. Corgan walked around the edge of the stage, shaking hands and waving, before closing the show for good.

too long for an evening of short theater. Written by Eric Berlin, the one act was absolutely brutal in length and chronology. Each scene simply rehashed the action that had just taken place in the previous scene and the dialogue was pointless.

Jay Rodger's direction was solid, however, and carried a cast of considerable talent in a piece made unfortunate mostly because of its script. Jeff Steele, as Charlie, a friendly, babbling drunk has an obvious knack for the stage, but might have been better off with a less predictable depiction of his character (i.e. flailing arms, constant, dizzied pacing). Rob Killeen and Fred Miles Prince, Jr. as Benny and Alan respectively were also as strong as actors in such fruitless rules can be. Melissa Sara Fendell as Diane also deserves recognition for her work.

The major question that plagued me after the one acts finally ended was, simply, "why?" In the boundless library of short plays one has to wonder what course of reason allows bad plays like Women and Wallace and The Line That's Picked Up 1,000 Babes to be produced at all. The unraditional setting also negatively affected the tenor of the evening and, if better pieces had been selected and performed in a more appropriate venue, I trust that the artistic teams and cast members could have carried a much more enjoyable evening of theatre.

Knicks v. Heat; Injuries, home court will reign

David Rose on the NBA

The NBA playoffs move into their fifth month of action with five of the eight first round series yet to be decided. However, one series is set and it will pit the two teams that have the best rivalry in the NBA in recent years.

The New York Knicks and the Miami Heat will square off for the fourth consecutive year in the Eastern Conference Playoffs with a lot of history on the side of these two heated rivals.

It all started after the 1994-95 season when Heat head coach Pat Riley left New York for the sunshine state, a move that still has Riley viewed as a villain in the Big Apple.

Though that move was a small step in the rivalry's beginning, this rivalry ultimately started in game five of the 1997 playoffs. That is when Miami's P.J. Brown made like Warren Sapp and flipped New York's Charlie Ward like he was yesterday's newspaper. That move sent players like Patrick Ewing and John Starks to suspension for leaving the bench. Then it was Tim Hardaway's 39 points in game seven that sent the Knicks home for the summer.

The Knicks and Heat met again in the first round of the 1998 playoffs. The Knicks were without the services of Ewing who had broken his right wrist in a game against Milwaukee earlier that year. In game four at Madison Square Garden, after the Knicks had sealed away a win that would send the series to a game five in Miami, a fight broke out that lasted longer than the one between Lennox Lewis and Michael Grant on Saturday night.

With three seconds left former Charlotte Hornets teammates Larry Johnson and Alonzo Mourning started throwing punches at one another. When Knicks coach Jeff Van Gundy stepped in to separate the two combatants, he was literally stepped on by Mourning as he turned into "the heaviest ankle weight in modern history."

That fight led to both players being suspended for game five and it was the Knicks who took advantage of the loss of Mourning as they ran all over the Heat 98-81 in the deciding game.

Then came last season and for the third straight year these two teams met in the playoffs. That season saw both teams going in completely opposite directions. The Heat collected a 33-17 record in the shortened season and had earned the first number one seed in franchise history.

On the other hand, the Knicks literally limped into the playoffs after holding off Toronto for the eighth playoff spot. They had traded Starks, who was a fan favorite, and had gotten Larrell Sprewell, a player who was better known for doing something with his hands other than playing basketball. Ewing was playing with a sprained Achilles tendon and Marcus Camby had been a 40 million dollar bench warmer for most of the season. However, the playoffs were an entirely different story.

The Knicks would have a chance to win the series in the final five seconds. That is when Allan Houston hit the runner in the lane that bounced off the front of the rim, off the backboard and turned off the Heat in Miami with eight tenths of a second left.

Now, these two meet again in the playoffs. This season the Heat took three out of four from New York. The last game between the two teams produced a 95-94 overtime thriller on April 9 that was won by the Heat on Hardaway's three-point fling as the buzzer.

However, there are two main reasons for this rivalry. The first is that these two teams do not like each other. Ever since the Brown-Ward incident in 1997, these two teams have made no bones about their dislike. The fact that Riley is still coaching the Heat makes him public enemy number one for Knicks' fans.

The second and most important reason is that neither of these groups of players has won a NBA title. The Knicks were in the Finals twice in the 1990s but lost on both occasions. The Heat has made the Eastern Conference Finals just once under Riley. Both teams know that time is running out on a chance to win a title. Also, both teams know that win a title, they have to go through each other, literally.

This series will come down to the Heat's ability to win on their home-court. Over the past two playoff series with New York, the Heat are just 2-4 at home, including losing both game fives on their home floor. The Heat were able to hold serve against Detroit and aced them out in three straight.

They have to establish their home court dominance right from the start of the series.

However, whenever the Heat sees a team with the word Knicks on their jerseys, they start shaking like a booty hunter's backside. Even though Miami won the season series, the playoffs have been a different routine altogether. The Knicks have taken two of the past three series and If they did not lose Ewing and Starks to suspension, they would be perfect versus the Heat. The loss of Hardaway will be the biggest factor in this series and I see the Knicks taking advantage of it and putting away the Heat in six games.

included a six-game stretch at the end of the season where UMass never reached the 10-goal plateau. After compiling a 3-3 record through the first six, the Minutemen collapsed, going 1-5 to close the year out.

Cannella then recruited Leveille to jumpstart an ailing attack, so much that he wasted little time inserting the youngster into the starting lineup. His first opponent was No. 13 Hofstra in the season opener and, to say the least, Leveille fit his freshman billing. He was missing passes and, more importantly, wavering at the opportunity to score.

"It was exciting. I felt a lot of responsibility starting the first game," Leveille said.

So much responsibility that it started taking its toll on the freshman. With everything coming so easily in high school, Leveille was brought in to score, and score he couldn't. He made "freshman mistakes" and his confidence suffered a severe decline in the season's opening weeks. The pressure of competing in big-time collegiate lacrosse had gotten to him. Following the 10-7 loss to Hofstra, where Leveille went scoreless, Cannella pulled him from the starting lineup.

"We thought we'd take a little pressure off of him," Cannella said. "He felt like he was letting his team down, so we took a little bit of the heat off."

Even still, it took six games for Leveille to hit paydirt. Taking a pass from Alex Racioppi, Leveille gunned a shot from 15 feet out on the left wing, beating Boston College goaltender Tom Gallagher high.

"It definitely lifted a lot of pressure right off of my shoulders," Leveille said. "It was a big goal for me."

After a two-game drought following the 17-5 victory over the Eagles in Chestnut Hill, Leveille, more or less, started laying the first bricks for the career that many had anticipated. He scored two against Loyola and an even more important goal in a 10-9 win over Harvard. Then against No. 2 Syracuse on Saturday, he tallied a pair of goals while adding an assist.

The triumph over the 13th-ranked Crimson changed the perspective for coach Cannella. Rather than set plays, he used formations, allowing his players to create on offense. Leveille and the rest of the Minutemen had received the green light to roam and drive and use their imagination. They faced one of collegiate lacrosse's finest netminders, Keith Cynar, and sunk Harvard with an overwhelming 46-22 advantage in the shot category.

As Cannella released the hounds, the Minutemen beat Harvard and then gave fifth-ranked Georgetown a run in the nation's capital. While the formula was less successful against the Orangemen, the pace has skyrocketed and, after a mid-season swoon, the fun has returned. In turn, Leveille's game has come to him.

"I've learned a lot," Leveille said. "I've found my comfort level and it should only get better from here on out."

He's beginning to fire shots without any hesitation, creating for both himself and his teammates. He's found his role in the lineup, his spot in the equation. For a while, he was puzzled, but with experience, he has discovered his calling.

"He's a very unselfish kid and at times that's hurt him a little bit," Cannella said, "but that unselfishness with carry him a long way in his career."

DiNola knew all along.

"He was a fearless competitor. He's got tremendous hands, a great feel for the game and great vision," DiNola said. "He's the type of kid that's two to three passes ahead. He sees plays unfolding."

The upside is immeasureable. At such an early stage in his career, Leveille has planted the first blocks for what the Amherst faithful anticipate to be a remarkable career in a Maroon and White uniform. Demands set for the youngster have rarely gone unsatisfied.

"Our expectations are very high and I'm sure Kevin's are also," Cannella said. "It's all about confidence for our younger players. Fortunately, he's regained the confidence that he had last year.

"I just want to help the team in every way I can, whether it be a big role or a smaller role," Leveille said.

It may be small now, but it's growing. Gradually, Leveille is expected to elevate his game so much as to challenge the all-time mark at UMass for points. Certainly a tall order, but defying the odds has been like clockwork for this kid.

"But we also hit the bar a lot. Their shots seemed to bar-in, while ours seemed to bar-out."

The luck of both the keeper and her team ran out in the fourth quarter, however, as Sinkwich dislocated her left shoulder blocking a shot and was forced to play out the remainder of the game with seriously limited mobility. The Tigers seemed to key on this turn of events, as Princeton's Katherine Kinmiller socked home the game winner and the Tigers added one insurance goal with both shots coming from the left side.

Hupp and Grogan earned first team All-Tournament nods for their efforts on the weekend, while Sinkwich (44 saves on the weekend) and Clement landed on the second team. With its second place Eastern finish, UMass qualified for the Collegiate National Championship at Indianapolis and Bloomington, Ind. On May 5-7.

continued his maturing process. The freshman, after starting his first collegiate game against Hofstra [UMass' first game of the season] was then relinquished to the role as a substitute. Throughout his battles this season the Delmar, NY native has improved. For his efforts he has tallied 13 points (8 goals, 5 assists) including a two-goal performance at Syracuse.

Following suit has been the emergence of midfielder Alex Racioppi. The junior has scorched opponents for 18 goals and two assists with most of the points being scored in the last three UMass games, a stretch that included a seven-goal outburst against the Hoyas. His recent scoring barrage has moved Racioppi into a tie for fourth place on the UMass team for total points.

But with all the emphasis being put on the offense, there is one thing that the Minutemen can ill-afford to do. Lose concentration on the defensive side of the ball. The usually stingy UMass defense has give up 36 goals in the last two games.

The opening faceoff at Richard F. Garber Field is scheduled for 3:00 p.m.

Buckley. Buckley is pacing the team with a .355 average, along with eight homeruns and 29 runs batted in. Batting behind Buckley is sophomore Ryan Finn. Finn is batting a healthy .351, along with a team leading 11 homeruns and 35 RBI.

On the mound, the Saints top three pitchers all carry records of .500. Dale Szachewicz has a record of 1-1 to go with a 3.53 ERA. Dave Fields and Dave Pabucki both stand at 4-4, each with an ERA slightly over 5.00.

The first pitch of today's game is scheduled to be thrown out at 3:00 p.m.

game, all of the seniors started, which gave some role players a chance at some playing time, according to Ingraffea, who had a goal and an assist in the game.

"A lot of players got in to play," she said.

Jami Wilus, of LaSalle also had a hat trick, and Block stopped 9 shots before being replaced by back up keeper Erin Hogan, who had four saves.

UMass pelted the Explorer's net tenders with 33 shots, while LaSalle tossed 26 in UMass' direction.

The teams were even when picking up ground balls, with the Minutewomen nabbing 28 and the Explorers snatching up 26.

Of the games twents draw contests, the Maroon and White won 14, and LaSalle took 6.

The win puts the Minutewomen at 8-7 overall, with a 5-1 A-10 record. LaSalle drops it second straight and falls to 3-12, with a 1-5 league record.

UMass will go into this weekend's A-10 tournament in a three-way tie for first place, and seeded second behind Virginia Tech.

The Maroon and White will face off against the Hokies on Saturday at 2:30 p.m. at Totman Field. The winner will play the winner of Saturday's noon game, between Temple and Duquesne, on Sunday, at 1:00 p.m.

Virginia Tech took the A-10 championship last year, defeating the Minutewomen in the first round and taking out Temple in the finals.

DAN SANTELLI - COLLEGIAN

Sophomore second baseman Ashley Bakken had an outstanding weekend from the field and the plate during four conference games. When UMass hosts Boston College today at 3:00 p.m. for a doubleheader, she will look to top her two-hit performance in Sunday's 2-0 win against Dayton.

UMass can't solve Princeton in Eastern Championship war

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

In the jungles of this year's Eastern Championship, the hunters did indeed become the hunted. And in the end, it was the animal instinct of the Tigers that prevailed.

The No. 13 Massachusetts women's water polo team put together a solid run at this year's Collegiate Water Polo Association (CWPA) Eastern Championships in Princeton, but came up just short in its title defense by losing 6-4 to the host Tigers in Sunday's final. The Minutewomen toppled Slippery Rock 16-4 on Friday in tourney-opening action, then torched Iona 16-1 and held off Harvard 8-4 in Saturday's semifinal to set up the battle with Princeton.

"The team came out and played some of our best water polo of the year," said All-American Katie Grogan. "We played at the level we should be at this time of the season."

Wary of stumbling over Slippery Rock in their initial game, the Minutewomen came out strong and pushed themselves out to an early 3-0 lead behind the scoring heroics of seniors Grogan, Marcel Hupp and Claudia Clement. All-American Hupp wasted no time in exploiting the Slippery Rock defense, rifling home a goal on the very first Maroon and White possession. Co-captains Grogan and Clement added scores of their own to pad the early UMass cushion.

Up 9-1 at halftime, the Minutewomen went into cruise control over the game's final 14 minutes behind a fantastic display of total-team defense. Clement and Grogan stifled the Slippery Rock attack with four steals apiece, and sophomore goalkeeping sensation Dana Sinkwich erased any uncertainty about the outcome with nine saves.

"We didn't know anything about Slippery Rock coming in," Sinkwich said. "So we tried to take each game one-at-a-time and not look down on anyone."

Next on the menu for the title-hungry Minutewomen was Iona, which learned the hard way the misfortune of facing the hungry UMass defense first thing in the morning (the teams swam off at 8:30 a.m.). Sinkwich and company kept Iona off the board completely for the entire first half, and Coach Dan McOsker saw fit to save his star keeper's strength by replacing her with backup Megan Thompson after Sinkwich's sixth save.

"Both our offense and our defense played very well against Iona," Sinkwich said. "But they just weren't that strong of a team."

Thompson filled in between the bars with style in the second half, stopping four shots and allowing a lone goal. The UMass offensive fireworks came courtesy of eight different players, led by Freshman Mattie Newell's four goal-showcase and a hat trick from Clement.

The Maroon and White then turned its focus toward No. 18 Harvard, which had rolled through its round-robin bracket and won a date with the defending champs. After dispatching two less-established programs in their first two games, the Minutewomen regarded their showdown with the ranked Crimson as a serious step up in their quest for the Eastern crown.

"After those first games, Harvard was kind of like the real start of the tournament for us," said Sinkwich, who tied her own UMass single-game record with 16 saves versus the Crimson. "Although we kept our focus, we knew that Harvard and Princeton were the real competition for the weekend."

UMass certainly rose to the challenge put forth by the Crimson, as a flurry of unanswered first-half goals gave the Minutewomen a 4-0 lead at the break. Four more Maroon and White goals over the course of the third quarter gave the UMass defense an even better chance to kick down on Harvard.

"We played great defense and took it to [Harvard]," McOsker said. "Dana Sinkwich was the backbone of our defense, and our bench stepped up to make this win a total team effort."

The Crimson managed two third quarter scores and another pair of goals in the final frame off 4-meter penalty shots, but it wasn't enough to overcome the UMass attack. Grogan paced the Minutewomen by denting the Harvard net three times, while Clement's two goals and one score each from Hupp, Anne Dettloff and Laurie Edwards were enough to propel UMass into the final.

Having come up empty in a pair of regular-season battles with the Tigers, the Maroon and White needed little motivation as it took to the water to defend its Eastern crown on Sunday. Regardless, the tension level between the two teams reached a fever pitch as the players exchanged glares during pregame warm-ups.

"We were all really pumped up to play Princeton," Sinkwich said. "They were giving us dirty looks, and that got us even more pumped up."

Once the action started, it was clear that this was indeed a battle of water polo heavyweights both intent on laying claim to Eastern gold. The Tigers drew first blood with the only goal of the first quarter and by the end of the third, 21 minutes of furious play left the Minutewomen and the Tigers in a 3-3 deadlock.

"We played really well against Princeton; we shot the ball really well and had a lot of movement," Grogan said.

Senior Marci Hupp scored seven goals over the course of this weekend's tournament, but it was not enough to propel the Minutewomen to victory.

Highly-touted freshman starting to stand and deliver for UMass

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Albany Academy boy's lacrosse coach Gary DiNola knew from the beginning.

He had himself a winner.

Taking over a growing program in upstate New York five years ago, DiNola took his son and a few runts with him around the region, with hopes of at least competing in the New England prep school circuit.

His kids were 14 years old, facing top Division I squads with young adults that might still be more concerned with pimples and algebra than dodging and shot selection. As they took the field, one might have chuckled, noticing the overwhelming size differential, with skinny-legged twerps throwing their bodies around against next year's NCAA impact freshmen.

DiNola and company might have taken their bumps early, as one might expect, but they still picked up their share of victories. At his side was raw talent that only needed to be touched up.

Four years later, he had himself one of the top programs in the country, a nine-player senior class that had gone 58-9 in its days at the Academy, taking home two undefeated league championships and two section championships. Ranked second in New England and 15th in the country, the Cadets were led by a humble yet ferocious attacknan named Kevin Leveille.

It was Leveille who, with DiNola's son Dusty, that carried the load – the young DiNola on the passing end, and Leveille in the scoring column.

"I knew the first time I saw him touch the ball," DiNola said. "As a freshman [Kevin] would affect outcomes against top teams in the country. We were going head-to-head against marquee Division I players at age 14."

By career's end, his numbers were simply obscene.

Obscene.

For four years, Kevin Leveille had his way on the lacrosse field. Everything came easy. It wasn't matter of if, but rather, a matter of when the Delmar, NY native found the back of the net, a matter of when he felt like scoring.

The Leveille-led Cadets went to all corners of New England to go about their business, hammering away at the likes of Loomis and Hotchkiss en route to All-America honors as a senior. In his final year at the Academy, Leveille scorched the nets for 78 goals and 25 assists, closing out his career as the region's all-time leading scorer, compiling 396 points.

"I told [UMass head coach Greg] Cannella that Kevin's game was ahead of him, that he would only get better," DiNola said.

Much prior to his senior charade, though, UMass head coach Greg Cannella had his mind made up. Having met Leveille as a sophomore, he was immediately lured in by his all-aroundedness as a player and as a person.

"He was always able to play up and that tells you a lot about someone, not only in his ability, but in how he plays and how he is as a person," Cannella said. "He's very humble and has a great family. He's been around lacrosse people all his life."

His days of dominance – at least for now – are over. The transition has been difficult for the 5-foot-8, 165-pounder. Players move quicker, the game itself a few gears higher than his days at Albany Academy. The offensive sets and formations have put the freshman in a position to perform immediately, this for a squad who has struggled scoring in the past. The workload has put tremendous weight on Leveille's shoulders, having started in his first-ever collegiate game. Twelve games later, the adaptation is evident and those in Amherst are beginning to get that feeling, the feeling that all the hype came for a reason.

In late February, the Minutemen cut the ribbon to open the 2000 season. With it came an undersized attackman whose reputation preceded his arrival. He might get lost in the crowd every now and again, weaving in and out of some of lacrosse's finest, but the statistics people were paying attention to weren't regarding his stature.

The bottom line was that Leveille could score, and more importantly, score for a team whose attack had curled up into a ball in a miserable 1999 campaign. A 4-8 record dealt a severe blow to one of New England's finest lacrosse legacies, and as a result, UMass was forced to relocate and to rebuild. After all, the Minutemen hadn't suffered a losing season since the Reagan campaign (6-8 in 1985).

The scapegoat was indeed the offense, or lack thereof, in the fold for Cannella. In 12 games played, the Maroon and White reach double digits just three times. This

Rutgers storms Garber for ECAC finale

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

The road for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has had its bumps this season. The Minutemen have battled the nation's best and fought valiantly, but do in large part to one of the country's toughest schedules their record is deceiving.

UMass [5-7, 1-4 Eastern College Athletic Conference] has two games remaining on the schedule. Two games that could bring their record even with wins. Two games at home. Two games that could instill confidence in a team that will return several key players.

The first task comes today when the Maroon and White take on ECAC foe Rutgers. The Scarlet Knights [3-9, 1-4 ECAC] are coming off a loss to No. 4 Georgetown in New Brunswick, 14-9 on Saturday. Rutgers played the Hoyas tough, but in the end were outclassed by the GU.

Two weeks ago the Minutemen lost a heartbreaker to G'Town 19-18 in a game that saw UMass have a chance to tie the game late in the contest, but came up just short as a too many men on the field infraction silenced the idea of an upset.

Of course being from the same conference there are many common opponents. Both teams have just one win in the newly developed ECAC, both teams have beat Stony Brook. Rutgers took down the Seawolves by a score of 13-10, while the Maroon and White dominated the laxsters from Long Island, 17-4.

Despite the Scarlet Knights' 3-9 record they've done battle with some of nation's best as well. They have faced No. 1 Virginia and came away with a 17-8 loss; No. 2 Syracuse defeated them 16-8; No. 4 Princeton, who took them down by a count of 15-5; and the aforementioned defeat at the hands of Georgetown.

UMass is coming a sub-par performance on Saturday in which they were defeated by the Orangemen 17-7 at the Carrier Dome. In the contest the 'Cuse came out storming and never looked back jumping out to a 5-1 lead within the first five minutes and it was smooth sailing from there as the Maroon and White were never able to forge a comeback.

The game was not all negative for the Minutemen as Kevin Leveille

Women's lax explores options

Massachusetts's women's lacrosse won their final game of the regular season Sunday, when they nearly tripled up LaSalle.

Senior midfielders Noelle Gorski and Stephanie Pavlick each tallied three times in the game, to help put the Explorers away, 14-6.

Gorski started the Minutewomen off early in the first half, with an unassisted goal. Pavlick followed the trend, posting her own unassisted goal soon after.

UMass	14

LaSalle cut the Maroon and White's lead in half, but junior attacker Fay Naber put the Minutewomen up 3-1, as she scored off a pass from junior midfielder Rachel Ingraffea, whose goal made the score 4-1 in UMass' favor.

As the first half ran out, the Explorers put two more goals past UMass junior goaltender. Jen Nardi, who had 14 saves in the game.

With two minutes left and the score close at 4-3, UMass stepped it up, as Gorski scored her second and third goals of the game, and freshman midfielder Lydia Robinson followed suit, putting the sphere between the pipes as well.

UMass came into the second half swinging, riding on the wave of their 7-3-half time lead.

Naber put up her second tally of the game, and junior midfielder Denise Brey also put the biscuit in the basket in the second half.

Senior attacker Katie Carey contributed a goal, and another senior, Melissa Miele, came up from her defensive position to toss one past the goalie, Lindsay Block.

Freshman Leslie Pollock tossed her second goal of the season into the net, and Pavlick scratched two more points on the board, her 29th and 30th of the year.

LaSalle was able to put only one more goal up in the second half.

Nardi had 14 saves in the game before freshman Cyndi Doyle took over the net keeping responsibilities, allowing the top A-10 league tender some rest before the finals next week.

Doyle had two saves during her time in the net.

Saints visit Lorden after UMass loss

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

After gaining important ground in the Atlantic 10 conference with a pair of wins against Rhode Island on Saturday, the Massachusetts baseball team took a small step back on Sunday, losing the third game of the weekend series 2-1.

The Minutemen (20-16-1 overall, 8-6-1 A-10) struggled with offense all weekend, scoring three runs in each of the games on Saturday, and only one in the loss on Sunday. Although they managed to steal two wins, the lack of output caught up with them in the third game.

"Their pitcher [junior Jon Scullin] did a pretty good job on Sunday," said head coach Mike Stone. "We just didn't have quality at bats. The wind knocked a few back that could have traveled farther; it was a tough day to bat for both teams."

UMass picked up its only run of the game in the top of the first inning. Sophomore Mike Kulak got the ball rolling when he singled with one out to reach base. Kulak stole second, and advanced to third on a ground out to second by junior Nick Gorneault. Sophomore Chris Morgan walked, and then stole second. Kulak took advantage of the situation by stealing home, giving UMass their only lead of the game.

The Rams did their damage in the bottom of the sixth inning, scoring two runs to take the lead for good. With two outs, Scullin doubled to put the Rams in scoring position. Junior Ryan Cooney doubled in the next at bat, driving home Scullin to knot the game at one. Rudy Bulgar followed up the Cooney double with one of his own, the third consecutive extra base hit of the inning. Cooney crossed home plate, giving the Rams their second and final run of the game.

UMass	1

Sophomore Brian Hourigan took the loss despite another strong pitching performance, going the distance while allowing just six hits. Stone stressed the importance of Hourigan's performance, as well as those of Travis Veracka and Craig Szado on Saturday.

"He pitched well enough to win," said Stone. "We had opportunities to win the game. [Craig and Travis], they were big on Saturday. We need pitching performances like that all the time. We need the offense too."

The Minutemen are back in action this afternoon as the Siena Saints visit Earl Lorden Field. Siena enters the contest 10 games under .500 at 14-24, an unimpressive record on paper that still has Stone and his team throwing caution to the wind.

"They're a good team, tough to play," said Stone. "I expect it to be a hard game."

Heading to the mound for UMass will be junior Nick Skirkanich. Skirkanich, who has been a force coming out of the bullpen, has compiled a 3-2 record this season, coupled with a 3.89 ERA. Skirkanich will have to translate his success in the later innings into a complete game effort.

The Minutemen will need the same thing from their offense. Gorneault has been swinging the bat well, raising his average to .306 while maintaining his homerun lead with six. The bat of Aaron Senez has come to life as well, with his .333 average good enough for second on the team. His sharp defense at the corner has also been an invaluable asset.

The Saints have five players hitting over .300, including sophomore Jim

Former political prisoner speaks out

By Joseph Collins
Collegian Staff

"Anti-imperialist ex-political prisoner lesbian, activist, artist, and all-around good person" Laura Whitehorn spoke last night as part of the class Economics 397A: The Culture and Economic of U.S. Prisons. The event, sponsored by the Western Mass Resistance Coalition, The Prison Book Project, Students for a Sensible Drug Policy, and Food For Thought Books, took place in 106 Thompson Hall of the University of Massachusetts at 6:30 p.m.

Laura Whitehorn has been active in civil right struggles since the 1960s, supporting the Black Panther Party, the Black Liberation Movements and the New Afrikan Independence Movement. She has also been involved in fighting the Klu Klux Klan along with other organized white supremacy groups and has supported Native American and Puerto Rican struggle for sovereignty along with fighting for the liberation of women, gays and lesbians.

In the 1970s, she helped to organize a network of white anti-racists to aid black families in Boston during the anti-busing offensive. Among other accomplishments, she helped found the Boston/Cambridge Women's School, she helped to expose the illegal COINTELPRO (Counter Intelligence Program) of the FBI, and has been a member of the John Brown Anti-Klan Committee and the Madame Binh Graphics Collective.

In 1985 she was arrested and charged with, "conspiracy to oppose, protest and change the policies and practices of the United States government in domestic and international matters by violence and illegal means," as part of the Resistance Conspiracy Case. She was released from prison in August of 1999.

Her arrest resulted from her involvement in eight bombings that were specifically placed at locations such as military bases and navy computer centers, which were in response to U.S. involvement in suppressing Central American revolutionary movements, the South African Counselate, which was bombed in response to apartheid, and an Israeli aircraft industry which was bombed in response to Israel's refusal to cede back Palestinian lands. The final bombing that she and her six accomplices were involved in took place at Police Benevolent Association.

Ms. Whitehorn beamed upon saying this, explaining that this association has supported such police actions as the shooting to death of the 60-year-old African-American grandmother Eleanor Bumpers. Her house was stormed for failure to pay two months of her rent, and upon entering they found her in the kitchen with a knife. After the shooting, they dragged her "half-naked body" into the street. Laura Whitehorn stressed that there were no injuries in any of the bombings she was involved in because they were carefully planned out.

She responded to a question about her time in prison with, "it's hell... what can I say," continuing with an explanation that, "it was degrading and dehumanizing [to not be] allowed to defend your own body."

She also stated, "These 10 months [since I have been released] have been about learning to be an adult again."

Speaking to the attendees, she focused her talk on what a political prisoner is and personal stories about

Police prepare for busiest weekends

By Daniel Ruetenik
Collegian Staff

Campus life has been fairly calm for the University of Massachusetts Police Department (UMPD) in the past few weeks, but police are gearing up for the next two weekends, which have traditionally been the most hectic times of the school year. In the past week, among other things, the UMPD executed a search warrant on a student's room in John Adams Dorm, arresting a Kennedy Dorm resident for drug possession and receiving stolen property.

The UMPD also responded to a noise complaint and received a report that several individuals had destroyed several items in a bathroom in John Quincy Adams Dorm. Also in campus news, the Emergency Health and Safety department apprehended a fugitive hamster in Mackimmie Dorm.

Police Roundup

On Saturday, April 29, police were called into Kennedy Dorm for a noise complaint. While talking with Patrick C. Fell, Police observed a pipe containing marijuana residue and stolen property worth over $250. The stolen property consisted of several signs, one being a restroom sign and one being a sign stolen from the Delta Kal fraternity. Police also observed alcohol in plain view and asked Fell for identification. Fell presented a false or stolen license to police.

Fell is being charged with possession of a class D substance, receiving stolen property worth over $250 and possession or use of a false or stolen RMV document.

On Sunday, April 30, at 8:21 a.m., UMPD officers executed a search warrant on Eric J. Rocha's dorm room. Rocha, a 21-year-old junior from Fall River, is being charged with possession of a class B substance with intent to distribute, and possession or use of a false or stolen RMV document.

Police are not releasing any further information including what drug specifically and what amount of the drug Rocha was caught with and what information was used to obtain the warrant due to on ongoing investigation.

According to Massachusetts General laws, the drugs included in the class B category are opium, cocaine or any derivative of them, along with LSD, MDMA (ecstasy) or any amphetamines or methamphetamines.

Also on Sunday, a resident of John Quincy Adams Dorm reported that a bathroom had been vandalized. A large mirror had been smashed and the hand soap dispensers had been ripped off of the walls. The witness allegedly saw some individuals leave the bathroom and enter into a room. The individuals suspected to be responsible for the incident have been identified and housing services has been notified. Future court action is pending.

On Monday, May 1, police received a report of a large rat in Mackimmie Dorm. EH&S was dispatched to apprehend the house rodent. The suspected animal was captured and identified as a hamster. The owner was located and the animal was subsequently returned to its rightful location.

Barbara O'Connor, Deputy Chief of police at UMass, said that the next two weekends are generally the weekends with the highest rate of alcohol related incidents for the school year. Although the UMPD does not have alcohol stings, they will be strictly enforcing the University's alcohol policies.

O'Connor said, "The reason we enforce alcohol is because we know that alcohol adds to the problems."

Massachusetts state law does not allow underage persons to transport or consume alcohol and anyone caught doing so is subject to arrest and prosecution.

BDIC to host Spring Project Festival tonight

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

Tonight at 5:30 p.m., the Spring Project Festival will take place in Goodell Hall, room 608. The first Annual Festival is sponsored by the BDIC program (Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration Program) and will also feature BDIC graduates talking about their experiences in the job market.

The festival is put on in conjunction with the BDIC 496Y course, which is the BDIC's Junior Year Writing class. The students in these classes work on the semester-long projects specifically designed to coincide with their individual concentrations, and tomorrow night, they will be presented in roundtable format.

According to Linda Roney, director of the BDIC office, the festival is associated with senior research, and is meant as an introduction to that line of coursework. This is the first year that BDIC is allowing students to showcase their work publicly.

Roney said, "We're doing it so students can enjoy the fruits of their labor." She explained that prior to this year, there was no way for students to share their work and that there was no gathering among them.

The festival will be moderated by various BDIC faculty members who will introduce each roundtable discussion before the undergraduate students make their presentations. Their research topics include Film Studies, during which actual student films will be shown; Concert; Current Issues in Public Health; Environmental and Urban Policy; the Internet; Alternative Approaches to Learning and Health; Business; Music; Perspective and Art – Writing and Architecture.

Between, ten and fifteen BDIC graduates will also be on hand to give advice to this year's class, Roney explained. "Alumni will be there to say... this is how I made my connections." She added that it was encouraging for current students to talk to people who have recently succeeded in their chosen fields.

Any student can decide to become a BDIC major, but the requirements are strict and students cannot declare BDIC as a major until their sophomore years. In order to graduate, students must take 12 courses or 36 credits in 300-level or above courses, and must remain in the BDIC program for four consecutive semesters. Courses are generally selected from two major areas of interest with two different advisors assigned to help each BDIC student.

Roney said that the BDIC program has been very successful and commented that the BDIC office receives much e-mail from many high-school students who are coming to UMass just to create their own majors. She added, "I think more and more people know about it [BDIC]."

Roney said the entire campus is invited to tonight's event, which is free and open to the public. She explained that the festival might be a good way for students who are still undecided about a major to see the possibilities that are open to them.

Roney concluded, "I want it to be an annual event, because I really think it will be beneficial for the entire campus."

GOP presidential candidate Keyes speaks on morality

By Ian A. Palko
The Hoya (Georgetown U.)

(U-WIRE) WASHINGTON – Republican presidential candidate and former Ambassador Alan L. Keyes spoke to a crowd of about 500 in Gaston Hall last Tuesday evening. The speech came during a campaign in which the Associate Press credited Keyes with two out of a possible 2,066 delegates for the Republican presidential nomination.

In the speech, Keyes outlined his views about morality in America focusing on the Declaration of Independence and abortion but speaking on many issues related to his campaign. The speech comes on the heels of recent Supreme Court arguments in a case involving partial-birth abortions.

Keyes opened his remarks by speaking on the end of this millennium and Georgetown University.

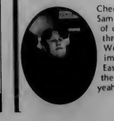
"It's one of the great symbols of our time that we live in such an era of egregious lies, that we have to lie about the end of the millennium," Keyes said, eluding to the many millennium celebrations that occurred this past year. He also expressed discontent having to "follow in the footsteps" of Larry Flynt, the publisher of Hustler Magazine, who spoke at Georgetown last year. He strongly disagreed with the speech Flynt gave last year and express his criticism saying that it was "an example of just how far gone we are." He said that allowing by allowing Flynt to come and speak when he last did last year, it undermined the credibility of the university as a Catholic institution.

Keyes called the 20th century "the worst century in the history of the human race," emphasizing that he felt America was in a moral crisis. "We have redefined freedom," he said, "so that it encompasses now the kind of licentiousness that can no longer distinguish between good and evil. And that kind of licentiousness is the death of freedom."

Much of the rest of his speech focused on the Declaration of Independence, and the outline of rights it offers. Keyes said the foundation of American government and beliefs rest on this platform, and advised the audience not to forget these principals. Keyes spoke little of his presidential campaign but did mention Senator John McCain. (R-Ariz.) Specifically, Keyes said he disliked some of McCain's foreign policy after the senator said he would have no problem toppling foreign governments, if necessary. Keyes joked that covert operations should not be announced.

During the second half of the speech Keyes commented on abortion and related it to his earlier discussion of the Declaration of Independence. But before moving to the issue of abortion, Keyes railed against President William J. Clinton (SFS '68) as an example of the immorality of the America. "This is a representative government," he said and continued by saying Clinton "represents who we are."

"The great and greatest evil," Keyes said, "that is perpetrated by abortion is, as the Pope has so wonderfully expressed, is not the killing of these human beings, it is the destruction of our moral soul."



Keyes continued, saying that the nation was founded upon the belief that there was a God, and the abortion issue and the moral issues pull the foundation from the nation. He questioned the idea of "abortion rights," as he said, because he believes the basis of those rights to be in the Declaration of Independence saying "if you have a right to abortion, you have turned your back on the principle that allows you to coin any rights at all."

UMass has million dollar grin

By Virginia Avedisian
Collegian Staff

Campaign UMass, the campaign to raise $125 million, enlist advocates and enhance the image of the University, has surpassed the $100 million mark.

Gordon N. Oakes Jr., treasurer of the campaign and a member of the campaign's cabinet, made the announcement. Oakes, a former chair of the UMass Board of Trustees, graduated from the University in 1963 and lives in Deerfield.

"When we announced this campaign in 1996, we thought it would take five years to reach our goal of $125 million," Oakes said. "I speculate are now that the campaign's goal will be reached by the end of December, one year ahead of schedule."

According to the latest tabulations, the campaign has raised more than $57.9 million for initiatives in the campus's 10 schools and colleges, and $18.3 million for facilities and equipment, including a planned new wing of the Isenberg School of Management.

Donors have also contributed $12.4 million for faculty and staff support purposes and $8.5 million for aid to students. The remaining contributions include more than $700,000 for campus libraries and $2.3 million in unrestricted gifts.

When broken down by schools and colleges, the College of Engineering has received the most money, with contributions exceeding $18.7 million. Donors have contributed $15.8 million to the Isenberg School and $12.1 million to the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics. Some $6 million has been donated to athletics.

According to Oakes, campaign donations come in many different forms, including pledges, cash, corporate and foundation grants and gifts in kind, such as software, books and equipment.

Of the money raised to date, $58.3 millions is being directly channeled to the campus, while the remaining $42.1 million has been placed in endowment and similar funds administered by the University of Massachusetts Foundation, Inc. Oakes said that generally, endowment funds are invested and five percent of the earnings are used to support specified campus programs and scholarship funds.

Oakes also said that University employees have played an important role in the campaign. He said 1,867 staff and faculty have committed $4.5 million, with $2.2 already received.

Airport scare causes delays

By Alan Sipress
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON – Fears that someone had slipped a handgun past an airport X-ray machine prompted police Monday to evacuate about 1,000 passengers from one of five piers at Baltimore-Washington International Airport and delay nine flights.

Airport officials reopened Pier C, which houses 16 gates, after a search by police and specially trained dogs determined the alarm was false. By the time that travelers were screened a second time and allowed to return to the gates, nearly four hours had elapsed.

While airport and federal aviation officials called such evacuations uncommon, they said the incident was not unprecedented and had been properly handled by police at BWI. "They have to err on the side of caution," said Rebecca Trexler, spokeswoman for the Federal Aviation Administration.

At 7:45 a.m., a security officer watching the monitor on one of four X-ray machines at the entrance to the pier spotted what appeared to be the silhouette of a handgun in a carry-on bag passing along the conveyor belt, according to BWI spokeswoman Betsey Sampere. Following standard procedure, the officer pulled the suspect bag aside and summoned a super-

Feng Shui old method on finding new home

By Jennifer Oldham
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES – Nerissa Rosete fell in love with a pricey South Orange County home, especially its impressive view of the Saddleback Mountains. She entered escrow, putting $20,000 down.

But she walked away from the deal, losing half her down payment, after a consultant noted the way the backyard steeply dropped off to meet Interstate 5. It was, he warned her, bad "feng shui"– The receding yard would prompt energy to rush out of the home.

Once again, the 3,000-year-old Chinese practice of feng shui, which teaches manipulation of one's physical surroundings to bring about balance and success, had shaken up a real estate deal.

Nearly every real estate office in Southern California seems to have a tale about how buyers or sellers, including a large proportion of non-Chinese, have made surprising compromises in pursuit of good feng shui.

One sign is the rapidly growing field of feng shui consulting. Other signals include transactions such as Rosete's that are falling through when a consultant vetoes a home. Some deals are taking longer to close because of buyer demands for a feng shui inspection. Some feng shui consultants are issuing certificates that sellers can use to prove a home's worthiness.

A number of resentful real estate agents find this all too much. "A bunch of baloney," sneers one in Beverly Hills. Like others, he asks for anonymity, aware that his next buyer could insist on a feng shui-correct house. "I would definitely lose business if I were not trying to accommodate people and their concerns," he says.

The agents know that feng shui's rising popularity is propelled not only by an expanding pool of Asian home buyers but also by a growing acceptance of the practice among many age groups and ethnicities.

Feng shui has penetrated the public consciousness so much that it's nothing for Nordstrom department store to use the term in a TV ad. And a column that runs every other week in this newspaper's real estate section has given advice about the practice for more than a year.

Feng shui (pronounced "fung shway") translates as "wind and water." It teaches that remodeling, rearranging furniture or adding objects to an environment will reawaken positive energy, or "chi." Practitioners claim free-flowing chi helps people achieve prosperity, good health and happiness in life.

COURTESY PERRY RUDDLE / LOS ANGELES TIMES

"Feng shui" expert Angi Ma Wong, right, uses a compass to check placement of a door in a Los Angeles home as, from left, owner Wendy Rees, Shannon Hardin and Rees' sister, Natasha Walsh, watch.

Feng shui consultants charge from $150 to a few thousand dollars an hour, usually spending at least several hours at a site. They enjoy a level of devotion from some buyers and sellers usually reserved for celebrated hairdressers or designers.

Even after Nerissa Rosete lost money pulling out of that home deal in Orange County's exclusive Nellie Gail Ranch, she relied on her consultant in choosing a second house with a sale price of about $900,000.

Her consultant warned her that the property, which was across the street from the first house, wasn't perfect either. The living room and the foyer would need to be extended to move the front door away from the stairwell. Energy loss was again the problem: Without the changes, it would escape down the stairs and out the doorway. The home's U shape also drew criticism: It meant the place was lacking a heart. Feng shui deems rectangular homes the ideal shape.

Rosete, a medical lab owner married to a veterinarian, approved the changes – even though they eventually cost her an extra $1.3 million.

"I didn't realize the remodel would cost that much," said Rosete, who said she became familiar with feng shui while growing up in the Philippines. "But it's worth it."

Rosete, like many feng shui adherents, believes good energy flow in her environment at home influences her success at work. "I think the house has backed us up a lot," she said. "I think if I hadn't redone the house I would have gone bankrupt."

Consultants say many Asians are willing to spend heavily to make a home conform to feng shui ideals. "But (most) Americans aren't ready to do that yet," said Suzee Miller, a feng shui design consultant in Irvine.

Some Western feng shui users are unnerved by the practice's intrusion into their private lives, saying they didn't feel comfortable in their own home after they moved things around on a practitioner's advice.

"I had my house feng shuied, but I moved everything back because I like my stuff where it is," said Sheida Hodge, an intercultural consultant who has written a book on feng shui for real estate agents.

One of the most notable tendencies among U.S.-born devotees of feng shui is to use it in an effort to jump-start stalled real estate transactions.

Gore attempts to derail Bush fiscal outlook

By Glenn Kessler
The Washington Post

The presidential campaign veered into a dense economic thicket yesterday.

The Gore campaign, seeking to buttress its claim that George W. Bush's tax cut and spending plans are fiscally irresponsible, issued a detailed analysis that suggested the Texas governor would either need to slash government spending or increase the size of the national debt if his proposals were enacted.

The Bush campaign countered with updated budget projections that assert the rapidly expanding economy in recent months has added enough revenue to federal coffers to boost the projected size of the government surplus by 33 percent over the next 10 years – to more than $4 trillion – enough to pay for the Republican's proposals.

The blizzard of charges and counter-charges often involves mind numbing interpretations of economic data and federal budget accounting, but it underscores a new imperative in this era of surplus politics: Both sides, while needing to demonstrate Innovation with a burst of tax and spending proposals, must convince voters that they also won't blow a hole in the budget and saddle the nation with a crippling debt.

Vice President Al Gore is eager to link Bush to the soaring deficits experienced under President Reagan and the governor's father. A Gore adviser, briefing reporters on the analysis Monday evening, repeatedly called the Bush campaign's projections "a new rosy scenario," the catchphrase used during the Reagan era to describe faulty economic analysis. Another adviser, speaking after the Bush campaign released its new analysis, dismissed it as "Alice in Wonderland economics."

For the Texas governor, the booming economy poses a hurdle because voters tend to reward the incumbent party during good economic times. But, as his staff's new budget projections suggest, it also presents an opportunity. The gusher of government revenue – if it continues – appear to easily accommodate a variety of tax cut and spending plans, though not, by the Gore camp's analysis, all of his proposals.

The situation is the exact opposite faced by the Clinton campaign in 1992, when staffers ignored worsening economic data that, after Clinton became president, made it impossible for him to keep his promise of a middle-class tax cut. With each quarter of good economic news, Bush could keep updating his forecast and even decide to expand the size of his tax cut or other proposals.

Gore has adopted President Clinton's pledge to eliminate the national debt by 2013 and has proposed $350 billion in tax cuts over 10 years, while Bush's tax cuts would reduce revenue by $1.3 trillion over the same period, according to a new analysis by the Joint Committee on Taxation, an arm of Congress. "The Gore camp realizes that its feet are planted on more solid ground on this issue and it is going to stomp its feet as much as possible," said Robert Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute and a former director of the Congressional Budget Office.

No matter who becomes president, economic circumstances are destined to change and every proposal will be altered by Congress before it is enacted into law. Both campaigns also acknowledged that voters are unlikely to sift through the detailed cost analyses. But officials said the public has grown more skeptical of politicians who promise the world without proof they can deliver.

"American voters have become more discerning about what candidates, especially presidential candidates, tell them," said one Bush adviser. "There is demand for a higher degree of accountability."

At this stage of the campaign, when few voters are focused on the election, let alone budget minutiae, this Bush strategist said the target audience is "opinion makers and independent, objective arbiters" who are best positioned to bestow a fiscal responsibility blessing.

Gore adviser Robert Shrum said voters may not memorize every line item, but there are "some large realities" the vice president hopes to drive home about his opponent. "When people find out" about Bush's large tax cut proposal "they will not like it," Shrum predicted. "They will worry about a return to deficits and a return to the economic conditions of the earlier Bush years."

Graduating with honors worth loss of sleep

By Kelly Woo
The Chronicle (Duke U.)

(U-WIRE) DURHAM, N.C. – In these last few days of school, many seniors have been toiling night and day to finish their honors theses on time. But was it worth the Herculean effort to receive distinction status on the graduation program?

"Towards the end, I was wondering if I would get it done at all," said Trinity senior Thomas Burns, a political science major. "I was hardly getting any sleep during the last four weeks, skipping class and all sorts of things."

However, he added that he was glad to have undertaken the endeavor. "Once I got into my topic it was pretty fun," said Burns, who wrote about ethnic conflict in Ireland. "It was a pity that I didn't have another semester to work on it more."

Graduating with distinction requires proof of academic achievement, faculty recommendations, the approval of the department, a substantial thesis of generally at least 50 pages and an oral defense. Every department in Trinity College and the Pratt School of Engineering has its own take on those basic requirements, and the process is highly individualized to the applicant and to the department.

"We take into account their general performance thus far in work they've done," said Ian Baucom, assistant professor of English, who coordinates the department's distinction program. "We want to have a sense of [their] facility for this kind of work."

Last year, 73 Trinity students and 31 engineering students graduated with distinction. Unlike Duke, some universities, such as Princeton, require their seniors to write a thesis.

Faculty and students said the honors thesis is an excellent research opportunity for those who want to attend graduate school. "I think for those students who are going to continue professionally in the sciences, writing a senior undergraduate thesis is just preparation for [the future]," said Ronald Grunwald, biology's associate director of undergraduate studies.

Trinity junior Isanne Gonzales, who was accepted into next year's English department's honors program, does not believe writing a thesis is necessary for graduate school – but that it is helpful. "I feel more prepared for the volume of writing and research that you'd have to do as a graduate student," said Gonzales, who plans on continuing her studies in English.

Faculty also noted that there is a large number of students who do independent studies, which also conclude with a large body of research and writing work but are not technically "honors." That difference probably stems from the stringent grade point average requirement associated with the honors label. "We are continually encouraging our students to consider independent studies that integrate research and writing," said Gary Ybarra, director of undergraduate studies for electrical and computer engineering. "There are plenty of students who do independent studies but do not do graduation with distinction."

Writing a senior thesis also requires plenty of time, which may turn off some students to the task. For Gonzales, however, the time commitment was not a factor, as she has already been involved in research on Shakespeare this year with English professor Joseph Porter. Next year, she is considering researching the play Othello. "You're usually involved in classes where you're writing and researching on topics you're given," she said. "This was a chance to research and write on something I was interested in."

visor, who told its owner to open it, she said. A search of the bag's contents, however, produced no weapon and nothing that could look like one.

Thinking the officer may have flagged the wrong luggage, security personnel then dug through a second bag that had passed through the X-ray machine at the same time, she said.

But when that failed to turn up anything that looked like a gun, concerns mounted and airport officials ordered that everyone who had passed the security checkpoint return to the main terminal hall and that the pier be fully searched. Authorities recalled two Southwest airliners, bound for Hartford, Conn., and Islip, N.Y., that had already left the gates and had their passengers get off. Seven other planes that were parked at their gates were also emptied.

A search by more than 30 officers from the Maryland Transportation Authority police, the Maryland Aviation Administration police, airline security and the Maryland State Police, including canine units, concluded by 9:45 a.m. that the building and aircraft were clear. Passengers were allowed back into the pier but only after they again passed through the X-ray machines. That process was finished by 11:30 a.m., Sampere said.

herself and other people that she met while in prison. The evening concluded with a question and answer session.

Ms. Whitehorn defined a political prisoner as, "somebody who has committed an act, which is illegal coming out of a movement for social justice or national liberation."

She included in this definition people who have a specific political objective, people who intentionally get arrested as a statement, people who are part of an effort to gage armed actions on police and people who commit crimes out of necessity or lack of options.

Laura Whitehorn also focused on how revolutionary movements only work when there is a community-based support system for the movement. She stated that the U.S. government knows this and she has seen first-hand their attempts to suppress African-American uprisings by introducing drugs into working class black communities.

She explained one set of incidents in New York City where she was working for civil rights and would see family or neighborhood children being driven in police cars and soon after the same children she would see intoxicated by various substances than they had not known before. She believes the police introduced the drugs into that communities and referred such actions as a "tool to destroy revolutionary movements in the 1960s [that] worked."

Ms. Whitehorn hopes that the next generations work to support political prisoners because such people are supporting the right of free speech and the right to gather freely. As for why she did what she did she responded. "It wasn't a choice, it was what I needed to do."

She said that since she was a child she had always hated racism, feeling that it contradicted what she was taught as being democracy. She also told attendees that writing to political prisoners truly helps, and that these days the number of letters to such prisoners are increasing as people become more aware of various issues.

Throughout the entire night, words of the introductory speech also kept with the theme of releasing political prisoners. Five percent of all Americans are presently jailed, and they make up 25 percent of the world's jail population. Furthermore, the racial climate is nothing to ignore. There are seven times more black males in prison than white males.

EPA: Role of the Protector

The Environmental Protection Agency has long been the target of attacks concerning objectivity in the face of industrial pressure. Critics of the EPA have often pointed to the organization's "kid glove" manner of handling high-profile cases when mammoth corporations such as Dow and Dupont are involved, citing capital as the real reason for the EPA's softened stances and relaxed repercussions.

This very argument was again thrust into the spotlight last Thursday, when the agency proposed limiting Internet information about potential accidents at chemical plants in an effort to limit the threat of terrorist action against those plants. The EPA's opposition immediately cried foul, citing the group's long standing defense of the public's "right to know" as being far more important than the prevention of industrial sabotage.

We at the Collegian feel that these critics are simply looking for an excuse to bash the agency, and that the EPA is making the correct decision in this case.

The crux of this argument lies in the fact that the citizens of this country have entrusted the EPA with the responsibility of "watch dogging" corporate America, and not necessarily the task of reporting all of its findings to the public. Whereas in the past the agency upheld a strict policy of public disclosure, the situation changed last year when Congress directed the agency to weigh the possibility of terrorist threats against that disclosure rule in regards to chemical information.

The one fact that critics are overlooking is this: the EPA is by no means limiting its investigative practices into the hundreds of industrial accidents. It is simply admitting that such detailed information is of more use to criminals than to the common concerned citizen.

Those in opposition to the agency's decision have leveled accusations that the EPA is simply protecting the interests of behemoth corporations and using public safety concerns as a smokescreen when finance is the real motivator behind its actions. In actuality, the pressure to keep this information from the public eye came from lawmakers and the FBI, and even these officials were met with resistance from the EPA that required negotiation and an eventual compromise to arrive at the proposed resolution.

The resolution itself may be the strongest indicator of the agency's intentions. It proposes that general information be released concerning what chemicals are produced, as well as the expected duration of a chemical release. It also pitched a unique system in which anyone interested can enter their street address and find out whether or not they live in a "vulnerable zone," thus informing them of the possibility of an accident nearby. The system does not, however, provide the name or exact location of the facility.

The public's need-to-know is still ultimately respected by the EPA as well: even those details withheld through the proposed compromise are available at 30 federal reading rooms throughout the country. Interested individuals are required to show identification and have their names recorded in order to access the information, thus aiding law enforcement officials in reducing the risk of terrorist attacks.

The EPA's proposal will not satisfy everyone, of course. Staunch environmentalists argue that the measure restricts the public's access and thus invites purposeful suppression of information, while conservative groups such as the Competitive Enterprise Institute counter that even though the dangerous details surrounding the plants are protected, there is still the possibility of people reproducing them on their own on the fairly unregulated Net.

But, all things considered, the EPA has made a wise decision.

Thanks for your compliments

This year, I got my shot to write columns for our little newspaper here. It was a blast, lots of fun, and the fan letters I got made my job worthwhile. After coming up with an idea for my weekly diatribe, I tore into whatever helpless victim I could find.

After they cried, I'd occasionally kick them again, out of spite. Sometimes though, people get uppity and write me fan letters telling me how nice I'm not and how awful I am. I got bored Monday night, so I culled through the letters, which were sitting in the office, and found the best compliments I'd received. Then I tried to remember the best compliments I'd been told or that had been left on my answering machine. I also scoured my old emails.

Like that, instant karma for me. A treasure trove of friendliness from the open-minded UMass campus. Please accept the following, unedited, statements about me. (I don't put names to the quotes, but I could...)

"In just one article, (that which was featured on today's Daily Collegian editorial/opinion page) you managed to convince me that you are a bitter, resentful, tactless, wannabe journalist." - Fan letter.

That's me.

"It is surprising how ignorant, stupid, jealous, and stereotypical you willingly allowed yourself to appear in front of thousands of college students." - Fan letter.

Isn't it though?

"Watch your back. Fuckin' queer." - Phone message.

This was my favorite phone message. The kid called from his girlfriend's dorm room and threatened me. I just did a call back to get the name, which I've got kicking around somewhere.

"If I follow the logic of Sam Wilkinson's editorial ("Privatization and Your RSU", 10/20/99) correctly, I was born into a society dominated by corporations, and all material splendor that I presently enjoy stems from corporate origins." - Fan letter.

You're right, you were. Quit denying reality. Just try to change it.

"A great newspaper Mr. Wilkinson could work for would be the Boston Herald. A two-bit reporter for a two-bit newspaper." - Fan letter.

I work for money. If they paid me, I'd write there. Doesn't mean I'd accept their practices, but I'd write for them.

Sam Wilkinson

"I will grant you that the honors college is not free of flaws, but it is not the evil that Mr. Wilkinson makes it out to be." - Fan letter.

Oh c'mon; isn't it just a little bit evil? A little bit?

"Sam: Some of us nerds on the hill would like to thank you for bringing to light the true purpose of attending college." - Fan letter.

Hey, I do my best.

"So, Master Samuel E. Wilkinson, thank you for pondering over the new program again." - Fan letter.

Sure, slave. Now, be a dear and know your role and shut your mouth.

"As a Radical Student Union member, I feel that Sam Wilkinson's article 'Privatization and your RSU' is misguided." - Fan letter.

Point well taken, then put in my pocket, then ignored, then forgotten about.

"If you write about the Radical Student Union again, I'm going to beat those sideburns off your face." - Friendly Conversation

Let's settle this like men and drag race up at the on Deadman's curve instead. My hot-rod versus your rusty bicycle. Bring it on.

"Thank you Sam, you're so right – we are the by products of generations upon generations of corporations." - Fan letter.

A glorious follower sees my light.

"It would seem that rather than quietly backing down and letting everyone forget his last inaccuracy-ridden editorial, Sam Wilkinson has decided to come forward again to expose his ignorance for public viewing." - Fan letter.

Well, yeah, in the face of opposition, the right thing to do is step quietly down and be forgotten. What a hypocrite.

"Sam – I don't know what your problem is, but it seems you have a slight superiority complex." - Fan letter.

And you don't, writing me a letter trying to convince me to align myself with your point of view? You're throwing rocks at glass houses.

"I don't know who you think you are, or what higher knowledge you think you have of the real world, that you should feel so God-damn comfortable writing and submitting an editorial of such shit." - Fan letter.

Allow me to apologize for speaking my mind. I was out of line feeling comfortable with my opinion.

Oh, and I suppose experience would be my fall back position.

"Maybe then you will realize that you owe the entire student body an apology for your rude perspective of UMass." - Fan Letter.

Screw you. The last person I'm ever apologizing is to you. Since when is being honest being rude?

"Not only do I think your an asshole I think you are totally ignorant towards those merely wish to fulfill their potential. Do you not value hard work Mr. asshole? Do you not value desire and motivation of others? Are you a retard?" - Fan letter.

Yes I value hard work. Yes I value their desire. No I'm not, as you classily wrote, a retard; are you (the person who wrote this, not you the reader) an SGA Senator? (The answer is either yes or no, and the only hint you're getting is that the answer has three letters in it.)

"You're the anti-Christ of American journalism." - Person in class.

Am I really? Because that's the most flattering thing anyone ever told me.

It's been a decent year. I got a lot of letters, most of them negative. They were full of ideas, including encouragement for me to acknowledge what an ignorant bastard I am. But whatever; the letters, they flatter me, but I'd never take them seriously. What, with everybody being so stupidly sensitive around here, they're way too easy to get.

So all I can say is thanks for reading; I'll be back, my columns in town my mean spirited message with me, my evil ways in my back pocket. Feel free to keep telling me what a bad person I am; I'll still be here.

The rewards of volunteering

Growing up in a small nouveau riche section of Westchester, NY., I was often involved in a number of customary extra-curricular community service projects feeding the poor, volunteering my time to sick and/or privileged children in hospitals, etc. Never did I think that one day, far away from my conventional upbringing and thus invites purposeful suppression of information, while conservative groups such as the Competitive Enterprise Institute counter that even though the dangerous details surrounding the plants are protected, there is still the possibility of people reproducing them on their own on the fairly unregulated Net.

But, all things considered, the EPA has made a wise decision.

Information from the Associated Press was used in this editorial.

Well I did. Actually, it was a bunch of us sorority girls from Delta Zeta who volunteered two very interesting days at the Brightside Residential Treatment Center in West Springfield. One of the sisters, a senior, who served as an intern at Brightside for the past semester, encouraged us to pitch in and see how rewarding it was.

Rewarding? I was ready to see how rewarding this experience would be.

Well let me see, it was a miserably cold day in the midst of April showers. The ominous weather should not have lifted my spirits for the occasion. Nonetheless, I was still determined to push myself to undertake this challenge, break beyond the barriers of "high school-style" volunteering. I was determined to partake in the awkwardly convoluted experience of acquainting myself with some young men who have committed some pretty lofty crimes, those who have made other children the victims of their assaults. The process of the experience would be fascinating, but I foresaw this experience as a predestined growth for myself.

Arriving at the center, several of us girls awaited the entrance of the patients, the boys, who would be just finishing up a game of basketball. Luckily, we had all braced ourselves for their sporadic inappropriate behavior, which would often generate unabashed lewd comments. We were briefly trained not to act too friendly to them, but to maintain a barrier, a barrier they wouldn't misrepresent as flirtation. I surely understood the austere behavior recommended, but then again, I wasn't about to give my phone number out like a drunken stupor "out on the town."

They arrived in the dining room half past 7 p.m., drenched with perspiration, the humid stench of the outdoors. They started pouring in by the masses; an influx of teenage boys streamed the room at my heart's palpitation. I could've been at quick unease under the awkward circumstances, but to my surprise I remained calm, as most of these boys, mostly timid looking, resembled the prepubescent campers I supervised during my counselor days not too long before. Already, I felt a connection with them as if we had known each other at present. Maybe I had seen them at the mall? Maybe they were my campers?

It all seemed too telling in a competitive card game of Uno my sorority sisters and I played with the boys. They started to seem less like patients to me and more like normal active young boys, as their true immature behavior shone through. Some were quite shy and reserved in speech; faces buried under table, but most were teeming with exuberance, brutish laughter, and curt pomposity. I reverberated in my seat, to hear the words " Yo Ilana, pass me another card," boisterously roll off the tongue of a timid boy named Brian, sitting opposite from me. He kept his utterance of swears and blasphemes hidden from the staff, but I quickly resorted to laughing it off. I chuckled softly.

Ilana Gilman

The card game lasted almost exhaustingly two hours, but during that time, I realized that my perception of the boys changed. All but too quickly I categorized them as outcasts not worthy of exoneration let alone of my free time devoted to volunteer work. As sex offenders, the predators of violence, little did I know before, that at one time, these young boys were the victims of violence and abuse themselves.

I dare not say that I pardon their actions, their vulgarities, but I look at them right now with more understanding. I've come to love guys who live on the edge." Sneakin' in, thanks to Maxim

Just the other day, I was flipping through the April 2000 issue of Maxim while killing my Thursday shift at the Reserve Department of the library. Seeing as how I was successfully fulfilling both of my two major duties as an employee there (the first, being reading the office, being sitting on my ass), I was fairly focused upon my leisure reading. Mind you, Maxim has recently been voted as best magazine on last week's "Best of UMass 2000" poll, and we all know how accurate that was. For those of you who didn't read it: sorry, but time just ran out to pre-register for the "best class": Wind Ensemble! Better luck next year.

Since you didn't sign up for that must-have class as soon as possible, you're obviously the type who procrastinates and toils around on the Internet for hours. Therefore, ask yourselves, "why meddle with hours of free porn on the net when you can just bookmark dailycollegian.com, our campus's favorite website, and log right on!" No offense to the webmasters who really do make it an excellent Internet home for this fine newspaper. After all, if it wasn't for them, my colleagues and I would never have overtaken Cindy Margolis as the most downloaded image on the web. Not to mention the fact that the newly added mpeg of me could never have totaled more downloads than the "Star Wars" trailer and the Pam and Tommy Lee porn flick combined.

Where was I? Oh yeah, Maxim. For those of you who are not familiar with the publication, a small section each month is a guy's "How to," dedicated to helping men do both the little everyday things with greater ease, as well as the downright outrageous circumstances where the only reason that you are still alive is because you read Maxim. Topics range from "How To Survive a Plane Crash" to "How To Hypnotize a Lobster." Note: I don't know if the tips for either of those two actually work. I freak out when a ladybug lands on my hand, so if my plane starts going down, I highly doubt that I'm going to remember that little blurb in Maxim. And as far as the lobsters go, I like watching those little suckers squirm.

Now, as an aspiring journalist and eventually a fiction writer, every now and then, an element of our pop culture that has succeeded will make me sit back, scratch my head, and say, "That's popular? Hell, I could write trash better than that!" (Think any Steven Seagal movie or that LFO song about "girls that wear Abercrombie and Fitch.") This very situation arose the other day when I reached page 56, where I read Maxim's tips on "How To Sneak Into the Movies." This article went on to offer four suggestions from the book cleverly titled How To Sneak Into the Movies by author Dan Zamudio.

I'll let you ponder this for a minute: a guy actually sat down and wrote a book about this. A book that the lone reader review available on Amazon.com called "a wonderful gag... not the type of book the average person would want to read for research purposes." Research purposes? What idiot is going to research an effective method for sneaking in to see a movie? Didn't we all learn to do that by the age of 10? And what exactly makes Dan Zamudio, of the billions of people who sneak into the movies, the end-all, be-all expert on the subject? Well, according to Zamudio himself, in his posted note on Amazon.com, "I wrote the book because I was bored in Los Angeles and had nothing better to do than sneak into the movies." Oh hell yeah, this guy's a messiah when it comes to sneaking into a theater then – after all, he has "worked in several movie theaters" and to back it up, provides "true tales of sneaking into some of America's great movie palaces!" (According to the publisher's note).

Now, I don't mean to brag (I rarely do that, right?), but I was no slouch when it came to sneaking into the movies when I was a kid. Movie palaces, no, but I did milk my fair share of free matinees out of the Showcase Cinemas in Revere in my day. Therefore, I beg to differ with Mr. Zamudio in the sense that he actually formulated all these strategies, although I will give him due credit for all the dumb-ass suggestions that he offers. He suggests, among others, waiting for a large group to enter the theater. When the usher tears all their ticket stubs at once (which I don't think I have ever seen), just slip in behind them and offer a smirk or nudge to someone in the party to instantly pass yourself off as cousin Bobby. Golden, right?

Or what about staking out the rear exits for the previous show to end, and then discreetly slipping in? I'll admit, this one does work, although you'll occasionally get a hard-ass 35 year-old middle-school dropout manning the security cameras. Believe me, nothing gives this man his jollies like busting a group of little kids who think they're slick.

This one really gets me, though: According to Zamudio, "women love guys who live on the edge." Therefore, when you walk into a theater, employing your best pimp stroll, just tell your date "Oh, I've snuck in here before," and she's putty in your hands. Um, OK, so not only does my date think I'm a total geek who sneaks Into movies, but I'm also cheap. I would like to try this method with the entire Women's Studies class that thinks I'm sexist, Let's let bygones be bygones, all 30 of us, as I will demonstrate how non-sexist I am by sneaking us all into the movies. GLBT Issues

Fighting the Friends of Jesus with humor

In the weeks preceding Queerfest, the GLBT community on campus was abuzz with speculation – not about potential bands or performers at the event, but rather about the Friends of Jesus, a religious group that had reserved a Campus Concourse table for the day of the event.

The last time the Friends of Jesus visited the UMass campus was two years ago, when I was a senior in a New Jersey high school, and thus I've never had the opportunity to see them in the flesh. They are notorious, however, among liberal RSOs for their anti-gay literature, which accuses gays of molesting children, destroying the moral fabric of America and generally riding the highway to hell.

Jake Lilien

I saw the extent of the anger at their visit at the Acting for Campus Transformation conference on April 15, where students took microphones to express their dismay at such a hate-filled group using our campus as a propaganda site. In the end, all of our fears were for naught: for unidentified reasons, the Friends never showed. Yet just the possibility of their arrival was, for many, traumatic.

My question is this: why? Living our lives in fear of fringe groups is giving them the power they crave. A much more appropriate response to a group of idiots with nothing better to do than travel from campus to campus with hate literature is to have a good laugh at their expense, and use their arrival as an opportunity to spread awareness about our causes.

Case in point: last weekend, at the Millennium March on Washington, about 50 protestors belonging to a group called Bible Believers Fellowship. They wore T-shirts with the word "Homo" on the front, and "Got AIDS Yet?" printed on the back. One of the Believers, Ruben Israel, was quoted in the Associated Press as saying, "We're here to tell the country that today Washington D.C. means 'Deviant Capital.'"

When I first read this story online, I was horrified, but soon relieved to read that the marchers responded by turning the event into a photo opportunity. They took turns standing in front of a man who carried a large wooden cross and kissed, while others took pictures. One photographer yelled, "Hey, you with the hate sign, smile!"

If the thousands of gay activists had, burst into tears or yelled angry, violent epithets at the protestors, it's safe to say that the Bible Believers would have gotten their way.

I'd like to think that if the Friends of Jesus had appeared on our campus, the GLBT community would have responded in a similar way. If a group of us had gotten together to scream angry slogans, we would have accomplished nothing while reinforcing the stereotype of gays as hysterical and intolerant.

If anything, the Friends of Jesus do a greater disservice to Christian groups on campus than anyone else. There seems to be a growing trend in our society, and the media, to group together all conservative Christians, regardless of whether they preach love and tolerance, or whether they picket funerals of AIDS victims with signs that say "God Hates Fags." Anyone who walks past a table featuring pamphlets titled "Why Sodomites Will Burn in Hell" will probably end up thinking far worse of the radical right than they will of gays, and true Christians should be the ones to take the most offense.

The Friends of Jesus debacle, much like the incident last year in which a large family appeared on campus shouting that all college students were going to hell, brings to mind a European sitcom called, "Heil, Honey, I'm Home." The show was so titled because it featured the character of Adolf Hitler as a dimwitted next-door neighbor. Such a television show would certainly never air in the US, but it probably should. Laughing at Hitler is probably far more damaging to the future of neo-Nazism than any peace vigil ever could be.

A Note From the Editors

This is the semester's last issue of the GLBT Issues page. Next year, the title of the page will change to the GLBT Affairs page.

We would like to thank our regular writers, specifically Meg Hebert and Dave Lambert, for making our page possible. Without their help, we would not have been able to inform the campus about GLBT issues and provide a voice for the GLBT community.

The year 2000 has, thus far, been a very promising one. The decision of the Vermont Legislature has given gay couples equal legal standing with their straight counterparts, albeit in the third smallest state in the nation.

We should not let this victory make us complacent, though. Vermont conservatives have vowed to purge any pro-civil-union politician from office. Meanwhile, it's entirely possible that the U.S. Supreme Court will rule that it was unconstitutional for the state of New Jersey to apply civil rights legislation to the Boy Scouts.

It is only through the flow of free information that we can hope to educate the public about the GLBT community. We'd like to thank the Collegian for granting us a space to do so.

Anti-gay bias of Boy Scouts is reactionary

By John Shelby Spong
The Washington Post

The U.S. Supreme Court is the latest battleground on which the historic prejudice against gay people is being engaged. The contenders are the Boy Scouts of America and James Dale, an ousted Eagle Scout. As happens with all dying prejudices, a smoke screen of rhetoric is being used to cover the issues in this debate. The basic question is whether a citizen of this country can be penalized for what a person "is," when everything he or she has ever "done" has been proper and even laudatory.

Prejudice has a long shelf life and an incredibly powerful effect on social mores. Stereotypes, even false ones, die slowly. And strangely, prejudice seems to die most slowly when it is found in religious and patriotic settings. In this case, the Boy Scouts of America uses its affiliation with religious and law-and-order organizations as sustenance for its anti-gay policies. So it is disappointing but not surprising that the issue of justice for gay people is being fought out in this deeply traditional, overtly patriotic and religiously affiliated organization.

Behind the conflict are two mutually incompatible definitions about what it means if someone is gay. One is old and traditional. It has shaped our consciousness for thousands of years. The other is relatively new, arising in recent centuries. The new definition challenges the old one at its very core.

The old definition stubbornly holds that homosexuality is a sickness or character flaw, a distortion of God's plan. This definition allows other humans to see homosexuals as "other" – as unnatural, perverted or "queer" – and, as such, to be dangerous to social order, untrustworthy or threatening in some way. Based on this view, many religious bodies righteously proclaim that God shares in their condemnation of homosexual people, quoting biblical texts such as those found in Leviticus 18 and 20 and in Paul's Epistle to the Romans.

Some religious organizations holding these views – as well as many that do not – are involved in scouting. The Boy Scouts assert that they officially embrace this same definition – or accommodate those who do – and dismiss outstanding Scout leaders, not because of anything they have done because they are known to be or have acknowledged being gay. Boy Scouts of America does so without saying claim to an anti-gay agenda or to whatever constitutional protection may grudgingly exist for those who organize to propagate bigotry.

A new and radically contrary understanding of homosexuality has arisen slowly but steadily over the past 100 years or so, primarily because of work done in medical and scientific circles and in the psychological and anthropological studies. This definition suggests that homosexuality is a normal aspect of the human experience; that it is a "given" in life, not a "chosen"; and that it is more like left handedness, something to which a person awakens, than something that people elect to become. Significant data also establish that homosexuals constitute a stable and consistent minority, present at all times in the human population.

In James Dale, we have a classic example of a gay person living out what appears to be an unquestionably moral, responsible and admirable life. And yet there are those who would look past what his life presents and attribute to him an unworthy or even dangerous aspect, in many cases with a sense of full righteousness. In the face of science and of what lives like Dale's indisputably teach, this righteousness sadly is misplaced.

Calendar of Events

The GLBT Issues page may be over for this semester, but we will still need writers for next year! Anyone interested should call the Collegian at 545-1762 and ask for Jake or Jeannie.

On Thursday, May 4 at 7 p.m., the Stonewall Center will host a "Queer Stress Cafe." The event, the first of its kind, is dedicated to eradicating end-of-the-semester stress, and will feature "refreshments, playdoh, poster making stuff, beads, art supplies and queer coloring books!" Posters, signs, and accessories for Saturday's Northampton Pride March will also be designed.

On Saturday, May 6, from 8-11 a.m., Valuable Families and the Pioneer Valey Gay Men's Chorus will sponsor their annual Pancake Breakfast. The event will be held at the Unitarian Society at Main Street in Northampton.

On Saturday, May 6, the Annual Northampton Pride March will take place. The theme for the 2000 March is "It's all about pride!"

The day will begin at 12 p.m. in Lampron Park in Northampton. The parade will again be led by a balloon arch organized by PRIDE ZONE, a gay group called Bible Believers Fellowship. They wore T-shirts with the word "Homo" on the front, and "Got AIDS Yet?" printed on the back. One of the Believers, Ruben Israel, was quoted in the Associated Press as saying, "We're here to tell the country that today Washington D.C. means 'Deviant Capital.'"

When I first read this story online, I was horrified, but soon relieved to read that the marchers responded by turning the event into a photo opportunity. Laughing at Hitler is probably far more damaging to the future of neo-Nazism than any peace vigil ever could be.

On Saturday, May 6, there will be a "coming out" party for The Amazonian, a Pioneer Valley publication "by, for, and about lesbians." The event, held at 8 p.m. in the American Legion Hall at 63 Riverside Drive in Northampton, is free.

On Saturday, May 6, the Northampton Pride March will present a performance by lesbian comedienne Suzanne Westenhoefer. Westenhoefer will be performing her new show, "I'm Not Carolyn Brady" at Sage Hall, on the Smith College campus. Tickets can be purchased for $19 at Pride and Joy Bookstore in Northampton, Food For Thought Bookstore in Amherst, World Eye Books, Greenfield or charge by phone at 1.87.PrideMarch.

On Tuesday, May 16, at 7 p.m., a "queer graduation ceremony" is being planned for all GLBT people and allies who are graduating in May. The event will be held at Memorial Hall.

The graduation speaker will be UMass alum Heidi Holland. Her talk is titled: "Queer at UMass in the Reagan Years."

Casa Latina discusses homophobia, AIDS

By Jeanie Gorlovsky
Collegian Staff

On April 25, Casa Latina hosted an event called "Open Your Eyes: Let's Talk about HIV, Homophobia, and Hope" at the Center for the Arts in Northampton. The event began with welcoming remarks from Josie Valentin, the director of Casa Latina, which is a community organization for people of Latino birth or descent in Western Massachusetts. Valentin spoke primarily in Spanish, as did the other two speakers at the event. However, translators were available in the back of the room for those who spoke only English.

After Valentin's welcome, there was a short informational lecture by a woman from the AIDS Hotline. She explained that the hotline (the phone number is 1-800-750-2016), exists to refer people in the area who want to test themselves for STDs to an appropriate location. The test is free. It takes about two weeks to get test results, and the person being tested gets counseled before taking the test and after receiving its results. It is possible to do the test anonymously, and there is no minimum age for being tested. The speaker from the AIDS Hotline explained that people can get the HIV virus from bodily fluids like semen, blood, and breast milk. She explained that the best two ways to protect yourself from getting HIV are to use condoms and/or dental dams when engaging in sexual contact and to not share needles with other people if you are using them to inject drugs. After this lecture, a raffle took place where people won assorted items, like Casa Latina T-shirts.

The key speaker of the night was Pedro Iullio Serrano, a 25-year old gay man from Puerto Rico who is infected with the HIV virus. Since finding out about his HIV status eight years ago, Serrano has become an activist and an educator talking to audiences around the world about HIV safety and gay issues. Serrano introduced himself to the audience at the Center for the Arts by saying that it was his first time in Massachusetts, and he was glad to find an active Latino community here. He said, "As a human being, I want to bring a message of hope and love... I am going to speak from my heart."

Serrano first realized that he was gay at a young age, when he was just five or six-years-old. He had a hard time being able to deal with his attraction to men. "It took me a lot of time and tears to accept that I was gay," especially because of the influence of the Catholic Church, which said that gay people were sinful, explained Serrano. He denied that homosexuality was a choice, saying "Who would choose to be a homosexual? To be a victim?" Serrano said that he finally realized that in order for him to be happy, he had to be honest with himself about his sexuality. He said, "When one is honest with oneself, one can conquer the world."

One of his favorite phrases to describe his sexuality is "to be gay is to be human." Serrano has even found a way to integrate his sexuality into his religious beliefs, saying, "As a Christian, we need to love each other, love God, and love ourselves."

Serrano says that there is terrible homophobia in Puerto Rico. Serrano explained that this is because of the attitude of machismo that many Puerto Rican males have. The stereotype of the homosexual in most Latino countries is of someone who is very feminine, and many straight Latino men are threatened by this. "Machismo means that if you let men get threatened by this, they can teach them a lesson... Homophobia and machismo are there because of ignorance – people need to learn about things they don't know," said Serrano. He has gotten death threats and his door at home has been defaced with graffiti. One time, his car was damaged. When he heard about the Matthew Shepard murder in Wyoming, Serrano said that he saw himself in that position and felt afraid. However, Serrano said, "I have feared for my life, but I would never stop talking to people like you."

Serrano spent a large part of his lecture talking about his status as an HIV-positive man. He said that he got HIV from his first relationship with a man when he was 17-years-old. He did not protect himself from STD's by using condoms in that relationship, and so he feels responsible for that. Serrano said, "HIV is a terrible virus, although it's very small." It was very difficult for Serrano to realize that he had HIV, because it affected not only him but his family and other people in his life as well. For example, his mom was terribly upset when she found out about his infection, though she has been very supportive of him.

Serrano tried very hard to get the message across to the audience that it is very important to protect yourself from the HIV virus. He explained, "HIV is a terrible thing and has taken a lot of lives... I come to tell you about HIV so you don't have to go through what I've gone through." Serrano stressed that HIV can affect anybody, regardless of gender or sexual orientation. He said, "HIV can educate anybody... Nobody knows who has it... A lot of people wouldn't think I have it because I look healthy." Serrano said that it is important to use protection in both gay and straight relationships. He explained, "If you don't have that trust, if you are not sure (if your partner is HIV-negative), you have to protect yourself."

Serrano explained that he and other HIV-positive people face a lot of social stigma from society. He said, "We don't need more pain from (social) rejection... We need love and support." He explained that some people are afraid to hug him because they think that they can get HIV from him that way, and that this kind of rejection is very painful for him. Serrano said, "I want people to understand that we are all humans... that more things unite us than separate us." After Serrano's talk, the audience had a brief question-and-answer period. Then, Serrano and the audience members mingled as they enjoyed Puerto Rican refreshments provided by Casa Latina.

News briefs

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Hundreds of thousands of activists marched in Washington this past weekend, urging Congress to pass gay rights laws. Organizers of the Millennium March on Washington estimated the crowd at 750,000 marchers, while most journalists put the size of the crowd at slightly over 200,000.

President Clinton and Vice President Al Gore, while not present at the march, addressed the crowds via videotape.

"The greatest hope for a just society is to teach our children to respect others," said Clinton, in his remarks. "We must keep moving forward and not succumb to the sirens of hate."

Other noted figures at the march included Ellen DeGeneres, Anne Heche, Elton John, Melissa Etheridge, and U.S. Representative Tammy Baldwin (D-WI).

At one point, relatives of James Byrd, the man dragged to death in Jasper, Texas, by white supremacists, addressed the crowd.

"People ask 'Why is the Byrd family here?'" said Darrel Byrd, nephew of James Byrd Jr. "It's simple. We share one desire – to have the opportunity, the right, to live peacefully in a diverse society."

CONCORD, N.H. – Openly gay New Hampshire State Senator Rick Trombly has announced plans to introduce a law into the senate that would create the same "civil unions" recently approved in Vermont. New Hampshire Governor Jeanne Shaheen, a Democrat, has refused to take a stand on whether she would support the bill. Trombly told the national newsmagazine The Advocate that he felt Shaheen was merely being vigilant.

"She has demonstrated to the people of New Hampshire she's a very cautious chief executive," said Trombly. "I don't think she should be criticized for that. Those of us who know the governor know that's just the way she is." While Shaheen has publicly expressed opposition to gay marriage, she has yet to comment on the Vermont unions, which give same-sex couples all of the legal rights of marriage without the same title.

WASHINGTON, D.C. – The US Supreme Court has heard arguments of lawyers on both sides of the New Jersey Boy Scouts case.

Last year, the new Jersey Supreme Court ruled that the state of New Jersey was entitled to force the Boy Scouts of America to admit gay scouts and troop leaders under a state anti-discrimination law. The Scouts appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor expressed doubts as to whether or not a private organization could be ordered to admit specific members, asking, "What about a gay or lesbian group that does not want heterosexual members?"

Justice Stephen Breyer echoed O'Connor's concerns, saying, "A Catholic organization has to admit Jews? Or a Jewish organization has to admit Catholics? That seems odd. It's hard to imagine that the Knights of Columbus or the B'nai B'rith could be forced by state law to accept members who do not share their religious beliefs."

WASHINGTON, DC – President Clinton has once again urged Congress to pass the Hate Crimes Prevention Act.

"[Hate crimes] are not like other crimes, because these crimes target people simply because of who they are," Clinton said in a White House ceremony. "And because they do, they strike at the heart of who we are as a nation."

The Hate Crimes Prevention Act has been repeatedly rebuked by Congressional Republicans, who feel that the legislation is unconstitutional, and unnecessary in light of existing national and federal laws.

Pete Ieffries, a spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., said, "We'd like to see the Clinton-Gore administration focus more on the enforcement of the current laws we have rather than try to create a partisan political bill that has little effect in the real world."

Mullins, UMass revs up for Spring Concert 2000

Prolific duo of Method Man & Redman to appear

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Lajon Witherspoon of Sevendust, who recently rocked the Mullins Center with Creed, once spoke in Rolling Stone magazine about the body movin' quality of Dr. Dre and his music. "Show me someone that doesn't move to a Dr. Dre record and I'll show you a lame motherfucker," is essentially how the quote went. This very true statement can also go for Method Man and Redman, one of rap's most influential and prolific duos.

Meth and Red will be headlining this year's Spring Concert at the Mullins Center on May 7 on a bill that includes Long Beach Dub All-Stars and Beenie Man. The two released their much-anticipated album together late last year entitled Blackout!, which enjoyed both critical acclaim and strong sales. The first single "Tear It Off" inspired a professional wrestling themed video, and the two haven't been shy in showing their love for the "sport." Method Man especially is fond of the WWF, as he contributed two tracks for the WWF Aggression album, which featured a variety of rappers such as Snoop Dog and Ol' Dirty Bastard doing new versions of popular wrestling themes.

Method Man handled Kane's theme as well as The Rock's, and his version of the latter superstar's song is often used as his entrance music. "Da Rockwilder" proved to be the biggest hit from that album and had a hilarious video, which spoofed the infamous Gap ads with a portion of the duo's previous hit collaboration "How High." Both Meth and Red also performed the song live as entrance music to boxer Roy Jones Jr.'s most recent fight on HBO, without which the fighter refused to march down to the ring. It is also, to my knowledge, the first song to realize the brilliant couplet that results in rhyming "too hot for TV" and "pachisi."

COURTESY DEF JAM RECORDS

Method Man & Redman highlight Spring Concert 2000, sponsored by swapit.com

"Y.O.U." was the most recent single and video released from Blackout!, and has enjoyed success while keeping sales of the album steady. Together, Method Man and Redman played a handful of dates on last year's Family Values tour, headlined by Limp Bizkit, and a live version of the Blackout! track "Da Rockwilder" can be found on the recent Family Values Live '99. The two also supported Limp Bizkit again on the Billionaire Pirates tour late last year with System of a Down. The duo has been touring steadily since then, with a recent string of dates that just hit the Palladium in Worcester, with fellow Wu Banga Ghostface Killah and upcoming brick city rappers The Outsidaz.

Method Man, a.k.a. Clifford Smith, a.k.a. Johnny Blaze, is one, ninth, or I think tenth now, of the rap juggernaut Wu Tang Clan, and hails from Staten Island, NY, or Shaolin for those in the know. Certainly one of the most recognizable voices and personalities in rap music over the past decade, Mr. Meth has two solo albums under his belt; 1998's Tical 2000: Judgment Day and 1994's Tical. These are in addition to his strong presence on the two Wu-Tang albums, the massively influential Enter the Wu-Tang (36 Chambers) and Wu-Tang Forever. His presence in the rap community has been undeniable, lending his rough deep delivers to a variety of hit releases like the Mary J. Blige collaboration "I'll Be There For You" and the recent Limp Bizkit song "N 2 Gether Now." The party atmosphere of the last song's video seems to exemplify the attention the MZA receives, resulting in frequent collaborations with such heavyweights as LL Cool J and DJ Premier. In concert, look for the usual suspects, like the classic "Method Man" from 36 Chambers, "Bring The Pain," and newer stuff like the excellent "Dangerous Grounds," which features Streetlife, who often accompanies Iron Lung to shows.

Redman, a.k.a. Reggie Noble, hails from da bricks, or New Jersey, and like Method Man has been in the rap game since 1992. That year saw the release of What? Thee Album, which features frequent concert opener "Time 4 Sum Aksion." His tight delivery and often hilarious rhyming garnered him a dedicated fan base fond of his comic style. Dare Iz A Darkside followed in 1994 and in 1996 the Funk Doctor made his Def Jam debut with Muddy Waters.

1998 proved a busy year for Redman with two major releases; Def Squad's El Nino and his own Doc's Da Name 2000. One third of the Def Squad supergroup with Eric Sermon and Keith Murray, that anticipated release proved successful, but his hit single "I'll Be Dat'," from 2000 was what really thrust him into the spotlight in late 1998. The hilariously self-deprecating track and accompanying video brought the underappreciated rapper's unique style into the mainstream.

If there is anything that makes music more fun, it's the bounce. My patented Bounce Meter predicts that the bounce measure for the Method Man and Redman set at the Spring Concert will be ridiculously high, so make sure to flash your U-Card on Sunday and get in the pit and try and love someone.

Biz Markie to be emcee

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

We, the people of the University of Massachusetts, hereby declare that we love free music! The time is here once again for the annual Spring Concert to bring fun in the form of some very high profile acts to the Mullins Center.

This Sunday, University Productions and Concerts (UPC) along with the Student Government Association will present the spectacle that they have spent all year working on. Highlighted by Method Man & Redman, and the Long Beach Dub All-Stars, Spring Concert 2000 will prove to be one of the most entertaining shows of the year.

The concert is sponsored by swapit.com, a webpage that offers browsers the opportunity to swap goods across the internet. Other sponsors include Nantucket Nectars, food.com, lycos.com, boldbrain.com, and Coca-Cola.

Aside from Method Man & Redman, Long Beach Dub All-Stars will certainly be one of the key moments of the show. The band was started by bassist Eric Wilson and drummer Bud Gaugh when the lead singer of the act they were formerly associated with passed away. The two teamed up with a wide range of other musicians to form Long Beach Dub All-Stars.

The band comes fully equipped with state of the art technological equipment. They have a Roland RE-201 Space Echo and S-50 sampler. Long Beach Dub All-Stars are still on tour promoting their first two albums, Long Beach Dub All Stars and Friends and Right Back. The band will certainly bring a diverse and new sound to the Mullins Center on Sunday night.

Aside from the two headlining acts, there are plenty of other surprises that Spring Concert 2000 has in store. Beenie Man has been riding high on success and critical acclaim that has come from his album, Many Moods of Moses that was released in 1998. Beenie Man has been on the reggae scene since 1981, and recorded his first album in 1984. Since the 26-year-old sensation has been a staple in the reggae world.

Fuzzbubble is another upcoming act that UPC hopes will captivate the audience. Fuzzbubble may be most easily remembered for their work on the rock remix of Puff Daddy's "All About the Benjamins." The song earned the band a bunch of MTV awards. It also helped the soundtrack to Godzilla go platinum twice. The band has also recorded with high profile acts such as Ozzy Osbourne, DMX Dave Grohl of the Foo Fighters, Notorious B.I.G. and many more. Fuzzbubble are certainly not strangers to success. The band has appeared on Saturday Night Live, MTV Beach House and The Keenan Ivory Wayans Show.

Aside from the main acts, there are some other very interesting aspects to the show. Bruce Bass Funkestra, Antigone Rising, the winner of the Southwest Battle of the Bands, and Percy Hill, who played Skybox earlier this year, will all be in the house.

The master of ceremonies for the show will be Biz Markie, who has lent his talents to film soundtracks and to Will Smith's huge hit, Willenium. Biz, formerly known as Marcell also played at the 1999 Tibetan Freedom Concert with the beastie Boys and Run DMC, and he has also appeared on HBO. He will be the glue that will hold the entire show together.

Doors will open for the spring concert at 4:30 p.m., and will begin with battle of the bands winner at 5 p.m. on the small stage. The Bruce Bass Funkestra will play the small stage at 6:15 p.m., followed by Antigone Rising at 7:55 p.m. and Fuzzbubble at 9:30 p.m. The main stage (where Biz Markie can be seen all night) will consist of Percy Hill at 5:35 p.m., Beenie Man at 6:55 p.m., Long Beach Dub All-Stars at 8:35 p.m., and Redman & Method Man will close out the show from 10:25-11:25 p.m. As it is every year, the event will be free to all UMass students with a valid ID. The price for non-students is $22.50. For more information, contact University Productions and Concerts.

All and all it's just a...

By Ben Mccombs
Daily Evergreen (Washington St. University)

(U-WIRE) PULLMAN, Wash. – "Is there anybody out there?" When Pink Floyd singer/bassist/songwriter Roger Waters asked this question in 1979, the response from fans was a resounding "yes!"

Twenty-one years later, Pink Floyd has asked that question again.

"Is There Anybody Out There? The Wall Live" is a double album culled from 1980 and 1981 performances of Pink Floyd's most ambitious album to date, "The Wall." So what can the average Pink Floyd fan expect for his or her $28? Audio art.

"The Wall" was pure art rock from its inception, and the live version is no less so, if slightly colored by the usual factors of live performance.

The album begins with an obtuse master of ceremonies asking the audience not to use fireworks or flash photography during the performance, at which point the first giant chords of "In The Flesh?" interrupt him to the audience's delight.

"The Wall Live," like the original studio album, moves along at an almost leisurely pace, taking time out for guitarist David Gilmour's brilliant extended solos.

Keyboardist Richard Wright is much more prominent on this album than the original studio album, even though at the time of the recording of "The Wall Live" he'd been fired as a member of the band and was rehired only as a session player.

Waters and Gilmour take turns playing lead vocalist throughout the show. Though "The Wall" was Waters' concept, the sound of his voice is somewhat of an acquired taste.

Gilmour is a much stronger singer, though Pink Floyd has not been half as good creatively since Waters left the band in 1983.

As the performance continues, the mood moves up and down, languishing two-thirds of the way through the show into an extended dirge before the pace picks up again and the mood becomes one of insane fury.

The show comes to its operatic climax during "The Trial," and concludes with "Outside The Wall," a welcome relief from the mental distress of the 27 songs that preceded it.

"The Wall" is the story of a man, sarcastically named "Pink," and the metaphorical wall he builds around himself. He does this because of the ineffectual relationships he has with his mother, schoolmaster, girlfriend and eventually, his fans.

"Pink" finally disintegrates into a fascist madman and goes to trial. There he faces the people in his past who helped build his wall. In the end he is convicted for "showing feelings of an almost human nature," and his punishment is to have his protective wall torn down.

During the performances of "The Wall" tour, an actual wall was constructed while the band played the set. Halfway through the show, the wall completely obscured the band until the end where it was torn down following the trial sequence.

"The Wall" was experimental two decades ago, and it remains experimental today, even with the advent of sampling, high-tech gizmos and modern art rock bands like Radiohead. Pink Floyd, at the height of their creative and commercial success, combined blues rock riffs, dark, languid melodies, theatrical live performances and grand thematic concepts to create the paradigm of psychedelic art rock.

"The Wall" was probably the ultimate example of this concept, and "The Wall Live" is a fresh look at one of the greatest rock albums of all time.

Storytellers worth hearing

High-profile performers add more wealth to their music

Various Artists
VH1's Storytellers
Interscope Records

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

According to VH1, every song has a story. Kinda cheesy if you ask me. Anyway, VH1 has their own story to tell with their album, VH1 Storytellers, a compilation of songs that were performed on the cable station's popular series. Some of the artists that made the cut include David Bowie, Jewel, Dave Matthews, James Taylor, Counting Crows and Stevie Nicks.

VH1 Storytellers is much different than most common live albums. The CD does not brag to be unplugged, live in concert or any other cliché that can be affiliated with live music. Instead, it just takes a lot of different sounds and mixes them together. Even some songs on the album are a mixed variety of sounds. John Mellencamp shares his legendary song, "Jack and Diane," with rapper Moe Z for an unusual, but none-the-less entertaining duet.

Storytellers was obviously not just thrown together to try to make money. There was a very conscious effort to take the best material possible, and make a quality album. The album has some very positive highlights. There is a truly awesome version of "Rain King," by the Counting Crows, and Lisa Loeb's "Stay," supports the claim that she may be the best one hit wonder of the 1990's. John Popper, lead singer of Blues Traveler, has an enlightening story about his friend Stevie, who he hadn't seen in a very long time. He wrote the song "Regarding Steven" as a letter to his friend to try to get back in touch.

Some of the stories on the CD have been told over and over again. Dave Matthews performers a drawn-out version of "Crash Into Me," with Tim Reynolds that he calls, "simply about the worship of women." The song is actually quite good, but after seeing the Matthews and Reynolds episode when it originally aired, I think that the selection of that song was a bit weak. "Ants Marching," and "Crush" would have made much better choices. Also, Jewel's "Who Will Save Your Soul" and Natalie Merchant's "Carnival" are overused songs with hackneyed messages that wore out their welcome a long time ago. Neither song really adds anything great to the album. They're just there because they are the most popular, and best songs that each performer has.

It is very nice to see a combination of old and new material on Storytellers. Mixing Elvis Costello, The Bee Gees, and James Taylor with Sheryl Crow and The Counting Crows was a very good idea. In general, the album appeals to almost anyone. VH1 also plans to donate one million dollars of the album's profit to City of Hope. Storytellers is very easy listening to some quality songs, that will not disappoint. B

Wrestling boss McMahon has XFL ready to rumble

By Leonard Shapiro
The Washington Post

X marks the spot Saturday, Feb. 3, 2001, on calendars all around the Stamford, Conn., headquarters of the World Wrestling Federation (WWF) and the midtown Manhattan offices of NBC Sports. On that day, only nine months away, those two disparate organizations will join forces to bring another professional football league – the XFL – to eight cities and an American public they believe will stay tuned to their version of what they say will be real football.

Over the past 25 years, two other leagues began playing spring games in hopes of taking advantage of the country's NFL love affair. Both the World Football League of the mid-1970s and the U.S. Football League of the mid-1980s failed. Strangled by overly ambitious owners, they left unpaid bills, shattered dreams and a slew of lawsuits in their wake.

But the primary minds behind the XFL – pro wrestling entrepreneur Vince McMahon and the savvy promotional and marketing people in his billion-dollar empire – believe they have the right product, a perfect TV partner, the proper time of year, the expertise and the moxie to make this league soar.

Never mind that they haven't acquired a single player, coach or general manager. Never mind that not one stadium lease has been signed in any of the cities XFL officials have targeted for their rollout next winter, six days after Super Bowl XXXV. (The cities identified as possible franchise sites are New York, Los Angeles, Washington, San Francisco, Miami, San Antonio, Orlando, Fla. and Birmingham, Ala.)

What XFL officials do have is a splashy $30 million partnership with NBC Sports to televise games for 12 consecutive weeks (10 regular season, two playoffs) on Saturday night, live in prime time. Still to come will be a national basic cable contract for Sunday games that likely will be announced in the next two months.

All eight franchises – with expansion planned after the first year – will be owned by the WWF, eliminating the possibility of a greedy team owner trying to sign players and buy championships.

The XFL's playing rules will similar to the NFL's but with some significant differences. There will be no fair catches on punts. A receiver will need to have only one foot in bounds to make a legal reception. The XFL will use a 35-second play clock, instead of the NFL's 45-second clock, to add more plays. Halftime will be only 10 minutes, the better to get back to the action quickly.

Players can celebrate any way they want. Socks will be allowed to droop and jerseys won't have to be tucked in, both NFL fashion police no-nos. Trash talk will be encouraged on and off the field, the better to grab headlines, build rivalries and, eventually, swell the television ratings.

NBC Sports will have microphones everywhere. In the huddle. On coaches. On helmets and referees' caps and lapels. Cameras and announcers will be in the locker room for the pregame talk, halftime adjustments and the postgame scene. In-game interviews will be allowed from the bench area.

a game in international play. His duties in the 1990 World Games earned him Most-Valuable-Player honors. He also played for the New York Saints of the Major Indoor Lacrosse League (MILL), retiring after nine seasons as the all-time saves leader.

Earning All-America honors in all four seasons with the Minutewomen, Bowsher led UMass to four consecutive NCAA Tournament final four appearances. She guided the Maroon and White to a 65-9-4 record in her four years, which included a 20-game winning streak that was ensured in the 1987 national championship game, a 2-0 loss to North Carolina. Bowsher finished her career with 66 points (22 goals, 22 assists), which was good enough for All-New England honors each season.

Yesker was an integral part of the Minutewomen's 1973 AIAW Intercollegiate Gymnastics National Championship squad, finishing fourth in the all-around, helping her earn All-America honors in addition to an invitation to the 1973 World University Games.

A member of the 50th Anniversary Yankee Conference Team, Kimball helped a squad that rushed for over 3,000 yards in 1978, the year the Minutemen advanced to the Division I-AA National Championship. He was drafted by the Pittsburgh Steelers in the seventh round of the 1979 National Football League Draft. After two seasons in the Canadian Football League, Kimball moved to the NFL, where he earned a Super Bowl ring with the 1984 champion Redskins.

getting on base consistently. And, the Braves finally have some real threats coming off their bench in the form of veterans Bobby Bonilla and Wally Joyner. Plus, they're winning while the newly acquired Reggie Sanders mires in an 0-for-forever slump.

However, the Braves are not the only team that put together an impressive opening month. The Chicago White Sox scored a MLB record 181 runs in April. The team is 17-9 and currently sits atop the American League Central. Frank Thomas looks like he's returned to old form. The Big Hurt is hitting .358 with an impressive .440 on-base percentage and 21 RBIs. The Sox are also getting great production around Thomas. Maggio Ordonez (.281, 17 RBIs), Carlos Lee (.308, 23 RBIs) and Greg Norton (.333, 15 RBIs) have all had great starts in the four, six and seven spots respectively.

Lastly, props to the St. Louis Cardinals who belted a record-tying 55 home runs in April.

ued. Kulak, in his second at-bat of the frame, singled to right field to plate Boulanger and push Ellerbrock to third. UMass racked up the eighth and final run of the inning when Ellerbrock slid into home in the midst of a Kulak rundown in the base paths.

The game probably could have ended after one inning. Eight frames and a Kulak homer later, UMass found itself grasping a win and 17 unanswered runs.

"You know, we didn't let them back in," coach Stone said. "We didn't give them any hope."

Minuteman starting pitcher Nick Skirkanich had his arm set on cruise control for the six innings he threw. Skirkanich struck out four Saint batters and allowed just three hits to improve his record to 4-2 on the season.

Kulak led the Minuteman assault going 4-for-4, scoring three runs and driving in two. Boulanger went 3-for-5 on the day with an RBI. Alueri joined Gorneault to combine for four hits, six runs and four RBI.

"We had our hitting shoes on all day," Stone said. "We played every inning flat out. you know it's tough to get a shut out. Hopefully we'll continue to play like that."

UMass will host Harvard today at 3 p.m.

game.

"There was really no intensity in the first game," she said.

"I thought we had a lot better heart in the second. Even though we won the first game, we didn't feel like we did. We won by the score but not by the way that we felt we played."

As it did in the second contest, UMass tallied all of its runs in one inning. Freshman designated player Kaila Holtz, who totaled four RBI between both games, broke the 0-0 dead lock with a two-run triple in the bottom of the fourth. The very next batter, third baseman Scooter Wheeler, drove in Rooney with base hit, extending the Minutewoman lead to 3-0. Boston College scored its lone run in the top of the sixth inning.

After a Sunday's split with Dayton – that gave UMass sole position of first-place in its conference – Sortino felt that her predominantly underclassmen squad learned a valuable lessons about nerves. And the Minutewomen kept their poise yesterday to rally for a sweep of both games.

"I could have put the sisters of the blind out there for our first game on Sunday," Sortino said. "It didn't matter who it was. They would have made it a barnburner. They were so tight... I think we're finally starting to get the idea [about being nervous]."

UMass will next play tomorrow when it hosts Brown for a 3 p.m. double-header.

Kunkel's five powers UMass in ECAC finale

Although they don't have a winning record, the Minutemen have battled for their six victories

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

The records would certainly suggest that the magnitude of a potential victory would be quite miniscule. For the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, however, a win would speak volumes about its character.

With the mythical New England Championship looming this weekend, the Minutemen took time off to complete their first ever Eastern College Athletic Conference slate, taking on the Scarlet Knights of Rutgers in a mid-week matinee.

UMASS	18
RUTGERS	11

Led by a close-knit defense and a pinch of Rich Kunkel, UMass wrapped up fifth place in the league with a 18-11 victory yesterday at Richard F. Garber Field.

The win puts the Maroon and White (6-7, 2-4 ECAC) in a position to finish at .500, an accomplishment they were unable to achieve last season. Waiting in the wings is Brown, which, before last season's forfeit, dashed UMass' title hopes with a 14-6 drubbing in Amherst two years back.

A balanced attack led the way for UMass, but Rich Kunkel separated himself from the pack, scoring five goals and adding an assist in the win. Alex Racioppi, Jeff Seals and Don Little each added a pair of scores for the Minutemen's cause, who bounced back after an offensive lapse against Syracuse four days ago.

Rutgers never held the lead, but UMass was never safe either.

The game was tied, 8-7, with 9:17 remaining in the third but Chris Fiore's unassisted goal moments later started the Minutemen's late push. The freshman standout from Freeport, N.Y. fired the ball past Knights goaltender George Counes.

The shot came from a tough angle on the left side to increase the lead to two goals. The base of the lead would never crumble, as UMass held a multi-goal advantage for the duration of the game.

UMass closed well, turning a 12-10 edge into a six-goal cushion just minutes later. After Mike McLaughlin scored his first and second goals of the game, cutting the lead to two with 7:02 remaining, the Maroon and White attack came alive, picking up the pace almost immediately. Seals took the ensuing faceoff and rifled the ball past Counes.

Twelve seconds later, Tim Socha found the back of the net off a feed from Kunkel. Soon enough, Rutgers was well on its way home, at least mentally, as goals by Racioppi and Kunkel built the lead to six with 4:36 remaining in the game.

"We had transition opportunities and we finished it off," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

"We hadn't played a game like this since Boston College. It's important for our confidence."

It seemed as though UMass had an answer for any sort of threat the Scarlet Knights posed.

After the Minutemen had opened up a three-goal lead midway through the second, Rutgers chopped it down to one on three occasions before the end of the half. The Knights, however, could never scale the mountain completely.

The Knights functioned for the majority of the game without leading scorer Keith Cromwell.

The junior attackman entered the contest as the nation's third-leading point-getter, averaging close to six points each time out (31 goals, 32 assists in 12 games prior).

Yesterday, though, Matt MacFarland and the Minuteman defense smothered the playmaker, holding him to a pair of goals, one coming when UMass goaltender Chris Campolettano (13 saves) was completely out of position.

Racioppi got the Minutemen started, dodging right side and gunning the ball between the pipes for his 15th on the season at the 13:35 mark of the opening quarter. His partner in crime the past few weeks, Kevin Leveille, scored under a minute later, scooping up a rebound in front of the cage and shoveling it home.

With one of the ECAC's most potent attacks, Rutgers could scrape together just a single goal in the opening, that coming with 8:24 remaining when Scott Massey found room in close and deposited the ball by Campolettano.

Kunkel then ran off two straight, both unassisted, scoring point blank on each occasion to open up a 4-1 lead after one.

UMass awaits the Bears of Brown (7-6, 3-3 Ivy League) this weekend. The Ivy Leaguers will take on Fairfield this afternoon before both teams close their seasons with the finale at Garber.

The contest also comes almost exactly one year after the tragic death of Eric Sopracasa, who passed away suddenly after being hit in the chest with a ball during practice for last year's showdown with the Bears.

"[If we win], the seniors go out winners, we all go out as winners, and we have something to build on next year," Cannella said.

"I'd like to win it for Eric," Cannella added. "I think Thursday and Friday will probably be tougher but I hope on Saturday, they'll use his fight, his attitude to inspire them."

Late rally seals sweep for Minutewomen

Young UMass team shows veteran poise to steal game two from BC

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

In early March, Massachusetts softball coach Elaine Sortino was looking for a way to remedy her young team's 0-9 start. Just two months later, she couldn't cure the excitement in the UMass dugout, as her Minutewomen rallied for a 5-1 win in game two of a double-header against visiting Boston College.

UMASS	5
BOSTON COLL.	1

UMass also took game one, 3-1, and in a matter of weeks, a once flustered team suddenly became a powerhouse again.

Trailing 1-0 in the bottom of the sixth inning of the second contest, the Minutewomen (28-20, 11-3 Atlantic 10) quickly tied contest with the help of two Eagle errors, one of which plated catcher Nikki Faessler.

Then UMass centerfielder Teri Rooney smacked the ball at Boston College (20-23, 9-7 Big East) shortstop Cara Blumfield, who committed the team's third miscue of the inning and allowed another Minutwonian run to score.

Suddenly the floodgates were open for a UMass squad that had looked a bit stifled through the first five frames.

"The thing we did differently in the sixth inning was put the ball on the ground and they bobbled it around, and that gave us an opportunity," Sortino said. "I thought we did well keeping our poise today. We did a good job not getting frustrated. It's important to learn that we should play like this all the time."

After allowing a solo home run in the top of the second inning, Minutewoman starting pitcher Carrie Jeffries, who admittedly was not at her best, battled to keep the Eagles base runners from scoring. With the help of a nasty change-up, Jeffries blanked B.C. for the remainder of the game, working a near perfect seventh inning for the complete-game victory.

Sortino had nothing but praise for the grit shown by her junior hurler, who sometimes struggles with runners on base.

"I thought Carrie got herself out of some pretty big jams," Sortino said. "But she kept them off-balance and she hit her pitches."

While some of her pitches were not working, Jeffries agreed that she was successful by mixing them up and keeping her poise after falling behind batters.

"Thankfully, my change-up was on," she said. "Today I threw it 10 times more than [I usually do]. I was able to fight through it, though."

Like Jeffries, sophomore Jen Hadley also gave Boston College multiple fits from the mound in game one. Fresh off a shutout against Dayton last Sunday, Hadley continued her hot streak, allowing only one run and no walks during the opener. According to Sortino, the first contest left a sour taste in the mouths of her Minutewomen, who played with little fire and simply rode the laurels of a well-pitched

Saints bats holey in loss; UMass hammers Siena

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

There's a rumor that the left field scoreboard of Earl Lorden Field can't emit any number over 19. Yesterday, the Massachusetts baseball team scored 17 runs.

Oh well.

The Lorden scoreboard buzz will carry on and the Minutemen will just relish another victory, this time a 17-0 romp over Siena College.

It was an all-UMass (21-16-1) show and there is no way anyone could state otherwise. Siena (14-25) just didn't have it.

SIENA	0

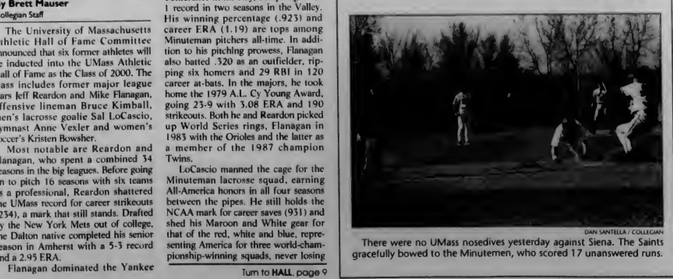
"They beat us up today," Siena coach Tony Rossi said. "Our club's a little different than last year, we lost some key kids and our defense is no way near as good as it was, but [UMass] has a good ball club. You can't take anything away from them."

"We're tough to beat," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "When we play well we're a pretty good ball club. It's good to see. Hopefully we'll get on a roll here."

Crack. Bang. Boom. Eight runs. And voila! You've got the bottom half of the first inning for UMass.

After Shaun Skeffington led off the frame with a single down the third baseline and past a diving third baseman, Mike Kulak roped a single of his own to right advancing Skeffington to the other corner. Next up was Nick Gorneault who lifted a fastball off of Saints' starter Jeff Reardon (not to be confused with the former UMass pitcher and Class of 2000 Hall of Fame inductee of the same name) a couple feet over the right-field fence and into the awaiting shrubbery for a three run lead.

"The homerun was on the first pitch, a fastball coming on the outside corner," Gorneault said. "Before the game I saw that the wind was blowing out of Lorden to right field so I knew what pitch I was looking for. It was a perfect pitch... and the wind just carried it out."



Kevin O'Connell and Jeff Altieri, who reached by way of walks, then scored when Gavin Clark ripped a double down the right field line.

As Clark took his lead from second base, the next batter, Matt Boulanger helped execute a perfect hit-and-run, sending the ball between Siena's first and second baseman to bring Clark in to score. Reardon walked UMass catcher Tom Ellerbrook before being relieved by Brent Wengert.

Reardon went one-third of an inning, giving up eight runs on five hits while walking three Minutemen.

When the inning contin-

There were no UMass nosedives yesterday against Siena. The Saints gracefully bowed to the Minutemen, who scored 17 unanswered runs.

Select MLB pitchers soaring, but the long ball reigns king of April

Randy Johnson finished April 6-0 with an anemic 0.91 ERA. Neither Tom Glavine (5-0) nor Greg Maddux (4-0) has lost a game for the Braves. James Baldwin is 4-0 with a 3.12 ERA for the surprising White Sox. Orlando Hernandez (4-1, 3.50 ERA) is carrying a sluggish Yankees staff. And, Pedro Martinez (5-0, 1.27 ERA) is... well Pedro. But, don't fool yourself. April was the month of the long ball.

The month saw the amassing of some incredible offensive statistics – not the least of which was 931 total home runs. That number is the most home runs hit in one month ever. It's 140 more than last April. And leading the way is not Mark McGwire, who has totaled 193 home runs over the past three years. It's not Sammy Sosa, who has 129 dongs over the past two seasons. It's not even the freshly-relocated Ken Griffey Jr. whose 405 career home runs are on pace to top the all-time king, Hank Aaron.

Adam Martignetti

No, Jermaine Dye is currently leading the majors in home runs with 11 for the Kansas City Royals. Dye, a former Brave, has been injured for large parts of the past two seasons, before exploding to start the 2000 schedule. Dye is currently hitting .373 with a blistering .814 slugging percentage and 28 RBIs.

As a tried and true Atlanta Braves fan, it's not easy to see a former top prospect lighting up opposing pitching in another city, but I can't complain. The Braves have ripped off 14 wins a row. Andres Galarraga is leading the National League with 10 home runs, coming off last season's cancer surgery. John Rocker is keeping his mouth shut and has five saves, despite seeing a full moon in San Diego recently. New shortstop Rafeal Furcal has provided defensive stability and much needed speed. Quilvio Veras is

Class of 2000 announced for UMass Athletic Hall of Fame

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Athletic Hall of Fame Committee announced that six former athletes will be inducted into the UMass Athletic Hall of Fame as the Class of 2000. The class includes former major league stars Jeff Reardon and Mike Flanagan, offensive lineman Bruce Kimball, men's lacrosse goalie Sal LoCascio, gymnast Anne Vexler and women's soccer's Kristen Bowsher.

Most notable are Reardon and Flanagan, who spent a combined 34 seasons in the big leagues. Before going on to pitch 16 seasons with six teams as a professional, Reardon shattered the UMass record for career strikeouts (234), a mark that still stands. Drafted by the New York Mets out of college, the Dalton native completed his senior season in Amherst with a 5-3 record and a 2.95 ERA.

Flanagan dominated the Yankee Conference in his stay, compiling a 12-1 record in two seasons in the Valley. His winning percentage (.923) and career ERA (1.19) are tops among Minuteman pitchers all-time. In addition to his pitching prowess, Flanagan also batted .320 as an outfielder, tripling six homers and 29 RBI in 120 career at-bats. In the majors, he took home the 1979 A.L. Cy Young Award, going 23-9 with 3.08 ERA and 190 strikeouts. Both he and Reardon picked up World Series rings, Flanagan in 1983 with the Orioles and the latter as a member of the 1987 champion Twins.

LoCascio manned the cage for the Minuteman lacrosse squad, earning All-America honors in all four seasons between the pipes. He still holds the NCAA mark for career saves (931) and shed his Maroon and White gear for that of the red, white and blue, representing America for three world-championship-winning squads, never losing

SGA passes budget unanimously

Discusses New Students Program

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

In what members of the Student Government Association called unprecedented, the student governing body passed its budget for next year unanimously.

Beyond that, no Registered Student Organizations appealed at the meeting, another first for a body that has, at times, had to go through the budget line by line to see that it got passed.

After a brief presentation, Amy Pellegrino, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, sat through a roll-call vote on a budget that required at least one fourteen-hour meeting and a week of appeals. The vote ended up being 46 to zero, bringing cheers and clapping from the SGA.

"It's unprecedented," Pellegrino said. "I am ecstatic. It just shows that the committee did a absolutely thorough job with all the allocations."

"It's kind of ironic," she continued, "usually we have people jam packed in here to voice some sort of opinion, now this year we have people coming to support it."

There had been a threat that the Senate wouldn't be able to maintain to quorum during the meeting, but the issue was never mentioned after the roll-call vote for the budget.

Ken Campbell, Central Area Governor-elect, was "psyched." "I don't think it's ever happened before," he said.

Senate Trustee Seth Avakian then, without any presentation, asked for questions related to the motion proposed by Senate president Jeff Howe. The motion asked that all male employees of the university's New Student's Program be trained in the "Mentors in Violence Prevention" program, and that all female employees go through the "Rape/Aggression Defense" program.

Some of the senators present brought concerns of discrimination between the sexes, where only males would be asked to participate in the MVP program and females would be the only ones asked to partake in the RAD program.

Commuter Senator Zachary Spilman motioned to amend the motion to include both males and females in each training session.

"We're all mature enough to know what's going on behind closed doors," Spilman said. "My concern isn't with the content of the programs, it's that we're requiring different things for different sexes. What's next? Different ethnicities?"

Mike McCarthy, Chair of the Dining Services Committee asked whether or not a man is "biologically the same as a woman," to which Spilman responded: "It's not a question of what sticks out where."

Avakian pointed out that the MVP training is specifically designed for men, and getting men to discuss the problems surrounding men's violence against women.

The motion was eventually amended to allow both sexes to participate in either program separately from the gender to which the program is intended to apply.

Senator Mark Boniface presented his proposal to make the Finance Reserve Committee, currently a subcommittee of the Ways and Means committee, a self-governing body within the SGA.

"The finance reserve committee has been standing on its own for the past three years," Boniface said, adding that the committee thought it should do so officially. The motion passed without debate.

Avakian took the attention of the senate once again to speak on behalf of a motion written by Howe.

"It has always been my pet peeve," he said, about the long degree audits given to students.

"I always wonder what classes I need to take," he said.

The motion calls for the PeopleSoft version of the Degree Audit to be delivered to the SGA for approval before being sent to the student body.

"This way we see it first," Avakian said.

Avakian's next motion called for the retesting of the North Village Apartments for lead paint.

According to the Senate trustee, the Lincoln Apartments, which were found to have lead paint in them, were tested once and said to be safe, but when tested with more sophisticated equipment were found not to be.

"Lead paint is wicked bad for kids," Avakian pointed out "Especially if they chew on it."

The motion passed unanimously.

Asian Latino African and Native American Caucus Senator Patrick Callahan stepped up to introduce his proposal, that SGA senators hold office hours for one hour out of every month.

His proposal was met with much displeasure among senators.

Senator Rob Moore brought up the point that the odds of a constituent finding out "where you are when you are" are very low.

"I am pro-student, but I am anti-wasting time," he said.

Another point brought up by the senator, which was greeted with much laughter by the audience, was that nowhere in the motion did it say that the office hour had to be held all at once.

"I could hold one minute here, one minute there," he said.

Howe spoke in favor of the motion because it is "intended to build a bridge between our constituency and this body."

The motion failed in a 20-19 vote, with one senator abstaining.

Minuteman's issue trashed

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

When the Minuteman newspaper staff ran down to the loading docks at the basement of the University of Massachusetts Campus Center, they had expected to see a stack of newspapers, but instead they found nothing.

The Minuteman is published by the Silent Majority, independent of the Republican Club, and represents the "conservative voice" of the student body.

Chairman Zachary Spilman said they have not had any problems in the past with the distribution of the newspaper. He said they usually send the paper to the publisher, Turley Publications in Palmer, on Sunday to have it printed up and distributed to campus on Wednesdays.

According to Spilman, they were running behind in putting the paper out. "When I called them that afternoon, they said it had been delivered in the morning and I said, 'that's the greatest news I've heard all day,' and I went down to the loading dock and it wasn't there," Spilman said.

They arrived at the conclusion that the papers must have been recovered by the Recycling Department and brought into the area to be recycled.

When Spilman and the newspaper staff arrived at the recycling area, the personnel directed them to the holding area, "a large area full of open top dumpsters, 15 feet deep and very, very wide," Spilman said.

According to Spilman, they had approximately printed 6,500 copies and had only recovered nearly three to four thousand of the total.

The Silent Majority met with Interim Vice Chancellor of Administrative Affairs Javier Cevallos to discuss whether possible litigation charges could be brought forth against the University if the newspaper had been targeted.

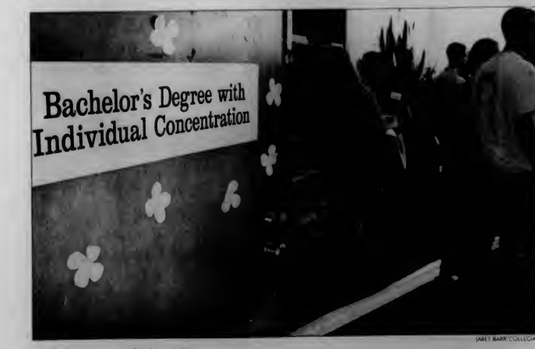
"Javier was very concerned and he said that if it was an accident there will be an apology and if it was done on purpose, there will be an investigation," Spilman said. "I have every faith that the process will work itself out."

Jim Eltringham, interim editor-in-chief of the Minuteman, is concerned with the issue of the First Amendment right to "freedom of speech." He said it is important to ensure that a group's voice, such as the Silent Majority, isn't being silenced.

"If someone goes by and says 'hey there's that newspaper, I don't like their message,' and throws it in, that's a problem," Eltringham said. "We're 90 percent certain that this is an honest mistake but we're just double checking as we hope anyone would do in this kind of situation."

Senior staff member Michael Rossettie said it is his understanding after having spoken to Recycling management that their policy guarantees not removing pamphlets and newspapers unless they had been removed from their plastic delivery casing or had been sitting on the loading dock for more than a couple days.

According to Rossettie, he found the newspapers in recycling bins without their plastic covering but said that they were bundled up and scattered all over the place.



"Javier Cevallos said he was willing to pay for the run if it was an accident, but he said that if it was not an accident he'd be willing to look into a criminal investigation," Rossettie said. "If it turns out to not be an accident and if it was a deliberate intent, then we sue, but I don't believe that's what happened."

Rossettie said he is willing to review the surveillance cameras that are installed around the loading dock to discover what exactly occurred. "We're trying to get a copy of the surveillance tape to see exactly what took place," Rossettie said. "If there was any kind of tampering we would like to know so it's at least worth looking at the tape."

Spilman said he plans on taking the course of action that will bring results.

"I want to be a voice of reason and do something reasonable," Spilman said. "I don't want hysterics to break out but at the same time, they threw out our newspaper."

Festival showcases BDIC accomplishments

BDIC held its career fair last night

Erica Mattison
Collegian Staff

Last evening the first annual Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration (BDIC) Spring Project Festival and Alumni Forum gave students, staff and alumni the opportunity to acknowledge the work of senior BDIC majors.

The BDIC program allows students to create their own interdisciplinary majors with the guidance of faculty.

Those in attendance were pleased with the idea of holding an event with the purpose of showcasing BDIC work. "It [the event] is cool because it can show non-BDIC and BDIC students that you really can do something with the major," commented junior Chimene LaRoche, who works in the BDIC office.

Mya Poe, the instructor of the BDIC junior year writing course, came up with the idea for this festival. In her class, students work on projects that have to do with their areas of concentration. BDIC Coordinator Linda Roney explained the reason for the event. "We thought it would really be nice if they [the students] could display the products of their labor."

The alumni in attendance represented a variety of fields.

By inviting alumni to the event, students can form "connections with the real world," said Roney.

While at UMass a decade ago, Carol Roy's concentration was in sales strategy and social behavior. She is now the owner of a real estate company in South Hadley.

"It [BDIC] made me explore my options more than I would have if I had gone through a traditional program," she said. "I really had to think about thing... because [BDIC involves] putting together your own puzzle."

Roy also commented on the value of the Career Center in finding out about possibilities. "I have to thank BDIC for letting me explore my dream."

Students attended this event for a variety of reasons. The screening of "Wake Up Angel" by Michael Sternbach is what attracted junior acting and writing major Kevin Kelleher.

Other parts of the festival included a public health panel, and roundtables in business, internet and environmental and urban policy.

Alumni of BDIC have gone in a number of directions. Rebecca Sozanski, who graduated last spring with a concentration in urban studies, is now a Masters student in regional planning. "I got fundamental skills that really help me," she said of her undergraduate experience. "[In BDIC] you get to use all the resources on campus," she added.

Sozanski also commented on the value of combining disciplines that is exemplified by BDIC. "BDIC is cutting edge because companies and academic institutions are trying to be more interdisciplinary."

Other paths alums chose include art therapy, recruiting, marketing, editing, accounting and graduate studies.

Jeremy Lakota, who is graduating this month, will be working as a technical writer for the Staples Corporate Headquarters in Framingham. He credits the BDIC with allowing him to easily combine his areas of interest.

APO to host benefit auction

By Jason Tronkle
Collegian Staff

Alpha Phi Omega (APO), kappa omicron chapter of the University of Massachusetts will be hosting the first annual Good and Services Benefit Auction at 6 p.m. on Monday in the Student Union Ballroom.

The money raised will benefit five charities including March of Dimes, Shriner's Hospital of Springfield, Western Massachusetts Girl Scout Council, Boy Scout Troop 11 in Northampton and the Amherst Survival Center.

A silent auction will take place at 6 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom. Appetizers and refreshments will be served. At 7 p.m., the live auction will take place and deserts will be served.

The event will include the auctioning of VIP passes to the show formally know as Regis and Kathy Lee, Chicago Broadway tickets, Ultimate Fitness as well as restaurants certificates, sports memorabilia, sports tickets, ski passes, ski resorts, artwork, gift certificates from local businesses, Blue Man group tickets, gift baskets, hair products and much more.

Alissa Daniels, a sophomore pre-elementary education and English major, is the pledge trainer and auction chair for the event. She said that because it is a non-profit organization, all donations are tax deductible. Admission is $10 dollars for students with a valid I.D. and children with no auction coupon, $20 dollars for adults with ten-dollar auction coupon return.

APO is a co-ed national service fraternity whose cardinal principles, leadership, friendship and service are based in boy scouts principles. They must meet requirements of performing various service projects on campus, the surrounding communities and service organizations.

According to Daniels, APO has been working on organizing the auction for the past four months. They are hoping for a turnout between 100 to 200 people. She said some of the funding raised would benefit APO towards assisting them in hosting other service projects.

"I'm excited about it and looking for a large turnout because it's a good cause and it's a lot of fun to watch bidding wars," Daniels said. "This is us, we started this, we do have various people from APO staff coming to watch our event and other chapters have done similar events, but nothing this large; night/day auctions, charity balls, but never this."

According to Daniels, they have 30-45 prizes they will be auctioning and they're hoping to raise a total of $5,000 to $6,000 dollars.

"Once we take in our final costs and we pay bills, we'll decide as a fraternity what percentages are going to which organization," Daniels said.

She said these kinds of events have been positive in the past and it is their hope that they will receive the support and contribution from the community to make the night a success.

"We really need the support and appreciation of as many people as possible coming to the event," Daniels said. "We can accommodate 300 people and would love to see that capacity filled, all for a good cause."

She said they have sent flyers and press releases all over the Five-College area and is hoping that this will contribute in getting the word out there.

"We have sent twenty press releases around Hampshire county, postered Amherst Center, Northampton, [UMass] campus, and we have various members of various local hospitals distributing flyers for students and distributing them to faculty and staff," Daniels said.

Reservations may be made at the door or prior to the event by calling Alissa at 253-4275. She said it would be better to buy tickets prior to the event as they fill fast, but she said she was expecting to seat most of the people at the door.

According to Daniels, APO has formulated ways they can improve next year's auction based on what they've learned from this year. She said one of the things they are hoping to work on includes allowing two semesters of planning and organizing for next May.

Failure plays role in collapse

By Richard Bray & Brady Creel
The Battalion (Texas A&M U.)

(U-WIRE) COLLEGE STATION, TX – Organizational failures on the part of Texas A&M University administrators and bonfire student leaders spanning generations contributed to – but did not directly cause – the 1999 Aggie Bonfire collapse, the Special Commission on the 1999 Aggie Bonfire found.

Leo Linbeck, Jr., chairperson of the commission, said the University Administration's lack of control over the situation was one of the reasons bonfire collapsed.

"The physical failure and causal factors [of the collapse] were in fact driven by an organizational failure," he said. "This failure – which has its roots in the decisions and actions by both students and University officials over many, many years – created an environment in which a complex and dangerous structure was allowed to be built without adequate physical or engineering controls."

Linbeck said University administration and students failed to keep bonfire construction safe for a variety of reasons.

"This organizational failure is complex, but includes such things as the absence of an appropriate written design or design process, a cultural bias toward predisposed courses of action and the lack of a proactive risk management approach," he said.

Linbeck said a number of factors involving student actions were not a factor in the collapse.

"Although there is evidence of drinking, horseplay and other irresponsible behaviors, none of them played a role in the collapse," he said. "Also, there was no evidence that poor individual workmanship, excessive fatigue, poor compliance or sabotage played a role in the collapse."

Veronica Callaghan, a member of the commission, said the investigation discovered numerous examples of irresponsibility on the part of student workers. Callaghan said the University did not hold students to the same expectations of professionalism that other organizations do when working on a project the size of bonfire.

"In the experience of the investigation team, Texas A&M is unique in allowing this level of irresponsibility in and around a construction project of this magnitude. Clearly, there is the potential for these behaviors to affect worker performance, and thus perhaps structural integrity, which is why they are strictly prohibited at professionally managed construction sites.

"We found considerable evidence of irresponsible behavior in bonfire," she said. "Alcohol use was substantial, although student leaders reportedly prohibited alcohol or obviously impaired workers from working on stack."

Our Opinion

Keep the peace

Everyone needs to just calm down.

Yes, the Spring Concert in this Sunday. Yes, the residential areas are putting on their shindigs to celebrate the year just past. Yes, it is getting warm again and the weather is very nice. Yes, it does seem to be a good time to be a UMass student.

But that doesn't mean that things should get out of hand.

It doesn't matter how much you like beer. Don't show up to Bowl Day outrageously drunk in public and cause a nuisance for everyone else. It doesn't make it any more fun for those around you who have to deal with your inebriated self, and it doesn't put you in the best graces of those who are trying to keep the peace and help out the law in these massive-crowd conditions.

It doesn't matter how much you like Fuzzbubble. If you aren't as close to the stage as you like, don't attack the people in front of you. They can't move, and they don't enjoy your elbows forcing their way in between their ribs. Don't try to crowd-surf your way to the front – the person whom you kick in the eye on the way down may well be much, much bigger than you, and none of us want you to be force-fed your shoes as revenge. Not that we'd disagree should it actually happen.

It doesn't matter how much you like weed. Don't deal it (or any narcotic specialties, either) at any of these events, because the cops will arrest you. And they will be right to do so. The Spring Concert is open to anyone who doesn't want to go here who buys a ticket – and that includes elementary-school age Method Man fans as well. That's a real great impression to make on the community as Dad walks his son into the Mullins Center past the drug deal. We here at the Collegian hope everyone with illegal drugs outside the Spring Concert (or any other event hereabouts) is caught by the police and thrown in jail for lengthy periods of time.

It doesn't matter if it rains on a warm night. Keep your clothes on.

It doesn't matter how nice it is outside. Go to class. Finals are coming up and you know you'll be kicking yourself if all you do is stay inside and practice being Tony Hawk on your Playstation all day long.

In short, there is no reason for everybody to overreact and go crazy just because the weather's nice and there are several very cool events going down in a very short period of time. Nobody needs to be hurt, miserable, arrested or failing because of it. Always, when at the Spring Concert or any of the area events, think of safety first. Don't put anything in your body that's going to make you lose control, don't do anything reckless that's going to hurt yourself or others.

If we are all careful in this hectic time of year, we can all have a good time and live to tell about it without landing in any jail cells.

Women in sports: step up and make a change

Dear UMass female student:

It has been my pleasure covering UMass sports for four years at the Collegian. I have been able to keep up my interest in sports while improving my writing skills. I watched games from the best seats in the house and only had to ask a few questions afterwards. I also got to earn a little cash along the way. Sounds easy enough.

However, after asking athletes and coaches what they thought about their teams and their performances, I have some questions I would like to ask you.

Do you like sports, at all? Do you get excited about a particular team or daydream about your old high school soccer team? Do you wish you still played if you don't anymore? Do you stick around to catch the sports broadcast at the end of the news or do you brush your teeth before David Letterman is on?

I love sports. I can't remember a time in my life that I wasn't doing something athletic, whether it was being a part of a team or playing catch with my brother. I'd rather catch a matinee at Camden Yards than find out what's going on with "Days of Our Lives." For me, I don't complain if "SportsCenter" is on because I put it on, and I would buy season tickets to the Red Sox if they would allow me to be on a pay later deal.

Here are the next questions.

Do you sometimes get upset with the coverage of women? Are you aware that female athletes make much less money than their male counterparts? Are you aware of the fact that female athletes are often referred to by their first names rather than by their last during commentary? If you notice this, do you wonder why or do you already know what I am getting at? Have you ever watched the WNBA or have any clue as to when it is on?

The glass ceiling is nothing new for women who are preparing for a career in most any field, except maybe teaching or other female-dominated careers. If you are going to call Nomar by his last name, than please call Martina, Hingis.

Kathleen Ralls

Did you know that female college sports are made the scapegoat for eliminating male sports to meet the standards of Title IX because of a ridiculous oversight that began decades ago?

Female college sports have been pigeonholed into the misconception that it is their fault that teams like the Providence baseball team have to fold in order for the number of programs be equal on both sides of the board. It isn't fair, and though I do feel bad for the individuals whose teams evaporated, it shouldn't have come to this point. Athletic departments should have equaled their teams years ago.

Why do men coach in the WNBA though there are no head female coaches in the NBA? Do you believe in North Carolina women's soccer coach Anson Torrence's theory that women react differently than man in critical and learning situations and therefore must be coached differently? Why is the men's NCAA basketball tournament simply referred to as The NCAA tournament while the other one is the Women's NCAA tournament? Are you disappointed with female-oriented magazines like Sports Illustrated for Women and Glamour Magazine?

Most men people believe that though women might have the knowledge and athletic experience to coach, it will be a long time before women are elevated to head coaching positions over men because they will have double the trouble of gaining respect. As far as coaching is concerned, until male and female children are spoiled and scolded the same way, the need to teach and coach differently will indeed exist for the majority of the population. To be honest, there are plenty of magazines with hotsos about makeup and accessories, and there is a respectable market for that, but please don't put it in my SI.

Did you have to ask yourself who Billy Jean King is when/if you found out that she is speaking at this year's graduation?

Sports Illustrated dubbed her their first "Sports Person of the Year" in 1972. Earlier in her illustrious tennis career, King was selected as "Outstanding Female Athlete of the World." You know who Babe Ruth was and he finished his career decades before she even began hers.

Did you know I have been harassed in a locker room full of men while I was trying to do my job as a sports reporter? Did you know that answers to my questions from male athletes are often taken less seriously and I wait for a male reporter to ask the same question to get the answer I was looking for? Do you know how many times my voice has been talked over in press conferences? Or how many times male reporters have made me uncomfortable with their staring and lewd comments? And I'm not of the faint of heart.

I have gotten to travel around the country. I've met famous athletes like Pete Sampras and Arnold Palmer. It's been fun. In fact, I am not the first female to lead such a life. There have been many, not plenty, but others who have done and do the same thing I do, and I know they go through the same setbacks I do.

Honestly, it's still the ol' boys club in this business. Down here at the Collegian, the boys of the sports desk rule the coup while the rest look on. Their voices dominate over the rest of the office, and their attitudes intimidate others. Don't get me wrong, they're good kids. It's just that there needs to be more of an effort for women to join the sports page. More of me, and more of you, need to come down here if you love sports and are interested in writing. Somebody asked me last week where the balance of the sports department will go when I graduate this year. What balance is a ratio of one or two to 25?

Don't be intimidated. Don't think that you don't know enough about sports or that your experiences don't compare. Do you want to be a part of a subtle but important social change? Does it matter to you? And please act like you expect to be treated as a professional, and not a possible date for Saturday night. Next year there will be one possible female returning to the department where all of the editors will be male. If any of what I mentioned above matters to you, than maybe it's time to step in and change what's wrong.

A few things I have noticed

Now, I don't mean to get you all upset, but this is going to be my last "normal" column of the semester. I still have Notes from the Campus Center Basement and my senior farewell column, but for as for my ranting and raving pieces, this is it, folks.

Now that you have wiped the tears from your faces, let's get down to business. This column is essentially going to be about all of the wonderful things I have noticed throughout my time at the University, and I'll also be giving you underclassmen (or is it underclassspeople?) a few pieces of advice. Are you ready? Oh, hells yeah.

Gary Mendese

First and foremost, I'd like to tell you what I've learned about the wildebeests that work at the Parking Services trailer. First of all, what the hell kind of job is that? "Yes, hi. I'm an overweight, unattractive whore that likes to ruin people's days. Are you guys hiring?" Is that what those women say when they're looking for jobs? I mean, come on! Their entire day is dedicated to aggravating people with tickets and/or tows – how rewarding. Whatever.

Aside from being the most aesthetically unpleasing Snuffalufagus-resembling beasts on campus, I've noticed that they're not the brightest bulbs on the Christmas tree either. Actually, they gave my roommate "Craig" a ticket Monday. There was one problem with that: he was parked in the correct lot and his sticker was clearly in the window! Hey, Chunk, put those doughnuts and potato chips down and put your damn glasses back on... it's not too difficult to read lot numbers, sweetheart.

Now, I know that not all the people that work at Parking Services are that nasty and dumb, but a lot of them have the visual appeal and intelligence of flea-ridden llamas in a petting zoo. Sorry, but it's true.

The next thing I'd like to talk to you about is the crap that people give this newspaper on a regular basis. Just to let you all know, we print 17,000 copies per day and we receive no funding from the University; we are 100 percent supported by our advertisements, and the majority of our staff does not get paid. Dozens and dozens of writers put in many hours of hard work per week to put the paper out daily, so they should be commended, not criticized.

If your name was spelled wrong in an article, get over it. If we overlooked one or two non-virgins in the Republican Club, we're sorry. If we didn't run that letter to the editor or poorly, long-winded column written by some pretentious, narcissistic, self-fornicating, militant, obsessive, eighty-five-year-old member of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), deal with it. We do our best. We make plenty of mistakes that we try to rectify, and we don't need your help. Pay more attention to your schoolwork and less attention to that typo on the Arts and Living page, and we'll all get along.

Next on my list of "observations" is that – as hard as it is for me to say – some people don't like my columns. Oh my goodness! I guess I should go jump off a building now, huh? Please... I couldn't care less about people's opinions of my columns. But the complaints just keep on pouring in. I've received some positive feedback, but mostly I get hate phone calls, e-mails and letters to the editor. Some of them just whine and complain, and some of them have actually threatened my life. Either way, I certainly get a lot of response.

In fact, at 3:00 a.m. the other night, some girl (out of the blue, I might add) was leaving a party when she told me that she and the rest of her STPEC department hated my views of Affirmative Action and "white privilege", and then she proceeded to tell me that I was a white supremacist. Well, sweety, that's kind of hard for me to be when my half-sister is half Puerto Rican and her son's father is black. I'd love my nephew even if he were green, so you can take your misguided views and rot in hell. The great Dr. Dre said, "... if ya'll don't like me, blow me!" And I think that's pretty much how I feel right now.

So this is the part where I give all of you guys some pieces of advice. Yeah, I know I'm in no position to do so, but I'm the senior here, so deal with it. Firstly, get involved at the Collegian. It's a huge newspaper and you don't have to be a journalism major to be a part of it (I'm actually a pre-med Microbiology major and I'm down here... go figure). Yeah, you'll have to deal with all of the "maroons" that complain about us, but the experience is more than rewarding.

Secondly, be yourself. And if some people don't like it, so what?! It's better to be yourself and have a few great friends than be a phony conformist with a hundred fair-weather friends. Believe me.

Finally, keep your head up high, don't let anyone push you around, and learn to say fuhgedabahdit every once in a while. You'll feel a lot better. So as I said, this is my last column, which means those graduate students that love me so much are probably tapping that keg of Diet Coke and watching Star Trek reruns right now to celebrate. But anyway, I want to let you all know that it has been a great couple of years and I hope that I have at least somewhat kept you entertained. Good luck with the rest of your time at UMass and I wish you success in life. And to those people I have pissed off over the years: I'm still not sorry. And that's just the way it is.

Method of greatness

This is my second-to-last column. Next week I have one, but it has to be a farewell where I get all misty eyed and try to leave you with some vastly important knowledge for you too ponder during this quickly advancing summer. However, I still have this column to take care of first. There is one problem, though. I'm out of ideas. I can't think of a God damned thing to expound playfully on for the next 75 lines. I guess the only thing I haven't covered during the last two years is my writing process for these columns. So here goes.

The first thing I do each Monday night before I sit down before my trusty laptop is get naked. Then I go get the mail. (Sometimes there is some good junk mail that inspires me.) Next I come back inside and get out the Crisco. I rub Crisco all over myself; I even put it in my hair. Following this I rub a fork all over myself. After a few minutes I look down at my stomach. Usually there is a distinct letter in the Crisco etching on my stomach. This etching will be the first letter of my column no matter what.

Dan Viens

Next I pop in a tape of "The Simpsons" so I can rob jokes from them. Actually, I stole that last line from when Kevin Smith spoke here. Either way, though, you understand that I steal stuff for the most part. I haven't had an original idea since my second column when I made up a story about a weird looking alien that came to earth and had the ability to heal with his orange glowing fingertip.

After "The Simpsons," I strap my feet and ankles into my upside down hanging device. I allow all the blood to rush to my head in order to invigorate and awaken my brain cells. In the background I play farm animal sounds on the stereo. The most prominent sound is the rooster. This tactic is used to fool myself into thinking that it is bright and early in the morning and time to be creative. With the blood rushing to my head and the roosters crowing in the background my creative juices begin to flow like water from a broken-down dam.

Now that my mind in working and I am prepared to spread knowledge I first give myself a good dose of fact. I sit down at my coffee table with the newest copies of the three most respected journalistic titles of all time. On my left there is a copy of Playboy, in front of me a copy of Maxim and to my right a copy of my bible, Mad Magazine. Using these, I mull over all the current events and try to give them my own spin. Plus it's so cool doing that fold-in thing on the back of Mad.

At this point my brain is in full working order and it's time to satisfy my burning hunger. I then shout to my live-in cook Madeleine. She immediately prepares my thinking meal. This consists of grits, ribs, Jell-O, a bowl of sauerkraut, lollipops, stuffing made from birds she killed in the yard, and chives. Once she is done preparing my dinner she puts all of the warm food into the blender and makes me a smoothie. The hum from the blender feels like my brain is being massaged.

Finally, it's time for me to sit down and begin typing. I place my fingertips on the home keys. For those of you scoring at home the home keys are A, S, D, F, J, K, L, and semi colon/colon. I close my eyes and begin to type. I don't type words – I just let my fingers do the walking. After seven hours of typing like that I stop and print out my document. It usually ends up being about 45 pages of what appears to be gibberish. Next I take that document to a lab in the Polymer Research building. There my document undergoes a standard analysis to see if I have formed some type of underlying theme. I feel that by doing this I am able to tap into my subconscious in order to write about what I really want to write about, not just what I think I want to write about. After waiting for five hours I get my results. Whatever the results, I go back home to my laptop and write about what my subconscious was thinking. Unfortunately the lab was closed this week so I have no idea what I really wish I were writing right now.

Finally it is time for me to begin typing again. However, 90 percent of the time I am interrupted at about this point. Whether it is my girlfriend calling or my roommates coming home from the gym, someone always interrupts me at this point. If my girlfriend calls I usually talk and giggle on the phone for a while. If my roommates come home we each sit on a different couch and talk about our feelings for about an hour. This process soothes me and clears my mind.

After this long discussion with my roommates I am prone to showering and getting into my jammies. Now that I rest atop the peak of comfort I am crisp and ready to work. I then sit down at my computer on my very comfortable couch. I wrap my blanket around my legs and feet in order to keep them at the perfect temperature. I would reckon that this temperature is somewhere in the vicinity of 76 degrees. At this point I am feeling at one with my environment and I inevitably fall asleep.

On Tuesdays I wake up late for work with no column written for the umpteenth time in a row. I get pissed off, kick my computer, and take a quick shower then head for campus. Once I get to work I get right on the Internet. Then I go to the Oregon State University web-site. Once there I go to the Ed/Op page of their newspaper from the previous day. Then I find a student named Phil Wangkow's column. I download it, print it, change all of the Oregon references to Massachusetts ones and hand in my disk. The weird thing is that besides the sentence you are reading right now and what is to follow Phil wrote everything else. This means that he has been stealing his columns from some other Ed-Op columnist from some college in the U.S. That is ridiculously diabolical. Alas, I have "written" my last real column.

SUMMER MOVIE PREVIEW

ARTS AND LIVING STAFF MEMBERS TAKE A LOOK AT THIS SUMMER'S MOVIE SCENE

YOUR GUIDE TO MOVIES THIS SUMMER

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

The summer movie marketplace is always a fascinating one; with kids out of school and home from college, there is incredibly potential for profit, and filmmakers will do anything and everything they can to claim as much of that expendable income as they can. Smaller, more independent-flavored films tend to be shouldered out by the box-office giants, but the occasional indie gem can garner enough attention to take advantage of increased theatre attendance. The market is flooded from all directions by movies eager for a piece of your movie-going dollar, and the result can be an often overwhelming field of choices. Hence, the following guide, which should let you know what to expect from the silver screen this summer.

MAY

Gladiator

If you have both an x and y chromosome, you better see this movie. Aussi Oscar nominee Russell Crowe plays a Ronan general forced to compete in the gladiatorial arenas by the tyrannical emperor. Gladiator opens this weekend, and is an excellent vacation from your term paper blues.

Battlefield: Earth

Adapted from L. Ron Hubbard's classic science fiction novel and both produced by and staring John Travolta, Battlefield: Earth tells the story of a beaten Earth's resistance to its alien conquerors. It remains to be seen how effective Travolta will be in an action lead as the alien warlord, but those in need of a comic book-style sci-fi fix should be able to find their fill.

Dinosaur

Disney takes a good thing, i.e. a beautifully rendered, fully-CGI prehistoric world of dinosaurs and primitive mammals moments before a comet strikes the Earth, and screws it up with clichéd story arcs and general silliness.

Screwed

Norm Macdonald, Danny DeVito and Lochlyn Munro star in this possibly funny farce about three guys looking to extort some money from their rich, elderly employer. Hopefully this will improve upon Macdonald's last movie, Dirty Work, an exercise in tedium.

Mission: Impossible 2

Ah, yes. This movie is going to kick our tails up one side and down the other. Tom Cruise returns as Ethan Hunt, and costars with the excellent Ving Rhames and Anthony Hopkins. John Woo, the man behind such thrill-a-minute flicks as Face/Off and Broken Arrow, will direct. Hopefully, this sequel will retain the intrigue and mystery of the first movie, while turning the action sequence and plot decipherability dials up a few notches.

Shanghai Noon

Jackie Chan's latest pain-by-numbers action movie, this time set in the Old West. I think we all know what to expect here.

POSSIBLE SURPRISES OF SUMMER 2K

MISSION: CONQUERING THE BOX OFFICE

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

What's the expression in Hollywood? Spring showers bring summer dollars. At least that usually seems to be the case.

Movies like Erin Brokovich, which became the first $100 million grosser on the new millennium earlier this year, Scream 3, which was the largest February opener ever at $34.7 million and Mission to Mars, which opened to $22.9 million on March 10, have prepared us for the summer blockbusters, but the best (or worst) is yet to come.

Hollywood's biggest box office season is ready to get under way, and it all starts tomorrow with what is fast becoming one of the biggest box office weekends of the year. During the same weekend in May two years ago, Deep Impact had the largest non-holiday opening of the year and went on to become the sixth highest grossing film that year ($140.4 million). One year later, The Mummy was the second biggest non-holiday opener of 1999 (behind only Austin Powers: The Spy Who Shagged Me) and the eighth largest grosser ($155.2 million) in the exact same weekend.

This time around, it's Gladiator that occupies the coveted weekend. The film starring Russell Crowe (L.A. Confidential, The Insider) and directed by Ridley Scott (Aliens) has already been described as "epic" and some people are saying that it could be the next Titanic (somehow that's supposed to be good). With preliminary screen counts indicating a massive number of locations, Gladiator's box office presence should be massive. The only thing that could potentially hold it back would be its two hour and thirty minute run time, but that didn't stop Saving Private Ryan ($30.6 million open at nearly three hours).

Final Verdict: Gladiator will open between $45 and $50 million with the final gross of $170 million.

John Travolta brings father of Dianetics and Scientology, L. Ron Hubbard's book onto the big screen in Battlefield Earth. The sci-fi fare has an obvious built in audience, but could struggle in the wake of Gladiator. Over five million copies of Hubbard's book have been sold worldwide. Combine this with Travolta's fan base and I'd expect numbers slightly better than The General's Daughter ($22.3 million open last year).

Final Verdict: open $25 million, final gross $105 million

When do the big blockbusters hit the theaters to be consumed by the masses? That's right – the summer. But what about the smaller films that are coming out this summer? The ones that will be lost between Mission: Impossible 2 and X-Men are sometimes the best ones. Here are the ones that I suggest you try and check out between sunbathing and shopping.

Dinosaur (May 19)
Featuring the voices of D.B. Sweeny and Julianna Margulies

This summer Disney put aside it's cartoon musical and experimented more in the field computer graphics. It's fourth totally computer-generated feature film is Disney at heart, telling the story of a lost Iguanodon trying to find his family and, of course, unite his friends against a common enemy. Yeah, it sounds sappy, but by doing this Disney is betting that kids young and old will be drawn not only to the story but also the out standing special effects. Acting against Disney is the fact that the film nabbed a PG rating, once again a departure from their other summer 'toons.

Small Time Crooks (May 19)
Starring: Woody Allen, Hugh Grant, Jon Lovitz and Michael Rappaport
Written and directed by Allen

You may not like his lifestyle choice of marrying his nineteen-year-old adopted daughter, but Allen has a gift. He makes comedies that delve into human desire, passion and insecurity, which have earned him more Oscar nominations for best screenplay than any other writer. His latest film deals with a bumbling bunch of bank robbers in Manhattan.

Screwed (May 12)
Starring: Dave Chappelle, Norm McDonald and Danny DeVito

A Dave Chappelle flick – that's a good enough reason for me. From Reggie in The Nutty Professor to writing and starring in the hilarious Half-Baked, Chappelle is one of the funniest men in Hollywood. And teamed up with Norm McDonald, whose show "Norm" was funnier than his movie Dirty Work, the film looks to be filled with physical slapstick comedy and, knowing McDonald, at least ten jokes utilizing the word "whore".

The Perfect Storm (June 30)
Starring: George Clooney and Mark Wahlberg
Directed by: Wolfgang Petersen (Air Force One)

Based on the book by the same name, Storm is the story of the Andrea Gail, a fishing boat caught in one of the worst storms in North Atlantic history. It is based on a true story, which partly takes place in the Bay State (the part on land any way). If you've read the book then you know what happens, especially since sources close to the movie say it follows the book closely. The pairing of Clooney and Wahlberg from Three Kings also promises to be a good combination. If you are a boat lover or a fan of human drama, this promises to be a good one.

Shaft (June 16)
Starring: Samuel L. Jackson, Christian Bale, Toni Collette and Busta Rhymes
Directed by: John Singleton

PAPA ROACH
Infest
Dreamworks

After hearing "Last Resort" many times on the radio and on my computer through Napster (that's right Metallica!), my expectations were high for Papa Roach's major label debut Infest. The metal-driven aggression of the first single left me quite unprepared for the first grade rap skills that lead off the opening track "Infest," namely the unenviable rhyme "My name's Coby Dick/Mr. Dick if you're nasty/Rock the mic with a voice that's raspy." Hey, I know $6.99 is a nice price, but I'm not paying for lines like that. Thankfully, as a whole, Infest is a more enjoyable affair.

Papa Roach is very reminiscent of P.O.D. and their recent The Fundamental Elements of Southtown in that both groups have a Latino flavor, lyrics designed so kids can relate to them, and a single that is by far the most memorable song on the album; the aforementioned "Last Resort" for PR and "Southtown" for P.O.D. Another disheartening similarity is that both bands have a potentially great album dragged down by substandard lyrics. It's great that vocalist/songwriter Dick is able to excise his personal demons through music and songwriting, but songs like "Binge" and "Broken Home," about his previous drinking problem and troubled childhood respectively, are simply self-indulgent and boring. Thankfully the hooks and riffs are solid throughout, so for a generic blast Papa Roach is fine. And Papa Roach is more than fine when they actually have "songs" rather than just lyrics over music, like on the excellent "Last Resort" and "Throw Away." Make sure to stick around for the hidden track at the end of the album that has the band on an interesting trek into reggae territory, with a fun, mellow atmosphere reminiscent of Incubus.

Special note: thanks to a non-savvy consumer, the Collegian's own beloved Rob Schulze, we also have the clean version of Papa Roach, which features the exclusive track "Legacy." Rob's opinion on the number: "It's okay." Same goes for the CD as a whole. B (Michael Delano)

IAN BROWN
Golden Greats
Interscope

King Monkey returns with his second post-Stone Roses effort Golden Greats, a strong album that mixes elements of Madchester with some funky dance beats and Brown's effortlessly cool vocals. The lyrical influences are varied, ranging from Brown's comments on his recent jailing ("Free My Way," "Babasonicos") to his theories on how dolphins were land creatures that chose to return to the sea ("Dolphins Were Monkeys"). With subjects as juicy and exciting as this, the album is at least fascinating, but more than that a forceful showcase of the true talent that Brown possesses.

A variety of musicians contribute to this release, including Brown standby guitarist Aziz Ibrahim on a couple of tracks, and Brown himself does the drumming on more than a few tracks in addition to singing and penning all of the songs. The first single from the album, "Love Like A Fountain," is the basic blueprint for the majority of the songs. Guitar rock is augmented by catchy dancefloor beats while Brown sings about happy things like love ("Golden Gaze") and getting high ("GetinHigh"). There are interesting diversions, however, both musically and lyrically, like the serious minded tracks about being in jail as well as the trippy cosmic journey "Neptune."

On the whole, there lyrics aren't as soulful or the music as amazing as the Stone Roses days, but free from expectations this is a fine album, and it's certainly nice to see someone who has been through as much as Brown to be making music this uplifting and interesting for so long. B+ (Michael Delano)

N-TOON
Toon Time
Dreamworks

With the incredible popularity of boy bands and hip-hop, it was only a matter of time before someone tried to combine the two. Sounds like a decent idea, right? Wrong. The Atlanta-based R&B group N-Toon attempts to do just that on their debut album Toon Time. N-Toon is comprised of four young boys: Everett, Justin (that makes three boy groups with a Justin – what is it with that name?), Chuckie and Lloyd. They all appear to be somewhere between the ages of nine and thirteen (I don't really want to know, though). Much of the album is produced by acclaimed R&B producer Dallas Austin, who has been behind such works as TLC, Destiny's Child, and New Edition. He was also the man behind the early nineties pre-teen hip-hop group Another Bad Creation, whose careers ended when they hit puberty and are most remembered for ghetto classics such as "Hangin' at the Playground." Austin appears to be trying to reinvent that formula with more of an R&B flair on Toon Time.

Overall Toon Time is an incredibly bland and, as expected, incredibly cheesy album. The ingredients for the album are basic; four preteen boys, canned R&B beats, love songs about having one's first kiss, or first date, etc. The lyrics are about as cheesy as they get; "I'll give up Nintendo just to talk to you girl," "You're as sweet as cotton candy, and Hershey kisses too." The opening track, "A Girl Like That," features cartoon sounds as a sample, adding to the cheese meter of this album even more. "Happy Fathers Day," a six-minute ballad (good luck getting that on the radio), seems to be N-Toon's tribute to their deadbeat dads, and is among the most excruciating songs I have ever heard. The only song on the album that seems to be making any kind of statement is "What About Us?," which appears to be a shot at the materialistic hip-hop culture, and the lack of positive role models for young African Americans. "Roses R Red" (which features the extremely creative line "Roses are red, violets are blue, but I think I am in love with you") and "It's Your Birthday" are quite possibly two of the worst R&B songs ever recorded. "N-Treow" features one of the members of N-Toon rapping with all of the melodic flow of Kid and Play. The only tolerable song in my view on this album is "Ready," a slow song which features decent vocals and a pleasant beat.

Overall, I can't think of anyone who would enjoy this album. As an R&B album it fails. As a teen pop album, it is horrible. This album would be an "F," but the Nintendo line brings it up a full grade. D+ (Kurt Polesky)

CLINTON
Disco & the Halfway to Discontent
Astralwerks

When artists toy with audience expectations instead of pandering to them, it's a sure sign of talent. Such is the case with Clinton, the dance-oriented side project of Cornershop's Ben Ayres and Tjinder Singh. Disco & The Halfway to Content will certainly confuse those looking for a straightforward dance record, and even surprise those looking for similarities to Cornershop, even though that band's political commentary is somewhat present in Clinton. The lo-fi opener "People Power in the Disco Hour" is a very listenable dance track, but also has some interesting lyrics about the anti-establishment powers of music and disco. At other times, however, their message is simply baffling, and I'm not sure what they mean when they refer to "Massive Attack crap," or when on "Mr. President" an unidentifiable sample asks President Clinton where he "got that move."

Mostly though, Clinton is just having a good time while teasing the audience with all kinds of wacky compositions and silly lyrics. They yearn to bring "hip-hop bricks, to all you disco pimps," and make a conscious effort to "wop that wandy." 800 numbers and behind-the-scenes music people are all given shout outs, in addition to a track that simply brings together passionately moaning women and Indian-flavored guitars after being apart for so long. And even sweetly romantic numbers like "Saturday Night & Dancing" should please those not wanting to explore Clinton's more experimental side. Occasionally the album is a little too creative for its own good, resulting in overly confusing and unenjoyable arrangements, but on the whole this is certainly a unique and worthwhile listen for fans of dance, Cornershop as well as fans of the weird in general. B+ (Michael Delano)

On May 19, Disney will release what should become this summer's biggest hit, Dinosaur. A combination of stunning animation and Disney marketing has the film tracking well among all age groups. The Lion King opened at $40.9 million June 15, 1994. Dinosaur should easily top that, making it the largest animated opening ever. I'm going out on a limb here and saying that the film will become the all-time highest opener for a non-holiday period (surpassing Austin Powers: TSWSM at $55 million). Think Jurassic Park.

Final Verdict: open $62 million, final gross $350 million (ie. sixth all-time highest)

If you're looking for summer sleepers, then Dinosaur's weekend might be a good place to start. Two teen films, Loser and Road Trip will vie to become a summer breakout film. Since the teen romance genre has been lagging lately, I'd have to give the edge to the gross-out, moronic Road Trip, which also has Tom Green's name attached to it.

Final Verdicts: Loser: $7 million open, $25 million gross. Road Trip: $12 million open, $50 million gross

Memorial Day weekend sees the return of ultra-superstar Tom Cruise to his role as super-secret spy Ethan Hunt in Mission: Impossible 2. Perhaps the most anticipated sequel since that Menace thing, M2 is guaranteed gold at the box office. The original opened at $74.9 million over the five-day period in 1996. Sequels always open bigger, so buy tickets in advance. This has an outside chance to challenge The Phantom Menace's five-day record of $105 million.

Final Verdict: open $87 million, final gross $183 million.

Jackie Chan returns, this time to the Old West in Shaghai Noon. It's more of the same tricks for Chan, and I simply don't think the audience is there, especially after last year's Western disaster Wild Wild West. Rush Hour ($33 open, $98.4 gross) was as much Chris Tucker as Chan. This could be disappointing.

Final Verdict: open $17 million, final gross $54 million

Big Momma's House looks like a good follow-up to the surprising Blue Streak ($19.2, $67.9) for Martin Lawrence. The trailer looks halfway decent and this could break out. Watch out for Waterboy syndrome here.

Final Verdict: Open $27 million, final gross $100 million

Gone is 60 Seconds features hot cars and a hotter Angelina Jolie. Toss Nick Cage into the mix and you come out with $100 million. This is prototypical summer fare.

Final Verdict: open $24 million, final gross $101 million

With a veritable plethora of big name teen stars (Freddie Prinze Jr., Jason Biggs, Claire Forlani, Alyson Hannigan and Monica), Boys and Girls could also be a potential hit. If it's She's All That, then it's golden, but if it's Down to You, then it could be in trouble. I haven't seen anything to make me decide one way or the other.

Final Verdict: open $13.9 million, final gross $46 million

Shaft with Samuel L. Jackson. There's not really much else to say. This should have a cut following, but I'm not sure if it will catch on in the mainstream.

Final Verdict: open $13 million, final gross $65 million

Fox gives audiences its animated answer to Disney in the form of sci-fi Titan AE. Matt Damon, Drew Barrymore and Janeane Garofalo provide voices. The trailer looks good and I like it to top the June 16 weekend. Could also die among mixed audiences.

Final Verdict: open $27 million, final gross $108 million

One of the summer's biggest wildcards is Fantasia 2000. After an exclusive IMAX release during which it grossed $42.4 million, the updated version of the Disney classic is set to hit everywhere June 16. Dinosaur should still be around then, so Disney might find itself in a promoting bind. Plus, I'm not sure anyone still wants to see it after six months of release.

Final Verdict: wait and see...

Jim Carrey has given up hopes of an Oscar nomination and returned to being... well, Jim Carrey. In Me, Myself and Irene, a Farrelly brothers comedy where Carrey plays a state trooper with multiple personalities. Audiences will be waiting with open arms for Carrey's return to form. Think Ace Ventura Part 3.

Final Verdict: open $42 million, final gross $120 million

Famed animation innovator Nick Parks takes a mainstream turn with Dreamworks' Chicken Run. Mel Gibson will do the voice of an American chicken who falls for a British hen. The animation may be brilliant, but this still might not reach everyone.

Final Verdict: open $14 million, final gross $73 million

In perhaps the most brilliant marketing scheme since the last time it was done (Independence Day), Mel Gibson takes his Revolutionary War epic, The Patriot, into a July 4th weekend. Rumored three hour running time doesn't help. Director of 1194 does. Mel Gibson's not Will Smith, but he's pretty damn good.

Final Verdict: open $30 million, final gross $160 million

Warner Brothers tries to answer the same weekend with The Perfect Storm. Based on the true story of a 1991 sea storm, I think this one has potential. It may skew to a younger audience or people wanting something less heady than American patriotism. Plus, I smell a "money shot" when the ship encounters that huge tidal wave.

Final Verdict: open $37 million, final gross $127 million

In the absolute stupidest TV adaptation ever, July 4th also stars Rocky and Bullwinkle. The trailer looks awful and a blend of animation and live action is generally a bad idea.

Final Verdict: open $7 million, final gross $35 million

One of the summer's most talked about films, The X-Men, hits theaters July 14th. Despite a trailer that looks slightly embarrassing at best, this will be huge. It's what we call a Greasy Fan Boy Movie (GFBM). That is, a movie that no matter how awful it looks, a select number of devout fans will see in excess of ten times just to brag that they did so. The X-Files Movie was a GFBM. The Phantom Menace was a GFBM. The impending Final Fantasy Movie and Tomb Raider are both GFBMs. Comic book collectors have been salivating over this for some time now. Don't go opening night would be my advice.

Final Verdict: open $37 million, final gross $175 million

Pokemon: The Movie 2000. I said the "P" word, so you should all be rushing for tickets as you read this. The original shocked experts with a $31 million open before falling like a deflated Pikachu. Sequels always open bigger.

Final Verdict: open $41 million, final gross $82 million

The final movie on my list of box office goldmines is Nutty Professor 2: The Klumps. Eddie Murphy charmed audiences with the inanity of the first installment ($25.4, $129). And remember, sequels always open bigger.

Final Verdict: open $51 million, final gross $110 million.

Here are my predictions for the top five openers and top five grosser:

Openers
Mission Impossible 2 (3 day) - $65 million
Dinosaur - $62 million
Gladiator - $47.5 million
Mr. Myself and Irene - $42 million
Pokemon - $41 million

Total Gross
Dinosaur - $350 million
Mission Impossible 2 - $183 million
X-Men - $175 million
Gladiator - $170 million
The Patriot - $160 million

Eddie Murphy and Janet Jackson look ready to revive the success of the original, The Nutty Professor, in this summer's sequal.

The infamous character of the seventies during the height of blaxploitation films, immortalized by Isaac Hayes in the unforgettable funk theme song, is back, not as a remake but as an update. Singleton, director of the breakthrough movies Boyz 'n the Hood and Higher Learning, has made his mark as one of the most influential black filmmakers in Hollywood and teamed with Samuel L. Jackson as the nephews of the original John Shaft (Richard Roundtree, who is also in the film).

Nutty Professor II: The Klumps (July)
Starring: Eddie Murphy (x 5) and Janet Jackson
Directed by: Peter Segal

The much-anticipated sequel to the 1996 comedy isn't so much about Sherman and Buddy Love, but about Sherman's family. You know what I'm talking about – the dinner scenes that have made famous the phrase "He's my little Hercules Hercules, Hercules." They have decided to scribe the script around the Klump family and Sherman's wedding, with, of course, the return of Buddy Love.

Bedazzled (Aug. 11)
Starring: Brendan Fraser and Elizabeth Hurley
Directed by: Harold Ramis

The story of a computer geek (Fraser) who wishes to be something else. He sells his soul to the Devil (Elizabeth Hurley) for seven wishes, which leads to him be transformed into seven different characters. Individuals who reevaluate their lives seem to be Ramis's area of expertise with his previous work in Groundhog Day and if this film is half as well written and acted (you can't go wrong with Fraser, and especially a devilish Hurley) it promises to be worth your while.

Common anything but

By David Katzoff

Common
Like Water For Chocolate
MCA

Time is a perplexing phenomenon. Within the well-seasoned jambalaya of beats, rhymes and life, altruistic emcees operate like lingual chefs, verbally sauteing their experiences upon the frying pan of a hip-hop medium. As the years unfurl, the course of maturation has developed a palpable voice amidst the topical flows of our aging lyricists. Common, the artist formerly known as Common Sense, is a quintessential example of this process. Once a rashly clever yet deviously free spirited juvenile, his intellectual youthfulness of Can I Borrow a Dollar? (1993) has gradually blossomed and changed though each album like a caterpillar turning into a butterfly. Now an older, wiser, more introspective man and father, Common's intellectual truthfulness reveals a candid maturity – one that is still swayed by the lingering days of drunken delinquency, rage, lust and sadness.

Titled after Laura Esqivel's best-selling novel and Alfonso Arau's film, Com' cooks up his fourth musical entrée metaphorically reinventing the thematic concepts of its artistic predecessors. ("Water" represents his deep, fluid Piscean personality while "Chocolate" embodies the strong, rich blackness of his soul.) As a gourmet poet, he has bridged the void between poignant spirituality and hard-hitting lyrical intensity, concurrently magnetizing an audience of "coffee shop chicks and white dudes" and unsentimental thugs with lofty street dreams.

Like Water For Chocolate begins with mesmerizing effects, as music abstractly transcends "Time Travelling" through the graceful incantations of Vinia Mojica and Femi Kuti. With an abundance of soulful instrumentation, the elocution and orchestration of the album is sheer auditory bliss. However, much like Guru's excursions through Jazzmatazz, there is a feeling of hybrid experimentation that overwhelms the fundamental notion that this a rap rendering. Although Common is up-front with his laid-backness, virtually each track is threaded and sewn with leisurely vibration, creating a tailored, "alternative" backdrop for him to voice his personal metamorphosis. Consequently, the vivacious lyrical eminence displayed throughout Resurrection (1995) and One Day It Will All Make Sense (1997) is contained like a sedated pit-bull in a monastery.

In attempting to rediscover his sound, Common implored the eclectic production techniques of D'Angelo, Questlove and Jay Dee, discarding the talents of his Chi-town teammates No ID, Y-Not and Dug Infinite, who were instrumental engineers on his first three projects. And since there is barely a vestige of Common's old paternal vibrancy (derived from vintage jazz samples, organic, up-tempo beats and rhymes to match), his vocalizations are predominantly breezy, spiritual escapades. While this becomes a refreshing element in contemporary hip-hop, he makes little effort at eliciting the haughty ruggedness well within his ability.

On "A Film Called (Pimp)," a first-rate duet (about the "oldest profession") between Com' and MC Lyte and "Thelonius," featuring Slum Village, the slow rhythmic pulse works effectively to coincide the versatile cadence of each lyrical exchange. While "Payback is a Grandmother," a nice addition to the "Stolen Moments" series, and "Doxinit," a typification of Jay Dee's melodic/rhythmic capabilities, are two conventionally executed rap songs; on occasion, the album becomes frustratingly mundane with tracks like "The Questions" and "Cold Blooded," which essentially dissipate their respectful collaborations with Mos Def and The Roots. Hence, instead of melding the mood created by its surrounding songs, the Premier-produced "Sixth Sense" protrudes like a musical erection, giving the album a glaring gleam of brilliance and chillingly profound energy. "The Light" is another incandescent track, equipped with a fabulous evaluation on love and interpersonal unity and a dazzling chorus exerted from the Bobby Caldwell song "Open Your Eyes."

In a nutshell, Like Water... is a radiant work of art that warily examines the passage of time and thoughtfully illustrates Common's multifaceted self, but unsuccessfully exhibits his versatility as a verbal chef. And although substance is hardly lacking, in the vista of hip-hop's skillet it is the flavors and expectations of the entrée that enunciates the fulfillment of its digestion. B+

Pitchshifter's Deviant ascendancy

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

PITCHSHIFTER
Deviant
MCA

With 1998's www.pitchshifter.com, Pitchshifter was, arguably, one of the most exciting bands on Planet Rock. The amazing mixture of elements of metal, electronica, drum n' bass, punk and industrial resulted in an instant classic, a record that was a benchmark in the rock community. Now, with Deviant, the band's most recent studio full-length, there is no question – Pitchshifter is the most exciting band on the planet.

Deviant takes the evolved model of sound found on www and refines it to create an immensely accessible but still developed sound. The dominant elements on www were punk (the lyrics), metal and electronica (the sound) and things stay the same here, meaning that fans wanting the band to revert back to its death metal days will be disappointed. While their early work certainly had its merit, the change is certainly for the better, as I can't remember the last time I tossed Submit into my player for a spin.

Also on the cutting room floor are any straight drum n' bass tracks, weird "Hanger 84"-style conspiracy theories, and the well intentioned but largely useless samples. While this becomes a refreshing element in contemporary hip-hop, he makes little effort at eliciting the haughty ruggedness well within his ability. While this becomes a refreshing element in contemporary hip-hop, he makes little effort at eliciting the haughty ruggedness well within his ability.

of the food industry like on Infotainment?'s "Product Placement." Visit the group's website at (surprise!) www.pitchshifter.com to find out more about the band's views as well as an enlightening reading list and J.S.'s endlessly entertaining tour diary.

After a recent personnel shake-up that saw the departure of long-time guitarist J.A. Walters and live percussionist "D" Walters, the Pitchshifter camp is now J.S. on vocals and programming and brother/bassist J.S. on vocals and programming and Broadrick guitarist Jim Davies (a www addition). Former Helmet drummer John Stanier contributes some stellar drumming for the album, while drummer Jason Bowld and guitarist Matt Crundy complete the Pitchshifter live sound.

"Condescension" begins Deviant in grand style with a great hook and a classic us v. them chorus. "Wafer Thin" gives the first clues that this album will be much aided by Stanier's excellent drumming, and provides the perfect backbone to J.S.'s nasal delivery. The piercing "Keep It Clean" has J.S. in a very bad mood, and thankfully the track that follows, "Forget the Facts," slows the tempo down but keeps the venom flowing.

"Hidden Agenda" uses the build/release formula to maximum effect, and "Everything's Fucked," although simply "Everything Sucks (Again)" slightly changed, is still classic and one of Pitchshifter's finest moments. "As Seen On T.V.," which features the legendary Iello Biafra on of Dead Kennedy's fame, is a hilarious jab at current popular culture that is as good as you would expect from such a meeting of minds. J.S. laments how T.V doesn't mimic real life while Biafra goes off about the ridiculousness of SUVs, body piercings and school violence, proving, along with the latest LARD release, that he hasn't lost one bit of the spark he had back then.

Deviant's cover, which features a jarring Queen Elizabeth/Pope hybrid that is (suitably) unflattering to both, is guaranteed to turn some heads, and it's hard to believe such an inspired cover is actually a back-up for one that was discarded due to legal problems (see website for more info). Equally hard to believe is that Pitchshifter followed up an excellent album with one that is just as good, and will hopefully bring additional recognition to what is currently rock's best kept secret. A+

COURTESY SAFAM CORP

Safam plays the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 8:00 p.m.

Tube Notes' final goodbye to "90210," and others

Well, yesterday was the final episode of FOX's family drama "Party of Five," the show where we first realized that Jennifer Love Hewitt and Neve Campbell might think of themselves as serious actresses. We all know the truth: they're not, but we allow them to believe so, so they will make "serious" movies like Wild Things and I Know what You did Last Summer. This is the one of a number of recent and upcoming cancellations.

I am happy to say that I have never seen an episode of "Party of Five." Unlike all of you that have followed the Salinger family since high school, I really don't care what happens. I didn't have to watch it because if you saw the preview you would know what happened the week before. For instance, without seeing one episode, I can tell you that the eldest had cancer, then it was in remission, then it came back and then it went away again. Scott Wolf had a drinking problem, so he jumped on the wagon. Then when ratings for the show went down they had him jump off the wagon and they gave Charlie cancer again. Then Wolf realized the mistake and climbed back on, and so on until finally it's come to the point that he is – for now – not drinking. Not to mention Neve Campbell's overly hyped female kiss, in which thousands of Wild Things fans watched to see some more action. So the show finally ends with the entire family sober, healthy and as happy as a bunch of orphans can be.

Fox is also ending "Beverly Hills: 90210," Aaron Spelling's "compelling" drama about teens in Southern California, after ten years and numerous characters, on May 17. Unfortunately, I broke my "no Spelling streak" and saw my first episode of "90210" about two weeks ago. If you thought the Salingers had it rough, man, the gang from the hills have seen so much worse. Without a doubt the most ill-fated member of the original cast who is still on the show is Luke Perry. Not only did his wife die from a bullet meant for him, but he too is an alcoholic. The entire cast has at some time been addicted to one drug or another. Brenda was hooked on speed, Steve had a steroid problem and then of course there was Kellie's hardcore drug problem, and since the show does take place in Beverly Hills one of them had to be on diet pills (probably Tiffany Amber-Thiesen, replacing her role from a very emotional "Saved by the Bell"). In the current cast there are two alcoholics and one coke addict. These kids have a tough life: after all, they are being raised in the most affluent part of the country, and the only thing for them to do is drugs. Come to think of it, there's an alcoholic on almost every FOX show. With the exception of "X-Files," "Malcom in the Middle" and "Ally McBeal," all of FOX's shows have one substance abusive character. For those shows that don't have a character with an alcohol problem, another show picks up the slack by adding another drinker, smoker or snorter. Is this some type pre-requisite for a prime time slot for FOX? Every show must have a funny drunk!

Well, I have to admit that I like the story of a cop and his criminal brother. But the truth is, there needs to be a bar where the cast can go and reflect on their situations and laugh at the witty drunk in the corner. There's is no way around it. We're already doubling up on alcoholics on our other popular shows, so if you want the show to get picked up just write in a bar.

Tube Notes with Nicolas Pizzolato

But FOX isn't the only network canceling shows left and right. Tomorrow, ABC ends its long running TGIF sitcom "Boy Meets World." Every year ABC tries a handful of sitcoms that they hope will fill in for a classic show that is going off the air. "Boy Meets World" was one such experiment that ended up working. Now, after watching Cory, Shawn and Topenga go through junior high, high school and half their college career faster than I went through high school (just a tad unbelievable considering everything that has happened to them, including Cory and Topenga getting married, and the last episode will have Topanga accepting a internship at a law firm) ABC has decided to pull the show, praying that "The Hughleys" can fill in the gap. TGIF (thank goodness it's funny) was a good idea when I was ten, when the shows they put on were already considered funny. After all, where would be if Bob Uecker wasn't always slapping Mr. Belvedere? Admit you loved Balki, and every time he did the dance of joy so did you. He had an entire nation saying "Get out of the city, coussin."

As for NBC, once again with out a strong show to follow "Frasier" and precede "ER," it has canceled "Battery Park," the comedy about a police station and the detectives that worked in it, which will join other "Must See TV" flops "Suddenly Susan," "Caroline in the City," "Veronica's Closet," "Stark Raving Mad" and "Jesse". They need a miracle to fill in that slot – any sitcom taking that time slot is just asking for public ridicule. And if you think "Daddio" is safe, you may be wrong. The filler between "Friends" and "Frasier" has had inconsistent ratings. You would hope that these sitcoms are being destroyed, but oh no, lucky for us the shows are always being recycled and being thrown from network to network, for us to agonize over three months from now.

Safam brings Jewish Rock

Tonight, at 8:00 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom, the "greatest music group in the country" will grace UMass with their musical geniality.

Safam, led by Joel Sussman and Robbie Soloman, have been together since 1974, and are no strangers to the Massachusetts music world. Some members of the band are from the Boston area. The target audience for the band ranges through all ages. They are currently on tour in promotion of their new album, In Spite of It All, as well as Safam's Greatest Hits 3 and 4. The show will mark the third time Safam has played the University of Massachusetts. The band has released over ten albums in their twenty-five, plus years of folk rock.

Safam has been a staple in the Jewish music scene for a long time, and have established them as the premier example of creative blends of music. Their music will be performed in English, Hebrew and Yiddish.

Tonight's show will be presented by the Jewish Student Union. The program will consist of two sets of performances by Safam, with an intermission in between. At the intermission, Greenough Sub Shop will be selling food. Greenough Sub Shop is a non-profit organization that runs out of the Greenough residence hall in the Central living area.

Aside from Safam, the Jewish a cappella group, Kolot from UMass will be opening the show. Kolot will add some local flavor to the already excited crowd.

Jonathan Goldman, spokesman for the Jewish Student Union, is extraordinarily proud of the fact that Safam will be in attendance. He has been promoting the show quite a bit, and is very sure that it will be something spectacular. He mentioned that it is very rare to find any Jewish bands at all, and to find one that is as successful as Safam is almost unimaginable.

After speaking to several students, it appears as though word of mouth has traveled, and the massive amounts of postering has worked. Tickets for the show are $5 for students and $10 for the general public. They can be purchased at the door.

Martin Lawrence continues to encroach onto Eddie Murphy's turf here playing a cop going undercover as an obese middle-aged woman known as Big Momma, complete with tubby body suit. There's no denying that although sometimes annoying, Lawrence is a talented comic actor, and this could provide a welcome respite from the guns and explosions that generally popu late summer movies

Gone in 60 Seconds

"What do you think is more exciting – stealing cars or having sex?" Either one, as long as I don't have to do it while watching this movie. Nicholas Cage, whose popularity continues to astound me, costars with Angelina Jolie in an action movie about competing gangs of car thieves.

Shaft

Samuel L. Jackson and Busta Rhymes. That's all I have to say. I'll see you at the theater

Titan A.E.

An animated science-fiction romp from Fox, with such notable voices as Matt Damon, Bill Pulman, Drew Barrymore, Nathan Lane and Janeane Garofalo. With any luck, this could be what Episode I was supposed to be: last summer's sci-fi entertainment without the wooden acting and artificial dialogue. Expect the action to be tailored for a younger crowd.

Me, Myself and Irene

Jim Carrey, taking a breather from the serious roles of The Truman Show and Man on the Moon, stars in the newest comedy from the Farrelly brothers, the guys who brought you There's Something About Mary and Outside Providence. Carrey plays a state trooper whose two different personalities collide when he forgets to take his medication. Each side of himself falls in love with the same woman, a wayward beauty named Irene, played by Renee Zellweger.

The Adventures of Rocky and Bullwinkle

There should be some sort of law against stuff like this.

The Patriot

Mel Gibson stars as General Francis "Swamp Fox" Marion in this Revolutionary War drama and sure-fire box office juggernaut. God bless America.

The Perfect Storm

Based on the best-selling book of the same name, this movie will retell the heroic efforts of a fishing boat's crew to survive a north Atlantic storm of incredible ferocity. George Clooney, Mark Wahlberg and Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio are among the talented actors involved.

JULY

Scary Movie

The spoof that had to happen. The Wayans brothers take a stab at the resurgence of slasher flicks. As if the originals weren't stupid enough.

The X-Men

Hell yes.

What Lies Beneath

Harrison Ford stars as a professor investigating a supernatural murder with Michelle Pfeiffer as his wife. With such recent mistakes as Six Days, Seven Nights and Random Hearts under his belt, it would be quite disappointing if Ford had once again chosen a ill-conceived, light-weight script that further scars his career. What ever happened to the guy who made The Fugitive and Clear and Present Danger?

The Hollow Man

Kevin Bacon stars in this supernatural thriller about a scientist who discovers a means of becoming invisible. The only problem: how to turn back? Hopefully this movie won't turn out as cheesy as it looks like it will.

AUGUST

Coyote Ugly

This movie tells the story of an aspiring songwriter who takes a job in a female-run night club in New York City... and stars all of your favorite swimsuit and lingerie models wearing halter-tops. John Goodman costars, hopefully not in a halter-top.

Space Cowboys

Clint Eastwood stars in and directs this movie about aging pilots who want to undertake one last outerspace mission. Tommy Lee Jones, James Cromwell and Donald Sutherland costar, a veritable who's who of over-the-hill-but-still-got-it actors.

Cubs knock on Wood as young ace makes return

Four days shy of the two-year anniversary of what was perhaps the finest-pitched baseball game in the sport's long history, Kerry Wood returned to the mound at Wrigley Field to face the Houston Astros, the same club that he humbled that fateful afternoon on May 6, 1998. And though his performance Tuesday night was nothing compared to his masterpiece, it was almost more wonderful to watch.

It was the final step in a long journey that stemmed back to spring training before the 1999 season. The twinge of pain that radiated from Wood's elbow that day was no small problem. He had torn a ligament in the elbow of his pitching arm, a ligament that had previously been sprained, and would not return anytime that year.

In fact, speculation began that Wood might not be able to pitch again – ever. Even if he did, doctors said, it was unsure as to whether he would be anything close to what he was before the injury. The young pitcher underwent full elbow reconstruction, and planned to return sometime in the 2000 season, working diligently to show that the doctors were wrong, that he could go back to what he had been.

What he had been was the 1998 National League Rookie of the Year. He finished the season with a 13-6 overall record and a solid 3.40 ERA. He struck out 12.6 batters every nine innings, topping even Randy Johnson (12.1) in that category. He helped the Cubs in their run toward an NL wild card spot, leading the team's regular starting pitchers in ERA.

But it will be that May matinee that will forever be attached to Wood's name.

It began with a strikeout of Houston second baseman Craig Biggio. It ended with Derek Bell fanning at a nasty slider. And there were eighteen more whiffs sandwiched in between.

In just his fifth major league start, and first complete game in either the major or minor leagues, Wood had accomplished something that only Roger Clemens had done before: he struck out twenty batters in a nine-inning game.

Mind you, fanning 20 was impressive enough, but Wood added to the mystique by not allowing any walks and giving up just one hit, an infield single by Ricky Gutierrez, who is now Wood's teammate with the Cubs.

Though some would argue that Don Larsen's perfect game in the World Series was a better performance because of the magnitude of the game, the Brooklyn Dodgers squad that Larsen faced were based more centered around pitching and defense, and only hit .258 as a team for the year, with only reserve infielder Don Zimmer (imagine him as a shortstop) hitting .300 for the season.

Wood faced a much stronger offensive team in the Astros, who were led by the "Killer B's" (Biggio, Bell and Jeff Bagwell) and Moises Alou. And based on sheer dominance of hitters, the one hit that Wood allowed and the 20 batters he fanned outmatch Larsen's mere seven strikeouts.

Matt Brady on Major League Baseball

But with the injury he sustained, it appeared that Wood might go down with other stars, such as Dizzy Dean or Kerry's namesake, "Smoky" Joe Wood, who were lost to injury in their primes. On Tuesday, he made it known that he would not fade away quietly.

He allowed one run, a Daryle Ward homer in the sixth inning, and allowed just three hits and walked four in his six innings of work. Though he only struck out four hitters, including just one in the first four innings, it was an incredibly impressive performance overall.

Wood even added to the theatrics by hitting a two-run homer in his first at-bat, sending the crowd at Wrigley to their feet, much the way they were as he took the mound to warm up. Cameras flashed incessantly as the young man left the dugout, took his batting practice, and warmed up.

He picked up his first win in 19 months timid you, he had 11 runs of support as the Cubbies crushed Houston starter Jose Lima? in the game, but had he even lost, the sight of him pitching without pain would have been enough to get any baseball fan excited.

"From day one, after the surgery, I didn't have a second thought in my mind I could make it back to the same level I was," Wood said in an interview.

And now any doubt that was in the minds of the fans is gone as well.

NHL trio shows lack of heart

The second round of the NHL Stanley Cup playoffs are underway and in the wake of the first round there are some franchises that have some serious soul searching and question-answering to do. With huge upsets of St. Louis and the elimination of not only last year's runner up, Buffalo, but also the streaking Capitals, the playoffs have opened up and it looks like this year could turn into a free-for-all if the Penguins can knock off the Flyers.

Meanwhile, Buffalo can't seem to buy a break. After the counting of the Brett Hull's game-winning goal after his foot was clearly in the Sabres' crease in last year's Finals, this year against Philadelphia, a goal was allowed after replays showed the shot went through the side of the net. But the overlooked play of Brian Boucher, the rookie phenom in net for the Flyers, is what made the difference in this series. It also helped that Buffalo captain Michael Peca all but disappeared into thin air this season and the playoffs were no different. Dominik Hasek kept his team in it, but the Sabres just couldn't give him the defensive or offensive support he needed. And Boucher's strong play stifled an already anemic Buffalo offense.

Alex Wood on the NHL

The St. Louis Blues must be wondering why the last seven games were so different from the 82 games they played in the regular season. And also what happened to Roman Turek? He can blame his own team for throwing the puck into his net, but he can't blame them for letting up a goal from center ice. The Blues have a habit of digging holes for themselves in the playoffs, this year's version a perfect example. Turek's inexperience and mental mistakes on the part of his teammates sent the Blues home way too early.

And down in D.C., the Capitals and Olaf Kolzig need to figure out where they left their defense when the playoffs started. They had a terrific defensive scheme going into the playoffs, and they seemed to just abandon it altogether when the puck dropped. In the meantime, Ron Tugnutt was able to give the Pens the stability in net that they lacked all season long.

And speaking of Tugnutt, the Ottawa Senators have to be wondering just why it was again, that they traded Tugnutt for Tom Barrasso. But such is the nature of the beast, which is the Stanley Cup playoffs. In such a fluid and changing game, where momentum and timing is everything, so much that it's hard for any one team or person to dominate consistently. Which brings us to round two.

In the Eastern Conference, the Penguins and Jaromir Jagr hold a 2-1 lead over the Philadelphia Flyers, in the battle of Pennsylvania. The Flyers fought back into the series Tuesday night with a 4-3 overtime victory on rookie Andy Delmore's tally. But Philadelphia needs more production from its big names, like Keith Primeau and John LeClair, to get past the streaking Penguins. In the postseason, momentum is key and there isn't any other team that's got more of it than the Pens. The trade for Tugnutt looks brilliant at this point, and after knocking off Washington, this team is soaring. Jagr has managed to find a higher gear for the playoff run, and despite the solid play of rookie defenseman Boucher for Philly, a hot Jagr is almost impossible to stop.

In the other Eastern battle, Toronto can consider itself lucky to be behind only 2-1 in its series with New Jersey. Without the spectacular play of goalie Curtis Joseph, Toronto could easily be facing elimination in their next game. The Maple Leafs are trying to remain upbeat and positive, but it's going to take more than happy thoughts to get past Martin Brodeur and the Devils. In this matchup, two of the games best goaltenders are battling it out, with Brodeur simply outlasting Joseph so far. Brodeur is putting up career postseason numbers, and also has the advantage of a stronger defense. Meanwhile, Joseph has to keep pulling off those big saves to keep his team's hopes alive.

Out in the Western Conference, Ed Belfour and his defending champion Dallas Stars have battled to a 2-1 series with his former employers, the San Jose Sharks. Belfour's play has been spectacular, and he has the same advantage that Brodeur has, as the Stars play well-disciplined defense. The Eagle blanked the Sharks in Game Two and only allowed one goal in Game One, before the Sharks finally dented him in Game Three. Belfour is playing more disciplined than ever, and is playing the best hockey of his career. With Eddie on top of his game and a strong defense in front of him, you've gotta like the Stars' chances.

On the other side of the ice, Sharks netminder Steve Shields is trying to prove that trading Mike Vernon to Florida. When this team puts it together they are dangerous, Mike Ricci and Owen Nolan giving the Sharks some serious bite. I personally like the Sharks as a dark horse to make it to the finals.

In the final matchup, Detroit and Colorado are up to their old tricks as Colorado holds a 2-1 series lead over the Wings. The goalie matchup in this series is great. Patrick Roy and Chris Osgood, two veteran and proven winners. But the difference in this series is who's standing in front of those two men. With Ray Bourque in front of Roy, the Avalanche have been able to snub out the Red Wings' high-powered attack and also add some firepower to their own. Bourque manning the point on the power play allows Sandis Ozolinsh to push forward and join the rushes, and not have to worry about getting back. Bourque's transition game is also key, as he can unload a cannon and then be back in position when the other team comes back out of the zone.

The problem now for Colorado is that Bourque is out with a sore knee. Which means that Detroit forwards Sergei Fedorov and Brendan Shanahan, will have more room to operate down low. And Niklas Lidstrom and Chris Chelios can pinch up into the play a little more. Bourque's absence means that Joe Sakic will have to man the point on power plays, which keeps his terrific wrist shot at arm's length. It also means that Ozolinsh has to be more cautious when he's moving up. This may also be the opportunity for Detroit captain Steve Yzerman, to finally get on the board and score some points, which the Red Wings so desperately need out of their team leader. Colorado can definitely win without Bourque, but his injury may be Detroit's chance to jump back into this series.

Pedro to miss five following melees

By Matt Brady
Collegian Staff

Five games. For the Boston Red Sox, their fans, and Pedro Martinez's fantasy baseball owners, it will undoubtedly feel like an eternity.

Major League Baseball extended its fist of power today, suspending last year's American League Cy Young Award winner for five games in response tão his role in a bench-clearing brawl in the contest between the Red Sox and the Cleveland Indians this past weekend.

The action started when Martinez buzzed Cleveland catcher Einar Diaz with two high and tight fastballs after Diaz had hit two doubles earlier in the game. The two exchanged heated glances after the encounter, but Diaz held his ground.

Then, in the top of the eighth, Cleveland hurler Charles Nagy threw fuel on the fire by drilling Jose Offerman in the back with a fastball. This time, the benches emptied, though no punches were thrown by either squad.

The fire turned to an explosion when Martinez one-upped Nagy by plunking Roberto Alomar with the first pitch in the bottom of the eighth. The benches cleared for the second time in the inning, but yet again no fisticuffs ensued.

New vice president of on-field operations Frank Robinson set a standard by suspending sixteen members of the Detroit Tigers and Chicago White Sox for their roles in a couple of brawls on April 22. Nine of the sixteen were fined. Robinson has said he is in favor of more strict punishments for brawls.

Martinez is widely regarded as baseball's best "stuff" pitcher, combining a lethal fastball with an even more devastating change-up, also adding a curve to the mix. Even still, he has not been able to shake off his past encounters with wildness. In his days with the Montreal Expos, the Dominican native was known for often throwing at hitters. In both 1994 and 1995, Martinez hit 11 men with pitches, despite the fact that he only pitched 144 and 194 innings, respectively (for reference, Chan Ho Park led the league in hit batsmen with 14 in 194 innings last year).

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) – Beware of financial ventures that seem risky. You can be sure that calm waters and smooth sailing are in store for you if you're careful.
GEMINI (May 21-June 20) – Don't limit yourself today by labeling or pigeon-holding yourself at this time. You may realize that you will never be only one thing.
CANCER (June 21-July 22) – Now is a good day to retrace certain avenues of your past in order to solve a stubborn personal mystery. Others are waiting for answers.
LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) – You should be able to ride quite a wave of energy today, but focus and concentration are essential to any measure of success.
VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) – Check and double-check your work today. Avoiding mistakes can do more than push an important project forward. Measure twice, cut once!
LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) – Keep a close eye on personal property today; the chances of losing a prized possession are mounting. Time may seem short during evening hours.
SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) – Now is no time to share all those secrets. You do have a tendency to put all your cards on the table, but today it may leave you too vulnerable.
SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) – Wishful thinking can get you far today – but doing something with it will get you the rest of the way. Timing is essential as you take action.
CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) – You may be amazed to discover the power of the simple things. A kind word, a generous act, even a smile can make all the difference today.
AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) – You must be willing to protect your resources today. Guard against intrusion from those who may try to take advantage of you at this time.
PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) – You're likely to encounter someone whose motives are something of a secret to you. Soon, however, you'll know what's going on.
ARIES (March 21-April 19) – A door will be opened for you today which allows you to explore a romantic opportunity. Now is no time for questions or for second guessing others.

Shaun Skeffington rapped three hits, but the Minutemen couldn't muster up enough offense in the late innings to rally past Harvard.

Well runs dry

After eruption, Minutemen fall short in loss to Harvard

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

Sometimes the numbers tell it all.

And sometimes, they don't.

The Massachusetts baseball team scored 25 runs over the past two days, a number seemingly high enough to secure a pair of wins. The Minutemen picked up only one, however, dropping a 9-8 contest to Harvard University yesterday afternoon, just one day after posting a remarkable 17 against Siena.

UMass (21-17-1) staged a late game comeback, striking for four runs in the ninth and final frame to pull within one. The Crimson (17-24) held tight, holding on for the win to snap a four-game losing streak. Head coach Mike Stone addressed his team's struggles after the game.

"A lot of times in baseball when you score too many runs in one game you come up short the next," said Stone. "You never think you're going to score that many again, of course, we just struggled to score runs all day. We had opportunities and didn't cash in."

The Harvard offense got rolling early, posting two runs in both the second and third innings. Center fielder Scott Cormack walked to lead off the second frame, and was pushed to second as teammate Nick Carter took his base on balls. The runners moved into scoring position on a wild pitch by UMass hurler Patrick Reedy, who struck out the next two batters while keeping the runners in check. With two outs and two on, left fielder Javy Lopez singled to shallow right, scoring Cormack and Carter to give the Crimson a 2-0 lead.

Harvard added two more runs in the third, pushing their lead to four. UMass third baseman Aaron Senez saved a potential run in the first at-bat, knocking down a Joe Llanes shot up the third baseline and making a stellar throw to second for the out. The Crimson persisted, though, putting two men on base to bring Carter to the plate. Carter ripped a single down the right field line, scoring Carmack and Scot Hopps.

The Minutemen dug in their heels in the bottom of the fourth, scoring three runs to pull within one. Nick Gorneault was hit by a pitch to lead off the inning, and moved to second when Connell Clark laid down a bunt to reach base. Freshman Jeff Altieri advanced the runners to second and third with a sacrifice bunt. With one out, Gavin Clark sent his second home run of the season over the center field fence, scoring three to trim the Crimson lead to one.

Harvard pulled away in the sixth inning, scoring five runs and making the Minutemen look to the bullpen for something to stop the bleeding. First baseman Josh San Salvador hit a solo homerun, his first of the year, to left-centerfield to begin the scoring. Llanes continued his strong day at the plate, doubling to left and then scoring on a throwing error to first by pitcher Jesse Santos. Santos allowed three hits and three runs in his short relief stint, failing to pick up an out. Senior Todd Samolewicz came into the game, striking out the first batter he faced to rescue the Minutemen from the inning.

Down six runs, UMass made a valiant run in the late innings, scoring once in the sixth and staging a rally in the ninth, only to come up one run short. Altieri reached base on a fielder's choice, and moved into scoring position when Senez singled to left field. Clark was walked, loading the bases for the Minutemen. In the next at bat, senior Steve Asadoorian, pinch-hitting for Matt Boulanger, hit a sacrifice fly to center, allowing Altieri to cross the plate. UMass then ripped off three straight two-out singles, but fell just short when Crimson closer Mike Dryden got Gorneault to pop out and end the game. Despite the loss, Stone commended the effort of his team.

"It showed good character, coming back and battling," said Stone. "We should have gotten out of those innings [sixth], a situation where you bring in those relievers and can't get an out. It's kind of tough."

Reedy took the loss for the Minutemen, allowing six runs and seven hits in just over five innings of work. With the loss, Reedy drops to 1-1 on the year. Derek Lennon picked up the win for Harvard, yielding just four runs in six plus innings of work.

The Minutemen will head to New York this weekend for a critical series with A-10 East leaders St. Bonaventure. The Bonnies currently hold a half game lead over UMass in the A-10 standings. The first pitch of Saturday's doubleheader is scheduled for Noon.

Softball makes late push towards A-10s

For most teams, a 28-20 record would be very respectable going into the last week of the regular season, but the Massachusetts softball team, a perennial powerhouse that went 43-10 a year ago and 45-14 the year before that, knows that it must continue to improve if it is going to make a serious run in the postseason. Today's doubleheader against Brown, starting at 3 p.m. at the New Softball Complex, gives a squad brimming with both potential and inexperience a chance to improve to 10 games above .500 for the first time all year.

From the beginning, the Minutewomen have had a very up and down season, from the 0-9 start to the team's recent run to the top of the Atlantic 10 standings. Most of this has been the result of youth, as the Maroon and White only have a handful of upperclassmen on the ball club. In fact, senior day this year might as well be renamed Nikki Faessler Day because the senior catcher is the only player being lost to graduation at season's end.

Sophomores Cherra "Scooter" Wheeler and Teri Rooney and freshmen Kaila Holtz and Brandi Cross have really gotten their bats going and have had a power explosion of late. Wheeler and Rooney have both been crushing the ball and each now has four home runs this year while Holtz has improved her batting average to well over .300. Cross, however, has performed even better than the other big hoppers in the lineup, and has taken over the position as the best hitter on a team already loaded with hitting talent. She has especially shined the last couple of weeks by keeping her batting average above the .400 mark, and by raising her home run total to seven. The UMass single-season home run record is eight, so Cross has a realistic shot of at least equaling this milestone before the regular season comes to a close.

"Brandi was one of the top prospects in the country out of high school," said head coach Elaine Sortino, "and we were very fortunate to get her. If I were an opposing coach then I wouldn't want to pitch to her unless I absolutely had to."

The Brown softball team that will be traveling to Amherst today is led by 1B/3B Tami Parrott. Her .441 batting average is tops on the Bears squad, and she's combined consistency with power, belting nine homers and pounding out 29 RBI. In addition, she has a .802 slugging percentage and has scored 21 runs.

Leadoff hitter Julia Judicello will also be a formidable threat to the UMass pitching staff, as she has posted a .284 average to go along with a team leading 23 runs scored. Catcher/3B Liz Teller has picked up her hitting of late, pushing her average to .268, and is recently coming off a week in which she led the Bears to five straight wins and won Ivy League Rookie of the Week by batting .462 with four runs and three runs batted in.

The Brown pitching staff is solid, but lacks the ace that could move the squad to the top of the Ivy League. Alessa Sutton has the best ERA for the Bears at 2.33, but poor run support has forced her record to 3-7. Ellie Burke has gone 7-10 for Brown with a 3.09 ERA and Erin Durlesser has four wins, nine losses and a 5.80 ERA. Overall, the staff has led the Bears to a 14-26 (6-6 Ivy League) record on the year.

After the doubleheader against Brown today, UMass will host Rhode Island for a twin bill this weekend, and then will end the regular season at UConn with a single contest on the ninth. The Atlantic 10 Tournament takes place from the 11th to the 13th.

The emergence of Kaila Holtz's blazing fastball has the Minutewomen on a roll. A sweep of Brown in today's doubleheader can put the squad 10 games above .500 for the first time this season.

With eldest long gone, Clark family continues its legacy

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

When you're little, your backyard is as good as Fenway Park (with your neighbor's roof for window) serving as the Green Monster. And your brother, well, if he's the one with the wiffle bat in his grips, is as good as Hank Aaron. Then, of course, that makes you as good as Roger Clemens, but with a better curveball (for obvious reasons).

Is there anything more intense in this world than the competitive nature of brothers?

No. And it's why the siblings usually become so close.

Just ask Gavin and Connell Clark, both of whom are members of this year's Massachusetts baseball team.

"In the backyard of our house we used to always play wiffle ball," Connell said. "We had five boys so we'd have to pick one of our little sisters to play, but we'd always be playing there. Those were good times and we've carried those times on to the college field."

The Clark Bros. were born and raised in Springfield, MA, starring on both the baseball and football teams at Central High School. Gavin, a junior, came to the Minutemen as a freshman in 1996, driving in a run against Florida in his first-ever collegiate plate appearance. Connell, a sophomore, transferred this year from Springfield College where he batted .301 to lead his team to the 1999 New England ECAC Divison III Tournament Championship.

"It's unbelievable," the elder said. "I'm just glad my brother came here. He helps me out. I mean we both go through hard times and good times and we both pull each other. We want everyone to do well but we just keep pulling each other up."

His brother echoed his sentiments.

"It's great. I played with him over the summer and now, to play with him on a D-I college field – there's nothing better."

"He's definitely my best friend, I got four brothers but he's the closest," Connell continued. "I think we'll have a closer relationship now because we're getting more time together. It'd be different if were at two different colleges."

The decision by the sophomore to transfer and attend UMass wasn't the easiest.

"He wasn't sure what he wanted to do," Gavin said. "He was a football player who was going to come here and just play baseball. But, I told him it was a Division I team and he was just going to have to work hard. He's got all the athletic abilities, he just has to work with it. He's an unbelievable player and he's going to be well off."

Interestingly enough, the members of the Clark family aren't the first to play baseball for the Maroon and White. Their older brother Doug played both football and baseball for UMass and is currently playing in the San Francisco Giants farm system.

Gavin Clark

"Doug is pretty much the reason that I'm here," Gavin said. "He opened the door for me. He's just a great older brother. I mean if anyone has an older brother like him, it's great. Every time I'm struggling I give him a call and when he's struggling he'll call me. He's just a great kid to have, a great brother to have."

"Whenever I'm in a slump I like to call him," Connell said. "He's always there to help us out and give a few words of encouragement."

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Connell Clark

"I wish he was here," Gavin added. "If all three of us could play together it'd be unbelievable. It's just great that he' s up on another level doing real well for himself."

In the Minutemen's 9-8 loss to Harvard yesterday, the Clark Company combined for two hits, two runs, and three RBI. The highlight of the day was a smash by Gavin over the center field fence that scored his brother and Nick Gorneault.

"It was pretty much a fastball down by my knees and I don't know, I was just trying to be aggressive," the junior said. "I haven't been swinging the bat the way I know I should be and the way I should be helping the team out. I was happy to help the team but I wish we won. You just want to win the ball game, it doesn't really matter what you do."

"Women's bodies are ... turned into object things"

Director debuts documentary

CAITLIN KENNEDY/THE COLLEGIAN

Jean Kilbourne spoke to a crowd in Thompson Hall, last night, after the premier of her documentary, Killing Us Softly 3, a film on the portrayal of women in advertising.

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The premiere screening of Killing Us Softly 3: Advertising's Image of Women was shown last night in Thompson Hall at the University of Massachusetts and dealt with the media's use of women's sexuality to sell commercial products.

The video, presented by the Everywomen's Center and The Office of Greek Affairs, uses over 160 ads and commercials to critique how the images of women in advertising have changed over the past 20 years.

The video was filmed and directed by UMass Communications Professor Sut Jhally during a lecture by award winning writer and lecturer Jean Kilbourne at Smith College this year.

Jhally said that Killing Us Softly and Killing Us Softly 2, Kilbourne's first two videos of the series, have been the most successful educational videos nationwide.

"There's a general lack of education at how to look at the media and we think that just because people can see it they can be trained at looking at it," Jhally said after the video. "You have to be trained at media literacy and have analytic skills because we live in a world of imagery and we have to train people to do that. The reason we use video is that is the most successful tool to speak to people who are non-specialists."

In the video, Kilbourne discusses how advertising causes women to believe that they have to live up to the expectations the media sets forth.

"Women learn from a very early age that we must spend an enormous amount of time, energy and money striving to achieve this ideal and feeling of shame and guilty when we fail and failure is inevitable because the ideal is based on absolute flawlessness," Kilbourne said.

Her message towards women is that advertising for the past 30 years has always communicated that what's most important about women is how they look.

"Women's bodies are perhaps more than ever turned into object things and of course this has very serious consequences," Kilbourne said. "For one it creates a climate in which there is widespread and increased violence against women."

She displayed an advertisement for alcohol in which the woman in the picture becomes the bottle of alcohol, an object of desire, and by having the beer product label stamped to her stomach.

"If part of a cultural climate in which women are displayed as things, as objects, then certainly turning a human being into a thing is almost always the first step towards justifying violence towards that person," Kilbourne stated in the video.

Other advertisements displayed showed women being silenced with their lips either closed, their hands over their mouths and in some instances, their lips had been sewn shut. According to Kilbourne, "images that display women as less than human can cause violence to be inevitable."

Kilbourne said in the video that in today's media there is too much emphasis on the size of women's breasts.

"Most often the focus is on breasts since we are a culture that is certainly obsessed with breasts and breasts are used to sell absolutely everything," Kilbourne said. "Women are constantly told to change our lives by increasing our breast size and the stakes are high. Does your husband wish you had larger breasts? And if he does the implication is simply clear, you'd better change your body, as opposed to changing your husband."

In the media, men are never portrayed like women in moving from a subject to an object and women learn that their breasts are never okay the way they are, Kilbourne stated.

"They'd be doing the same thing to men they've always done to women if there were copies that went with these ads that went like this: 'You're penis may be too small, too droopy... too narrow, too fat, too jiggly, too pale, too pointy or just two inches,'" Kilbourne said.

The audience gave Kilbourne a standing ovation and sophomore psychology major Rachel Elterman said she has the ability to place images together in a way that makes people listen.

"She shows consecutive images that are very powerful because you flip a page in a magazine and you see one ad and you don't notice it as much because we are becoming desensitized, but she puts them together and you notice a lot more and can pay attention to it," Elterman said.

Celebrating recycling
WM announces winners

The Office of Waste Management and Housing Services pulled out all stops this semester in an attempt to increase campus recycling. The sponsors of the recycling campaign will award pizza parties and bagel brunches to the winning dorms of the first University-wide residence hall recycling competition.

The dorms that won first place showed the greatest improvement in recycling levels from the fall to the spring semesters. In first place were Cashin, Field, Chadbourne, Thatcher, Kennedy, Prince and Mackimmie. Second place was awarded to McNamara, Webster, Wheeler, Knowlton, Coolidge, Crampton and Pierpont for the highest recycling rates during the spring semester.

According to General Manager of the Office of Waste Management John Pepi, the office put forth many promotional and educational tools in attempt to increase the recycling on campus. Signs along the sides of buses, RA newsletter appeals, the recycling competition, advertisements in the Collegian, bulletin boards in dorms and education teams visiting over two dozen dorms composed a large part of the recycling campaign.

One Resident Assistant in McNamara, Brandon Leung, said that he encouraged his residents to recycle by letting them know that it's good for the earth. He feels that the recycling campaign "did have an impact. It got people to participate by having a prize." A transfer student from Bunker Hill Community College, Leung noted that there seem to be more recycling efforts at UMass.

The competition did do some good, agreed Pepi. "The contest has succeeded in raising student awareness of the how's and why's of recycling - including the numerous ways in which trashed recyclables come back at all of us, i.e. – in the form of fouled air, depleted oil reserves, global warming and toxins in our soil and water."

There is still progress to be made however, Pepi said. "Even in the best [residential areas], roughly 25% of what is going in the trash is recyclable bottles, cans and paper. That's a high percentage."

The Office of Waste Management provided the industry-based calculation that, in one semester, "students in dorms dispose enough electricity to run 2,000 light bulbs for three months."

One worry the office maintains is the possibility of Amherst fining UMass for throwing away recyclable materials. The State Department of Environmental Protection's ban on the disposal of recyclable materials has lead Amherst to warn the University. Being fined "is just around the corner," commented Pepi.

UMass might start to collect residence hall trash separately from the rest of trash on campus in order to see where most of the recyclables are being disposed, said Pepi. Then, in the event that Amherst fines UMass for residential trash disposal of recyclables, Housing Services would be responsible for payment. This expenditure could take away from other aspects that Housing maintains.

Right now the Office of Waste Management is digging into its options for increasing campus recycling. "We have really made recycling easy," said Pepi; the office however, is still lacking support from members of the University community. "The president of the student government has not responded to phone calls in which I have proposed to explain the efforts to galvanize students behind recycling," said Pepi.

"We've tried a lot of things. If education and incentives don't start bringing in improved results, we may have to start looking at more punitive approaches," Pepi says.

U. Cal inclined to strike

By Heath Druzin
The California Aggie (U. California Davis)

(U-WIRE) DAVIS, Calif. – A university-wide academic student employees strike looms once again as talks between the student employee unions and the University of California ended without an agreement last week.

Claiming UC negotiators reneged on an agreement made by UC President Richard Atkinson that could have settled contract negotiations between the parties, officials for the United Auto Workers Academic Student Employee unions said a strike was possible if UC officials did not reinstate the alleged agreement.

"What the university is doing is absolutely ridiculous," UAW spokesperson Christian Sweeney said. "It's absurd for the president to make commitments his staff won't back up."

UC officials denied the union's charge, saying that no official agreement was made.

"The union's claims are absolutely inaccurate," UC spokesperson Brad Hayward said. "No one reneged on an agreement."

Contract negotiations have been contentious the last few months resulting in a near strike in March, resolved only by an 11th-hour agreement with UC negotiators. Teaching assistants also staged a one-day strike in late April.

The latest round of negotiations was mediated by state Senate Pro Tempore John Burton and Marty Morgenstern, who was appointed by Gov. Gray Davis.

"When we met with UC President Atkinson last week, I came away hopeful that an agreement would be reached shortly," Morgenstern said in a released statement. "While I am very thankful for the president's participation, the result we had hoped for did not materialize."

According to Dave Sebeck, Burton's press secretary, the senator is disappointed that UC's labor relations staff seemed to be undercutting agreements Atkinson made, but hopeful that UC officials are still working toward an agreement.

Union members were less conciliatory in their statements.

"This is the epitome of bad-faith bargaining," UAW bargaining team member Kristen Guzman said.

Despite the setback, UC officials have expressed interest in getting back to the bargaining table, but want about a week to prepare.

"We are still optimistic about reaching a contract," Hayward said. "We continue to bargain in good faith."

Guzman said the union was getting impatient and that a strike was imminent if a contract was not reached soon.

"UC is a public institution which should...deal responsibly in its collective bargaining relationships," Guzman said. "We have no choice but to organize for a major strike unless Atkinson's agreements are quickly restored."

UC officials expressed confidence that an agreement could be reached through bargaining, thus avoiding a strike.

Looking to future, UMass buries history

The UMass Millennium Time Capsule was dedicated Monday afternoon during a ceremony held in front of the Old Chapel.

The capsule, which will be interred this fall during Homecoming Week, will not be unearthed until the year 2100.

Monday afternoon, the University of Massachusetts Millennium Committee sponsored a dedication ceremony that included music from the UMass Chorale group, radio station WHMP, free food and a photographer, who would take pictures of groups of UMass students for them to place in the time capsule.

"The time capsule project is very much a work in progress at this point," Susan Whitbourne, co-chair of the University of Massachusetts Millennium Committee, said. The event was a way to "get the word out" she said.

The committee has had a web page for some months now that features past articles about the capsule as well as lists the names of the committee members and explains what the committee is looking for in the way of contributions. Also included on the committee's site is a link that allows visitors to submit suggestions to the committee.

Originally, the last date for suggestions to be submitted was April 18th, according to Whitbourne, but after problems with the UMass magazine, which had a piece asking for submissions inside, coming out late, the committee decided to extend the submission period. The committee has not yet decided on a final date on which submissions will be accepted.

"My guess is we'll have a final decision meeting a couple of weeks before," Whitbourne said.

"We'll print out the suggestions, try to collect the stuff. I would think it would be difficult to collect it anything less than two weeks before [the interment]," she continued.

The suggestions the committee has received, according to Whitbourne, have come from alumni, current students, professors and even entire departments.

The suggestions, thus far have been "pretty random", Whitbourne said. "No real coherent picture has emerged yet of the kind of suggestions we've received."

Pokemon lawsuit filed after toddler's death

By Elise Gee
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES - The mother of a toddler who was suffocated by a promotional Pokemon toy from Burger King filed a wrongful death lawsuit against the fast-food chain, the toymaker and a safety-testing company Thursday in Los Angeles.

The lawsuit brought by Jill Ann Alto seeks unspecified damages for Kira Alexis Murphy's death Dec. 11. Two weeks after Kira's death, and after the near-death of a child in Kansas, Burger King recalled more than 25 million Poke Balls.

"We want to hold Burger King responsible for the tragic, unnecessary death of this 13-month-old girl," Alto's attorney, Geoffrey Wells, said.

The Poke Balls were given out with Kids' Meals in November and December last year. The 3-inch plastic toys consisted of a sphere-shaped container that pulled apart to reveal one of 57 Pokemon pocket monsters.

Alto was in the shower when Kira, in her playpen, placed half the container on her face. When she inhaled, the container formed a seal over her nose and mouth and she suffocated.

Alto, a single mother from the Northern California town of Sonora, said she had been in the shower for about 20 minutes. She planned to feed and dress Kira after her shower.

"Instead, I came out and found her with the ball over her mouth and nose," a tearful Alto said. "I had to pull it off."

Kira's 4- and 5-year-old sisters, for whom Alto had gotten the Poke Balls, witnessed the death.

Burger King officials initially refused to recall or stop distributing the Poke Balls following Kira's death, said Russ Rader, spokesman for the U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission. After a close call Dec. 23 in Leavenworth, Kan., in which an 18-month-old girl's lips turned blue before her father pulled the toy off her face, Burger King agreed to the recall, Rader said.

Another child, 4-month-old Zachary Jones, of Indianapolis, was suffocated by the ball on Jan. 25, according to the Marion County Coroner's Office.

Burger King spokesman Charles Nicolas said company attorneys had not reviewed the lawsuit as of Thursday afternoon and could not comment on specifics of the case.

No one was available for comment from Delaware-based Specialized Technology Resources Inc., the testing company hired by Burger King to do safety studies. But a spokeswoman for the maker of Poke Balls, Equity Marketing Inc. of Beverly Hills, said the toys were put through rigorous testing beyond federal requirements. Specialized Technology Resources required the toymaker to change a small loop on the Poke Ball so that it could not break off and choke a small child, said Ria Carlson, a spokeswoman for Equity.

Equity has produced more than a billion products, and this is the first time a death has occurred in connection with one, she said.

"I think as tragic as this is, it was truly an accident," she said.

Boston College joins rights consortium

By Chris Fagiani
The Heights (Boston College)

(U-WIRE) CHESTNUT HILL, Mass. – In order to further combat the problem of sweatshop labor, Boston College has joined the Workers Rights Consortium (WRC). As a member of this organization, BC will work with other universities in guaranteeing the rights of apparel workers in emerging nations to engage in collective bargaining.

BC sent three representatives to the WRC organizational meeting in New York City last week. The representatives were two students, Alex Cheney, A&S '02, and Ellen Colleran, A&S '01, and professor of law Francis Hermann, SJ. The BC delegation was one of 30 that were sent from institutions across the country. To date, 44 colleges and universities have joined the consortium.

"I think that it is definitely a positive step that BC joined the WRC now. Since we joined so early, BC can have a major impact on the way the WRC is organized," said Deborah Piatelli, GSA&S '07 and member of United Students Against Sweatshops.

While BC joined the WRC with little administrative resistance, the students at many other universities had to put pressure on their respective administrations before they would agree to join the consortium. "I was happy that we were able to peacefully persuade BC to join the WRC. I got the impression that the debate over the WRC was very hostile at other schools. I am proud that the students, administrators and faculty at Boston College were able to work together in this process. But it should be remembered that it was successful because of student pressure and diligence," Cheney said.

In addition to the WRC, BC is a member of the Fair Labor Association (FLA). The FLA is similar to the WRC in that it is committed to establishing and monitoring labor standards for textile workers, but "[they] take different approaches to monitoring. The FLA is the larger organization and, at this point, has more resources and includes manufacturers and the federal government. The WRC is still taking shape but it has the participation of students and organized labor. We feel that the two groups complement each other and they both deserve the chance to see whether they can improve the condition of apparel-industry workers," said Vice President for Mission and Ministry Joseph Appleyard, SJ.

BC's move to join the WRC comes amidst complaint that the FLA is not effective due to corporate involvement. Currently, the FLA gives factories advance warning of inspections while the WRC will not. "Personally, I think the FLA is inherently flawed in that there is so much corporate involvement in the structure itself. Also, not a lot can be done to protect workers when its monitoring system is so nominal and ultimately controlled by the companies. The idea behind the WRC is to be a truly independent organization that uses surprise inspections in order to ensure fair labor practices," Cheney said.

Test Protest

Protesters gathered out side of the Student Union, yesterday afternoon, to speak out on the bomb testing in Puerto Rico

According to Whitbourne, suggestions have included everything from "something having to do with polymers" to "something from the opening of the Mullin's Center".

A current UMass Marching Band uniform, a Doo-Wop Shop C.D., a course guide, and newspaper articles concerning last semester's assaults have all been suggested.

"I would like students, RSO's (Registered Student Organizations), or any campus organization to submit the outstanding achievements of the students over the past couple of years," Whitbourne said. "Things people are really proud of."

"I really want to keep it a current picture of students," she said. "A picture of what life was like here now."

Suggestions for the time capsule can be mailed to Becky Dean, Chancellor's Office, Whitmore Administration Building, University of Massachusetts, Amherst MA 01003; sent by email to millennium_capsule@admin.umass.edu , or submitted to the committee's website:http://www.umass.edu/capsule/.

Of the few thousand left, some elephants still work

By Pamela Constable
The Washington Post

NEW DELHI, India _ The huge gray creatures plod patiently along the boulevards of this congested capital, oblivious to the honking and crush of careening trucks and buses. They, too, are commuting to work _ usually to religious festivals, where they lead processions, or to weddings, where they carry the bride and groom.

There are only 23 working elephants left in New Delhi, most of them living in a dilapidated riverside shantytown called Gautampuri. For the Ali family's troupe _ whose members range in age from 8-year-old Baby Rangili to the fornidable fortyish tusker Bag Bahadur _ life can be glamorous and grim.

There are moments of caparisoned glory, as in one recent festival in the city of Firozabad, where crowds cheered and showered six gaily painted pachyderms with rose petals as they entered a new Jain temple. But there are also hours of grueling marches under the hot sun, long nights standing in cramped cargo trucks en route to distant jobs, and those hazardous treks through Delhi's notorious traffic.

Last month, Lakshmi, a 35-year-old troupe member, died after a tourist bus slammed into him from behind. The Alis, a Muslim family that has handled elephants for four generations, brought him home alive, but he died several days later of internal injuries and was given a proper burial according to his owners' customs. The Alis are suing the bus company for damages.

"When an elephant dies, it can ruin a family," said Iqbal Ali, a fourth-generation hathi wallah, or elephant boss. His firm, one of Delhi's oldest elephant-for-hire businesses, operates from a shabby storefront office in Gautampuri, on the banks of the polluted Yamuna River, where other families keep an assortment of camels, prized white horses and water buffaloes.

The Alis, whose ancestors tended ceremonial and marshal elephants on royal estates, are uneducated but proud remnants of a dying occupation that has special significance in Indian history. The elephant god Ganesh is one of the most beloved in the Hindu pantheon. Live elephants were once ridden into battle and displayed by wealthy and warring maharajahs as symbols of power.

Today, there are only a few thousand elephants left in India, most of them in wildlife parks, temples or urban colonies for working animals. In Delhi, they are chained to a dull and demanding routine, but they still command public reverence in major government ceremonies, such as the annual awards for bravery.

"People know us as the masters of a big and strong animal," said Yousuf Ali, who manages the family business and spends most of his time in the storefront office in Gautampuri, haggling with customers on the phone. They are always at the head of the procession. It is a matter of pride and honor for us, but it will never get us a big car or a mansion."

The Alis are affectionate and protective toward the enormous creatures, most of whom they have owned for years. In the wild, elephants can live into their seventies, although urban hazards reduce their life expectancy considerably. The men cajole them with flirtatious nicknames and treat their ailments with homemade concoctions handed down through generations.

But the elephants' primary value is as an economic investment. Each week, the Alis weigh the income from weddings and religious festivals _ $119 to $167 per job per elephant _ against the costs of shipping, maintaining and feeding creatures that consume hundreds of pounds of hay per day. The tally is often just barely in the black.

"It was my forefathers who were really fond of elephants. They worked with them on royal estates, they went to war on them, they loved them. For me, it is a business," said Ghayar Ali, 30. "I like being part of a family tradition, but I do it because I am not educated to do anything else."

As the demand for elephants dwindles and the difficulties of keeping them safe and healthy in a congested city increase, Ghayar Ali is determined that his children not follow in his footsteps. "I want them to study, but all they want to do is roll in the mud with the elephants," he said with a sigh.

By the time they are grown, there may be no work left for elephants at all."

Ohio State strike continues unabated

By Travis James Tritten
The Lantern (Ohio State U.)

(U-WIRE) COLUMBUS, Ohio — They yelled obscenities at the university's president, and all he did was grin and bear it, trying to explain to students his position in a campus-wide strike moving into its third day.

OSU President William "Brit" Kirwan encountered tension and high emotions at an open forum held at the Ohio Union Wednesday evening to discuss the Communications Workers of America strike.

Accompanied by other concerned students, representatives of the NAACP, the Afrikan Student Union and Undergraduate Student Government turned out to voice opinions and suggestions often critical to the university's treatment of the ongoing labor dispute.

Several attendees raised issues such as the dive in quality of residence hall life and hospital services since the strike.

Kirwan said the university has contacted the union, asking picketers not to interfere with some hospital functions.

"We have sent a letter asking them to please not interfere with ambulance and drug delivery, and not to make undue noise outside the hospital," Kirwan said.

Still other attendees hurled allegations of university wrongdoing such as coercing residence hall advisers and other students workers to cross union picket lines and institutionalized racism.

Ron Meyers, president of the Council of Graduate Students, explained the dilemma that residents advisers and graduate assistants must deal with because the strike.

"In addition to the moral problem of crossing the picket lines, Gas and RAs have been asked not to speak on the issue," Meyers said.

Meyers was referring to the unofficial university practice of first-clearing residence advisers with Steve Kremer, director of residence life, before allowing them to speak to the media. Residents advisors are allowed to speak to the media as citizens but not as university employees, according to Bill Hall, assistant vice president of Housing, Food Services and Event Centers.

Residents advisers are now required by contract to perform some of the duties usually performed by union members, such as trash removal.

At one point, the group threatened to disband as Kirwan took a break from the meeting to meet with television news crews waiting in the hallway.

Andre Banks, a senior political science major, was skeptical of the administration's motivation for the open forum.

"This is a PR opportunity. Is it any coincidence that it's evening news time?" Banks said.

FREE MUMIA

On Wednesday, May 03, 2000 most of the staff of Everywoman's Center received a flier personally addressed to us that stated "Fry Mumia". We feel that it is important for us to make our position on this matter clear. We, the staff at Everywoman's Center stand firmly in support of a new trial for Mumia Abu-Jamal. Mumia Abu-Jamal is convicted of first-degree murder and has been sentenced to death for allegedly shooting and killing Officer Daniel Faulkner on December 9, 1981. There is overwhelming evidence that Mumia did not receive a fair trial. Mumia was given an unprepared court-appointed attorney who was later disbarred. A witness used against Mumia at his trial has now come forward and said that she had lied earlier under police coercion. The case against Mumia Abu-Jamal represents a clear example of the inherent racism of the criminal justice system and the implementation of the death penalty. Everywoman's Center is committed to building a world where social justice and human rights are the norm. It is for this reason that we stand by Mumia Abu-Jamal in his appeal for a new and fair trial.

Our Opinion
What makes news

The headline read, "Was Napoleon Murdered, or Did He Eat Shellfish?" That was the major science story written in Yahoo News yesterday. Is that earth-shattering news? Hardly.

But stories like that seem to be the "big issues" these days. Whether they're on the television news or in newspapers, bogus, irrelevant articles seem to be the focus of the media lately. And that's just horrible. It's horrible because our American society focuses way too much on the small things, those trivial happenings that barely affect anyone at all.

Who cares about how Napoleon died? It was decades ago, and we have much, much more pressing issues that we need to attend to. There are thousands of homeless people in Boston. Does that get any media attention? Of course not. Just as many men die from prostate cancer as women die from breast cancer – but is prostate cancer ever given any media attention, suggesting that people wear symbolic ribbons to show their awareness of the disease? Absolutely not.

These issues are never seen in the media, and the reason for that is rather simple. The fact is, we as Americans are "spur-of-the-moment." We only care about those acute problems or incidents that happen around us. We don't care about chronic problems that we can't seem to get rid of. Take homelessness for example: the problem has been with us as long as humans have lived in societies, and since we can't do much about it, we try to ignore it.

In general, people are much more interested in hearing about a local serial killer or a child molester. They are far more concerned with the stock market and the increasing price of postage stamps. Those are the issues that make headlines. And because of that, the more pressing problems are cast aside and are completely overlooked.

It is rather sad that people have a clue as to what the National Deficit is, but they can tell you who's ahead in the political polls. It's even sadder that some people don't realize there are probably homeless people in their hometowns, but they know how much money Nomar Garciaparra rakes in ever year. It's rather disgusting, but that's just the way society is.

So how do we change all of this? How do we make people more aware of their surroundings? How do we change the media's focus from the little trivial things to the more global problems that affect us every day? Can we do it? Is it even worth trying? Well, it wouldn't be easy, but it is certainly possible.

First off, we need to teach these issues in school. We need to force our young people to learn about the deficit, homelessness, the world-wide economy, the real statistics concerning drugs and addiction, the benefits of diversity, etc. These things cannot be instilled in young minds overnight, but if we make a change now, this country will definitely benefit, and possibly catch up to our Japanese counterparts.

"How did Napoleon die?" Who cares? We've got people starving and others dying. Let's get our priorities straight.

The "LAW"

This poem is in response to the increase of the misuse of power by the ones who administer the "law" for reasons other than to "serve and protect" the public.

"To serve and protect"
Words for the "protection" of the public
But those who this falls under
Is the people that are cream colored
Wonder why brothers and sisters
Walk by with cold glares
Because their presence
Is not of safety, but fear
So much visions
Of seeing themselves as foul images
Is not seen clear
Pictures of us poppin' guns
And throwin' down beers
Are seen all over TVs here
You believe everything you see?
Do you see us as enemies?
Taking your seeds
Knowing the earth, to you
Is only an object of gaining greed, as you lust for power
Hour after hour
Late breaking news
Of how you digs got to another dude
Leaving the message of
"We're coming for you soon."
You forgot to say "coon"
Or just call me "rastaman"
"Are those tracks in your arm?"
"Why your face so red?"
"Are you drunk?"
"Pop the trunk."
What exactly do you want?
Brothers and sisters who don't even pump
Are still caught up in this stuff
Seriously, WHAT THE FUCK!!!!!!! do you want
Been moving with the luck hoping
My people can go home without
The flashing white and blues
And the siren moaning
To be held up til Monday morning
And to just get a warning
Kids ball in the park are even harassed
As they pass in their cars, hell's chariots, saying
"Good, you're staying out of trouble."
Like it's living at their cribs
It makes us sick knowing
Your form of justice
Is making us love it
After dumping more than 3 dozen
Without asking one question, cousin
"We're doing our job."
Hell yea, with the people's lives you rob
You should get "Employee of the Month"
Brethren lost
Sisters' hearts torn apart
Taking seeds away
Cause you deem the situation
The "law" fucking put them in
Is a hot situation
Claim hate's erased
But WHY because
A lady had to hold her purse tight
When passing a brother in a staircase
You feel it's right to give case
Them come with some bullshit like
"You look lost, need to find a place...
Sir" with a smug face
Word
Swore you were going to call me a black bird
Alright then, I'll just fly away, away
I'm not going to bend
And get lighter for you today
The bright tapestry of us
Is now frayed, soaked with the blood
Of so called "enemies of the state"
That wanted to be free
And couldn't waited
The "law" is now in debate
Broken down from hearings
That ring righteous in the distance
And pictures of wrongs
440 plus long years
That are still strong
In the people today and they weren't even born
But the healing is prolonged
With the armies of Shey'ton
With their theme song "To serve and protect"
Ringing in our ears
But the hidden meaning is
"You get no respect"
You may walk on this earth
But it's I that tells you where to step.
But with last breather
And faces wet from tears
Of love ones far and near, steadily
We see clear, clear visions
That through trials and tribulations
We know who's gonna make it upstairs

Getting the edge

You can't be a one trick pony in this modern world. Knowledge and skills are of course valuable commodities. Nobody should force these on you but it is a good idea to go and seek them out. When you graduate from this place people will be looking for work experience on your resumes. You'll need something that lists marketable skills. Sometimes taking classes just won't do it alone. You need more than classroom experience. You can't learn everything in college. Try getting an internship.

Internships are the closest thing to an entry-level position without being paid. However, sometimes you do actually get paid, but it is usually uncommon. Internships are easier to get than jobs and you don't even have to have experience for some of them. That's one of the main points of an internship: you get experience. Another good thing about internships is that they can sometimes lead to an entry-level position with the organization you're interning with. No matter what the case, a good internship should always leave you with skills and knowledge you didn't have before your internship.

Jason Czernich

How would I suggest going about getting an internship? Investigate organizations that interest you or are in the field of your major. These, of course will provide the most fitting internships for you because they can provide you with skills that will be useful in your chosen vocation. If you don't know where to look for these fields make a trip over to the Mather Career Center. It's very far from all the other buildings on campus but it is worth the trip. At the career center they can help find an internship that is right for you. My friend Chris, a Communications major took the route and is now an intern at Dateline NBC in NYC. If his internship goes well he can stay on as a paid NBC page. You'd be surprised what you can find if you know where to look.

Applying for more than one internship is also a good idea. It's the same principle as applying to more than one college – if you don't get your first choice you'll still have options. Last spring I applied to three places for an internship: Northshore Music Theater, New World Theater, and The Comic Book Legal Defense Fund. Any one of these choices was fine as far as I was concerned. I knew that they would all be fine internships where I could gain valuable knowledge and skills.

I landed a swell internship with The Comic Book Legal Defence Fund (CBLDF). (For those of you who are unfamiliar with the CBLDF, it is an organization that helps to protect the First Amendment rights of people who sell or create comics.) My internship there was three days a week, and I learned some marketable skills there. Among the office skills I learned were screening phone calls, working with a computer database, making office supply runs, making post office runs, dealing with premium orders over the phone, shipping out packages, court case research, etc. I had never worked in an office environment before and interning at the CBLDF was a great chance to see what it was like.

I also got to meet and work with some very nice people during my internship such as the Fund's executive director, Chris Oarr, assistant director Chris Bleiem, Bookkeeper, Jeannie Martin. I also met other exciting people such as artist extraordinaire Chris Shadoian and former intern and friend Shane Heckethorn who just recently has been promoted to a full time position.

I am majoring In Theater and English and I see many of my classmates from both majors focusing on one or two small aspects of their chosen field without seeing the big picture. The big picture is you need to cultivate your skills in a working environment before you leave college and that, most of the time, putting all your energy into just one skill is foolish. They put all their energy into doing one thing such as acting, and they don't realize that if they know something about stage tech too that there is less of a chance that they will be a simple starving artist after they graduate. I have a message for you people: you can do so much more!

Internships are but one way to fill your resume. Why do you think I do Ed/Op for the Collegian? Why do you think I do entertainment reports for WMUA? Getting involved is another way to obtain more skills.

After I graduate this spring I'll be off to Beverly, Massachusetts to get paid as a production intern at Northshore Music Theater. I might add that my previous internship experience provided a good reference so that it was easier to get this internship. Thanks Chris.

Well this is my last column. I want thank all the people who actually read my columns and said "hello" when they saw me on campus. I want to also thank the Ed/Op editors for letting me express my ravings in print.

Good-bye UMass! Hello Northshore!

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

So this is it, huh, folks? The last edition of "Notes from the Campus Center Basement" for the school year. "Notes" are written every Friday during the spring semester by graduating seniors, and consist mainly of jokes, random thoughts, and occasionally "good byes." I hope you enjoy mine...

Ever wonder why no matter how nice it is outside, there is always a hurricane in front of the ever-so phallic DuBois library and all throughout Southwest? Seriously, you'll be walking through campus, the weather all calm and serene; and then whoosh! Your clothes blow off you as you reach the front of that gigantic building or stand in front of the pyramids in front of Washington. Man, I hate that.

When's the last time anyone saw Voltron? Damn, that cartoon rocked.

Am I the only one who didn't know Faith Hill was so hot?! Every time I see that Pepsi commercial with her in it, I'm blown away. Gotta love the southern chicks – they're full of surprises.

"We are the world... we are the children!" Yeah, Tiffany.

Hey, Alexis, I'm burning that damn picture you cherish so dearly. I'm putting up a picture of Britney Spears instead. I know you'll love that.

The average penis is 5.3 inches long and only 2 percent of the population is larger than 8 inches, so a lot of you guys out there are full of it. Just remember that when you have your next conversation with your buddies (And you remember it too, ladies. Not every man can be a porn star, if you know what I mean). But don't worry, Tiny Tims... there's more to pleasing a woman than large genitalia – it's called a vibrator. Sorry.

"My doctor said, 'Mylanta.'" Well, I say, "that stuff tastes like ass."

Oh no. Only two more episodes left of 90210. Who gives a rat's ass?

You know what I think should come back in style? Drive-in movie theaters. How cool would that be?

You know, the Ed/Op page gets a lot of crap from the other departments down here. They say we're not professional and we all have easy jobs. You wanna know what I say? I say they're just jealous because we have the easiest page to lay out, we almost never have "serious" journalism on the page, yet we always have writers and we're still read more than any other section in the newspaper. Well, that and Rob, Alexis and I are the sexiest bitches that work here. Beefcake... BEEFCAKE!

Everyone likes the band Incubus, right? Do you know what that is? It's a spirit that sucks the souls out of sleeping women. And a succubus does the same to men. Don't believe in that "witchy" sort of stuff? Well, succubae do exist. In fact, we have one that works down at the Collegian. She stalks, harasses, lies, and probably sacrifices chickens, so watch out!

Funny story: two springs ago, while taking my Organic II final, I couldn't get the song "I Touch Myself" out of my head throughout the entire exam. I did better on that exam than any other final I took that semester... and I was working with only 2 hours of sleep. Yeah, masturbation! (Did I really just say that? Oh well, I'm not afraid to go blind anyway.)

Speaking of masturbation, a study showed that over 90 percent of American women either currently masturbate or at one time did it on a regular basis. Yet no girl will admit to it. Hmm... some of you girls out there are fibbing a little. You know what, guys? If you're reading this, ask all of your female friends (or girlfriends) and see what they say. If they get defensive, they're lying.

Football should never go D-I at this school. Because of Title IX, many men's programs will probably be erased. Take gymnastics for example. The team might not bring any revenue into the school, but its members have made it to NCAAs, Jeff LaVallee won the "Senior Athlete of the Year" award, and coach Roy Johnson has done a lot for the sport in general. Why would we want to get rid of that program? I'm not writing this because I cover the beat... I just don't see why more money should be wasted on football when over $2,000,000 is lost every year on the sport as it is. There are just so many way too many scholarships for that team. But at least they brought home a championship once, right?

I'm kind of strange guy. I have no problem taking off my pants and showing everyone "what's up," but I won't ever take my shirt off. Kind of a weird insecurity problem, eh? Maybe I should stay away from the D.P Doughs (or actually do something active for a change. Like yelling).

Remember the show "The Facts of Life?" I always thought that Joe was a lesbian. Didn't you?

My roommate Mike wrote a phat rap a while ago. He's no Slim Shady but he wrote a damn cool jam. Ask him to sing it for you – I'm sure he wouldn't mind.

Hey, it just wouldn't be right if I didn't give a shout out to Matt Despres, even though he's from Saugus. He was my first beat partner over at the sports desk... yeah, cross country! He still thinks his hometown is better than mine, but he is so wrong. Peabody rocks! (OK, maybe not, but at least it doesn't sound as strange as Saugus... just say it: "Saugus." Very strange.)

Hey, take a minute and picture me with long hair, a decent build, in a black double-breasted suit, wearing black sunglasses. Are you picturing an Italian Kenny G? Well, I did have long hair and that exact image I described is hanging on the wall down here. Damn it, I knew I should never have brought that picture down here (And I do not look like a dork, Alexis. That was in style at one time... OK a long time ago, but whatever.)

Well, that's it, folks. My last attempt at humor in The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. It's been a fun ride and maybe you'll see me again someday. Enjoy life and remember... "Never trouble trouble 'till trouble troubles you." Well, unless you're really pissed off, I guess.

Entreclub awards $10,000 and services yesterday

The Entreclub ended their semester long program by giving out $10,000 worth of prize money as well as services from some industry leaders. The awards ceremony comes after a program filled with workshops and activities designed to give student entrepreneurs the skill that they need to develop a successful business.

The program began on February 10th with a panel of entrepreneurs with ties to the UMass community, including Jeff Taylor, CEO of Monster.com.

That first event drew a crowd of 333 students, out of which 40 business concepts emerged. From these concepts over 30 executive summaries were formed, which lead to the submission of 24 business plans.

This list was narrowed to five finalists for the evening of awards. The contest was divided into two categories. Those businesses with potential for serious growth were included in the high growth category. Those businesses that would not grow substantially were grouped into the lifestyle category.

The first company, introduced by Todd Audyatin, a graduate Political Science major who has been involved with the Entreclub since its inception to present their plan was eCommunity Guide. The company was prepared with some strong statistics that supported their idea. They explained that 98% of businesses are presently considered small businesses. With their site, they hope to give all of these small businesses the chance to reach out to consumers within their community with the power of the Internet.

The structure of eCommunityGuide, or as they like to call it, ECG, is similar to About.com. They plan to include some 10,000 communities within the next five years. Giving them the ability to track little league stat records and gain instant access to all of their local municipalities. With partnerships with Mapquest.com and other similar sites, they hope to create a site that will cater to the entire community to which it serves.

They plan to make their money through national and regional advertising, promotional listings, market research data, and small business e-services. They hope to eclipse $800,000 in revenue by the end of next year. Peter Gelinas, CEO, ended his groups presentation by adding, "this is how local is done."

The second group to present their plan was The Chamberlain Group, which was comprised of one UMass graduate student as well as many non-students. Deborah Robinson began working with the group as part of a Master's project. She has helped the company to develop their business plan.

The group hopes to enter the market of medical models, developing the products that go hand and hand with medical innovations. Currently, they have ten products available, including a model heart that the judges were given to review.

They believe that their advantage comes with the fact that they use soft anatomical models. This allows for a degree of customization that can allow doctors to order models that reflect certain disease specific states.

The company hopes to begin by targeting current device manufacturers, and later moving in the school research markets. After bringing the company to a level where they feel that is succeeding, they plan to sell. The sale is projected for a period between 2005-2007.

The third high growth company to present itself was LiveResearch.com, an interactive market research firm. They are currently seeking $500, 000 to develop a prototype that will allow them to focus on the Generation Y market.

Once they can get this market logged on and involved with their site. They plan to run surveys that can be sold to major retailers. They cite their strength as the ability to collect and report quickly data on Generation Y. They hope to enter the market as an IPO in 2-5 years.

After a 30 minute break during which time the judges deliberated it was time for the lifestyle businesses to present their company. Each of the two finalists won a $1,000 prize. The first presenter was Ian's, which plans to jump into the market of gourmet pizza by the slice, targeting college towns. Second in the lifestyle category was Zform, a video game development companies who is currently working to develop games that can be played by the visually impaired as well as those who are not. They plan on doing this by developing games that use both graphics and audio.

When the lifestyle presentations were finished, Tripp Peake, a representative for Mass Ventures, took the stage to present the awards to the businesses in the high growth company. LiveResearch took third place. For their efforts they will receive $1,500 in cash as well as services from Mass Ventures. Taking second place was eCommunityGuide. They will take home $2,500 and services from Pricewaterhouse Coopers and Mass Ventures. The big winner on the night was the Chamberlain Group. They were rewarded with $4,000 and services from Pricewaterhouse Coopers, MB Design, Robinson Donovan Madden and Berry, and Mass Ventures. After a semester of intense work, all three groups seemed to be relieved that it was over.

Will the Internet fade or flourish?

As an upcoming graduate of business school, I will be entering an exciting new business climate. Most companies out there today appear to be grabbing shiny new rain hats to match their Orvis Edition Ford Explorers, while they weather the emerging attributes and reap the benefits of this turbulent new economy. I am attempting to discern the long term effects of this Internet hype and eye the Weather Channel and CNBC with some suspicion.

When the Internet storm subsides, what needs will people regain? What needs have essentially changed? What looks different but remains the same? This is the question that Malcom Gladwell brings to the table in the New Yorker's December article, "Clicks and Mortar-Don't believe the Internet hype: the real E-commerce revolution happened off-line."

Gladwell tells the story of the early 1900's when a life of a rural farmer was more prominent than that of a city dweller. The US postal service was free to rural farmers, provided their roads were in decent enough shape, which they were not. Until some farmer invented a device called the King Road Drag.

Cassy Gardner

The King Road Drag was a simple invention that fixed the roads. With good roads, the farmers argued that packages might be sent along free, as they were in towns. Congress agreed, and the age of the catalog was born.

With free parcel service to rural areas, two major changes occurred that had a strong impact on the culture and the economy of the time. Suddenly, small companies were able to "bypass the middleman and reach customers all over the country." At the same time, information became readily available. "If something happened in Washington, or France, or the Congo one evening, everyone would know about it the next morning."

Gladwell calls it "the dawn of a modern consumer economy- an economy in which retailers and consumers, buyers and sellers became connected for the first time."

Sounds a bit like the Internet's effects on the economy, right?

Companies did not need to set up a retail storefront to sell their wares anymore. Catalogue companies do not employ "human search engines" to find sought after goods appropriate for mail order. The Internet is becoming popular storefront for many companies and search engines and sites like Ask Jeeves and About.com or Ebow.com make recommendations and help web customers find items in that vast catalogue of online stores.

Online stores or companies have become a popular business models. Our current economy seems to value ideas and creativity more than it does logistics behind the procurement systems of the last "business revolution." The credit to success of the catalogue industry, according to the author, is the warehousing and distribution systems that allowed it to work so well.

Gladwell mentions a failed idea of selling produce through the postal system. In 1918, the attempt was hailed as "an epoch in the history of the United States and the world." It did not work because the milk spoiled, eggs were crushed, and potatoes were frozen; in essence, poor procurement and distribution.

Left with this final anecdote it is up to the reader to decide who gets credit for this new Internet business climate: those with the ideas, or those who create the systems to the ideas work. It is up to me and you to decide which business model I will place my bets on in the process.

Editor's Note

You are now reading the last business page of the semester, or for a long time after that. When we began the business page, it was our goal to give the students of UMass information on business, whether it be at a national level or a local level.

The semester has produced a number of newsworthy events. Ben and Jerry's struggled to remain independent, but in the end they became a part of Unilever. We learned of the School of Management's plans to build a new building. Chris Brennan gave you his bi-weekly stock picks, while Dave Katzoff kept you informed about student businesses across campus.

In addition to this, the page gave you a forum to express your opinion on business matters, with editorials ranging from the IMF to the glass ceiling preventing women from reaching the top of the corporate latter.

Some of you may have noticed that I said that this will be the last business page for a long time. In an effort to report more news, I will become a beat writer next year at the Collegian. I will cover the business beat. Dry your tears, you will still see my fine business reporting, only now it will be on a more regular basis.

I began the business page because I felt that business issues were going unrecognized in the Collegian. My goal for the page was to make these issues, which hold relevance with many students, accessible to the student body. In my opinion, and I hope that you all will agree, the business page was successful in bringing to the campus a bi-weekly glimpse of the world of business.

It was a pleasure publishing this page. I would especially like to thank everyone who contributed to the page, namely Chris Brennan, David Katzoff, Megan Clarke, Sean Kennedy, Amy Garganta, Brian Lohnes, and Cassy Gardner. I would like to wish everyone a good, safe summer vacation. Good luck to all seniors who are moving on to the real world. I will see the rest of you in the fall.

Green-O: an alternative to dining commons

By David Katzoff
Collegian Staff

As a product of the North Central hippy-hop culture, it gives me great pleasure to report on our favorite local eatery. Situated in the cellar of Greenough dormitory, "the G-Spot" is the largest of the three on-campus Snack Bars, entirely run and managed by undergraduate students.

Specializing in hearty snack foods such as grinders, heroes, subs, burgers (beef and veggie), bagels, giant cookies and ice cream, Green-O is a healthy, tasty alternative to the dining commons which not only provides delicious vegetarian and carnivorous dinnertime and late night meals, but is only a small hike for the lazy dorm rats that dwell in the upper hills of our strikingly handsome campus.

The business hours are from 5:00 p.m. until midnight — Sunday through Thursday – this is undeniably convenient for certain "Centralites" who engage in celebratory 4:20 commencements, then catch the back to back episodes of the Simpson's at 5:30 p.m. and 6:00 p.m. and seemingly forget to meander down the hill and feast on the remaining chicken fingers or grill cheese scraps at the D.C. before it closes. Yes, "the G-Spot" is a beautiful thing, full of vibrant workers jammin' to the grooviest tunes, (at one time) fascinating graffiti art, and addictive board games (like Scrabble and Chutes 'N' Ladders) that help pass the time as the sandwich architects behind the counter work their craft with Picasso-ian artistry.

Besides being a munchie haven for stoners, hungry hippies, fatigued Frisbee chuckers and study breakers, Green-O offers a well-organized catering service for UMass communi-ty events. In addition, the shop makes delectable sandwiches sold daily at fellow student store, the People's Market.

Established in 1971, GSS was initially a dinning area for the Greenough/Chadbourn/Baker cluster. Over the next two decades, the cafe flourished and by 1992 it became part of the student business organization at the university. With a staff of fifteen, each member has specifically delegated duties, from marketing and advertising to inventory, purchasing, bookkeeping, maintenance and steering (a committee that engineers the future of the organization). Co-managed with supreme efficiency, Green-O takes an active interest educating its workers about the co-curricular responsibilities of running a business in an academic environment. Because it is a non-profit organization, the shop devotes particular energy supporting various Pioneer Valley distributors. Specialty items and fresh products bought and sold by GSS are primarily consumed from local establishments such as Rao's coffee, Squash Produce Inc. and Snow's Ice Cream.

So if you haven't yet enjoyed the Green-O experience, I strongly recommend venturing wayward through the hills of upper Central. Just remember (for whatever reason) to bring your feverous appetite along.

Bowl Day Takes Over the Hill

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

This weekend will be filled to the brim with amazing live music. Everyone knows that the annual Spring Concert will be at the Mullins Center on Sunday night. However, with the Southwest Battle of the Bands already through, and the Sylvan barbecue appearing to be something from a distant past, Bowl Day Weekend on Orchard Hill gets a chance to take the spotlight.

Over the past two years, Bowl Day Weekend has undergone some changes that have made it much better than it ever was. Much of the credit can be attributed to Orchard Hill Area Governor Iefferson Smith, and Lt. Governor (2000-2001 year Governor Elect) John Sheehan. Since their move into OHAG last year, the duo has made Bowl Day a priority on the hill.

Historically, Bowl Day has taken place on a Saturday afternoon, and included an all day cookout, with a concert on the basketball court shared by Orchard Hill and Central. A few years ago there was a Bowl Day dance created for Friday night, making it an official 24-hour event. Smith and Sheehan have added so much to the event, that it can no longer simply be called Bowl Day. Instead it must be called Bowl Day Weekend.

The festivities will begin Friday night with the dance in the Bowl. The dance will begin at 9:00pm. Bowl Day Weekend ends on Sunday afternoon at 4:00pm

Governor Iefferson Smith said that Bowl Day weekend is, "Something that OHAG has been planning all year. We've raised a lot of money and brought a lot of groups into this. We're expecting it to be a big success."

Saturday's activities are the heart of the program. OHAG has worked extraordinarily hard to make it the absolute best concert that it could possibly be. The line-up for the show is certain proof that hard work pays off. Big name bands Luna and The Sheila Divine are on tap to be the headliners, and Viperhouse and Chuck will open up the festivities.

Luna began playing together in 1991, and have already released six albums. Their accomplishments include 1992's Lunapark, 1994's Bewitched, 1995's Penthouse, 1996's Luna, 1997's Pupteni, and 1999's Days of Our Nights. The band's bassist and founding member Justin Harwood will not be in attendance on Saturday night, because his wife just gave birth, and he has gone back to his home in New Zealand to be with her. Harwood has been replaced by Britta Phillips, who has been touring with the band since April.

The Sheila Divine is certainly creating recognition in the local area. The band, which played Skybox earlier this semester, has been the recipient of several awards for their album, New Parade. The Sheila Divine has been compared to other great bands such as The Replacements, and seem ready to take the music world by storm.

Viperhouse is a personal favorite of John Sheehan. He described their sound as "a modern day spasm band," and explained that the last time he saw them, they played for over five and a half hours.

Sheehan seemed extremely excited that all four of the bands would be in attendance. He insisted that Bowl Day weekend will be great, and everyone is welcome to attend. He said that the concert is the perfect opportunity to "Get out, sit in the sun, and listen to some great music."

Today's Video Pick:
Predator

By Wes Wrightson
Collegian Staff

My video pick of the week is Arnold Schwarzenegger's Predator. This film kicks some major ass in the genre of action-adventure, as well as in the genre of science fiction. This film was shot and released in 1987, and to this day it is still mind-boggling in terms of special effects and all-around coolness. The film was the sleeper hit of the summer (with the audiences and with the critics) of 1987 and grossed just around 80 million domestically. Predator spawned an altogether inferior sequel starring Danny Glover that was both commercially and critically unsuccessful.

Rent the Predator or I'll kill you. COURTESY PARAMOUNT PICTURES

The film stars Schwarzenegger as Dutch, an elite CIA operative recruited to rescue hostages held by guerrilla fighters in a Central American country. Schwarzenegger and his elite team encounter the guerrillas and a melee ensues. They end up only seizing one hostage, and encounter an enemy unimaginably more deadly than any being on Earth. The alien, whom looks like a crustacean/Rastafarian cross breed, sports an array of defense mechanisms and an arsenal that would only make the likes of Schwarzenegger salivate. The alien has this way-cool laser canon on his shoulder that fires where-ever he looks.

Schwarzegger's elite comprises of Carl Weathers, the Minnesota Governor Jesse Ventura, Bill Duke, and Shane Black. There are a couple of others, but no one of real note. Carl Weathers is Dutch's friend who convinces him to go on the mission in the first place only because he believes that Dutch's team is "expendable." Carl ends up alien fodder in a neat scene where he looses his arm, and then gets impaled by the alien's razor blade hand device. Bill Duke (who also makes a cameo in Schwarzenegger's earlier effort, Commando) plays Jesse Ventura's friend who meets his maker complements of the alien. Jesse Ventura is by far the best of Arnold's team. He plays a tobacco spitting bad-ass from the South who has the best weapon-a rotary gun that is as long as a person. Shane Black plays a member of the elite team who first discovers the alien, and, coincidentally, is the first of the team to bite-the-bullet. Black is also a major Hollywood screenwriter, responsible for bringing some of the most entertaining movies to light. I compare him to the ever-affable Owen Wilson. Wilson is a Hollywood actor (The Haunting, Anaconda, and the upcoming Shanghai Noon).

Predator is directed by John McTiernan. McTiernan was responsible for the more recent crime-caper The Thomas Crown Affair as well as the likes of the first Die Hard and the Schwarzenegger dookie-bomb, The Last Action Hero. Predator also boasts, as the alien its self, Jean-Claude van Damme. Before the action star wannabe started doing lame-ass movies (as well as doing enough cocaine to supply a Third World country) and becoming a name, he did the stunt work for this film as the creature. Kevin Peter Hall also shared the duties with van Damme before his untimely death after this film was released. Predator also boasts a cool soundtrack that, while lacking any real songs, has a cool and catchy theme to it. I recommend this film to anyone who likes cat-and mouse action films.

Arts. It just is.

Women's water polo enters final stage in Indy

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

INDIANAPOLIS- Last year, they were forced to fly over 3,000 miles to challenge the nation's best in hostile California waters.

No. 12 Massachusetts needed less than half that much travel to arrive at this year's United States Water Polo Women's Collegiate I National Championship, but the Minutewomen (28-7) still face a perilous journey in reaching the Promised Land of the sport. The team will battle the fifth-seeded Spartans of San Jose State (20-16) in tourney-opening action today at the Indiana University Natatorium, with hopes of moving on to face the winner of the Southern California-Loyola Marymount game in round two.

"We ended up with a pretty good seed," said Coach Dan McOsker. "If we can get a win in our first game, we have a great shot at making it to the semis."

UMass has to like its chances against Coach Lou Tully's squad, despite its 0-2 all-time mark against SJSU. The Minutewomen gave the Spartans a serious run for their money back on March 14 in San Jose, battling to a 0-0 halftime deadlock before eventually falling, 5-2. The Maroon and White didn't get on the scoreboard until the fourth quarter of that affair (via goals from Kelly Chassy and Katie Grogan), and a solid eight-save performance from sophomore keeper Dana Sinkwich was spoiled by a pair of late goals from San Jose senior Liz Garcia that kept UMass at bay.

"That game was really close the entire way," McOsker said. "To be at 0-0 at the half and lose on the kind of goals we did, I think we match up real well with San Jose State."

The Minutewomen's other loss to the Spartans came in the final round of last year's National tourney, when San Jose outlasted UMass 8-6 to capture ninth place and leave the Maroon and White to settle for tenth (in exact accordance with both teams' pre-tournament seedings).

This year's Spartans are led into battle by a two-headed monster of Ukranian and Californian water polo power. Sophomore Kiev native Inna Fedoseyeva has paced the San Jose attack all season to the tune of a team-high 61 goals, while fellow second-year standout Neva West-Salinas, CA) ranks second on the team in scoring with 42 goals. With Fedoseyeva rifling home shots from the field and West bullying defenders in the 2-meter position, the Spartans present a perplexing offensive puzzle for McOsker and his troops to try and solve.

"Those two are pretty much their best weapons offensively," McOsker said. "We need to figure out a way to stop them."

Not that stopping the Minutewomen is any picnic, by any means. All-American Grogan has given opposing defenses fits all season, piling up 63 goals, 31 assists and 30 ejections drawn (all team highs). The co-captain's senior leadership has been complemented wonderfully by fellow Golden State original Chassy, who has racked up 40 goals in a breakout freshman campaign.

The high-powered Maroon and White offense has also gotten a huge boost from the unbelievable swimming ability of players like Sarah Newell, who has won a team-high 22 swim-offs this season and ranks second on the UMass career list in that category with 41. Newell often draws the team's toughest and most strenuous defensive assignments, simply by virtue of her amazing mobility in the water and seemingly unflappable endurance.

"During our last game against Princeton, we asked Sarah to basically swim in giant triangles the entire game," McOsker said. "At one point I pulled her aside to ask her if she was OK, and she was huffing and puffing so much she could barely talk. But she never complained."

Stopping the Spartans will be just the beginning of UMass' climb through the National Tournament. The team's possible second-round opponents are both dangerous adversaries: the Lions of Loyola-Marymount bested the Minutewomen 9-7 in the Davis Shootout in March, while the Trojans of USC are the defending National Champions of the sport.

Laker mood confident not panicky for tonight

By Tim Kawakami
Los Angeles Times

EL SEGUNDO, Calif. – What happens now that the Laker power forwards won't shoot and Shaquille O'Neal is drawing coverage from everybody but the weakside linebacker and the bench is being overrun and the Sacramento Kings are a game away from ecstasy?

What happens when the second-greatest regular season in Laker history is ready to be fed to the wolves only four games into the NBA postseason?

What happened a day after the senses-shattering defeat in Sacramento to force Friday's decisive Game 5 at Staples Center, was that Ron Harper, the Laker co-captain and voice of championships past, sat in a chair and called the court of public opinion to order.

Despite the successive losses in Sacramento, if you're looking for a Laker fold, Harper said casually, you might be waiting for a long time.

"We don't plan on going nowhere," Harper said after Wednesday's team film session. "We don't think that way. We're going to go out Friday night, put on a good show. We're going to win Friday night's game. There's no doubt in my mind that we're going to win Friday night's game. I'm not guaranteeing, but there's no doubt in my mind. I've got confidence in my teammates that we're going to win Friday night's game."

So, no, the mood at the Lakers' El Segundo headquarters Wednesday was not pure panic, or even a general rethinking of the basketball calculus that resulted in the Kings' victories in Games 3 and 4 to tie the first-round series.

From Harper to Coach Phil Jackson to the other veterans who spoke to the media, there was strong agreement on several major points.

– That the game plan for the Kings works, when followed.

– That the Lakers did not handle the heat and roar of Arco Arena, but that winning 67 games in the regular season afforded them the luxury of having every decisive playoff game at Staples.

– And that it doesn't matter if the Laker bench isn't the most productive in the league or if A.C. Green and Robert Horry need to be more assertive.

Because with O'Neal, Bryant and Glen Rice, and assuming other players rise to the challenge, the Lakers' confidence is undiminished.

"I don't think they're stunned," Jackson said. "I think what they are is they're angry, and I think some of it's self-righteous anger.

"And I think some of it's frustration and I think some of that has to come with feeling like they just stepped out of the lion's den, because of the sound and the noise of the crowd and the energy that was placed out on the floor."

Said Harper, who won three NBA championships while playing under Jackson with the Chicago Bulls: "We won 67 basketball games this season – this is what we won those games for, to play home games.

"I don't think we lost three games straight. ... Well, then, what's the problem? ... We haven't lost three games all season long, ain't no need for us to think we're going to lose this game."

The Lakers did not deny that some problems developed during the trip to Sacramento.

Clearly, Green and Horry, who combined for 10 points in two games, were reluctant to shoot, which allowed King forward Chris Webber to spend most of his defensive time making sure O'Neal always had two bodies to deal with on the post.

Also, after keeping the King bench relatively in check in the two victories at Staples Center to start the series, the Lakers were hit hard by the Kings' "Bench Mob" in Games 3 and 4, with Tony Delk, Predrag Stojakovic and Jon Barry all individually outscoring the Laker bench total.

that's for sure... I can't think of a game that she's played when she's been okay." Sortino said of Faessler, who is known as a gritty player that complains little about pain.

Finding humor in her bandaged finger – with which she still throws nearly every base runner out – Faessler wondered why it took an injury for her to produce a two-hit performance.

"If I had known, I'd have broken my finger a long time ago," she said, laughing. "I was definitely not trying for [the home run]. I wouldn't have cared if I didn't hit a home run all season."

Much of the reason for Sortino's criticism of her team was to prepare it for the up-coming home showdown with the Rams, who will play two at the new UMass softball complex tomorrow at noon. There will also be a senior-day ceremony for Faessler before the games.

If the Minutewomen sweep both games, they will win the Atlantic 10 Regular-Season Championship outright. Although they took Brown a bit lightly, the players understood the magnitude of tomorrow's twin bill.

"We're working on Rhode Island for this weekend so we can go into the A-10s on a win streak, feeling good about ourselves," Cross said.

loss in the A-10's first two years of existence.

In an earlier game with the Hokies, the Owls soared to an 18-6 victory.

"I think it creates an exciting environment... almost electric," Barnes said. "It's the playoffs – it's all the hard work you put from September through April – and it all comes down to this weekend for the trophy. Win or lose, it's just a great experience to be part of something like that."

Bonnies bring baseball's biggest test

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

Ladies and gentlemen, let the games begin.

Having battled their way to a 21-17-1 record this season, the Massachusetts baseball team will enter its most critical weekend series of the year on Saturday, when it travels to New York to face St. Bonaventure. The Bonnies (22-12 overall, 9-6 A-10) hold a half-game lead over UMass in the Atlantic 10 heading into the homestretch, a fact that Minuteman coach Mike Stone is well aware of.

"This is the biggest weekend yet," said Stone. "We did a good job rising to the occasion last weekend, and need that again. [The Bonnies] are a good hitting ball club, who have good pitching and are strong defensively. I expect a hard series."

The Minutemen seemed poised to storm into weekend play, having ripped Siena for 17 runs on Tuesday. They faltered against Harvard the following afternoon, however, failing to mount a consistent attack and coming up just one run short after a ninth inning rally. Despite the 9-8 loss, the Minutemen have been playing some of their best ball of the season, winning seven of their last 10 games. One of the sparks of the UMass streak has been centerfielder Nick Gorneault.

"He's been getting good at bats, and good swings," said Stone. "He's done a real good job. He's a good college player."

Gorneault is currently riding a 13-game hitting streak, the longest of any UMass player this season. During the streak, Gorneault is hitting .541 with five doubles, two homers and four stolen bases. His seven homeruns and 34 runs batted in lead the team.

Defensively, the Minutemen have benefited greatly from the move of Aaron Senez to third and freshman Matt Boulanger to shortstop. Senez, a reactionary player, has shown great speed and poise at the corner, while Boulanger has surprised with an exceptionally strong arm. Together, the two have become a solid defensive unit that has kept UMass in games where the offense was slow to start.

"Matt has looked pretty good lately," said Stone. "He's really done the job. It's nice to see that the move pays off. It's good to see."

What the Minutemen are truly hoping to see this weekend is the return of catcher Chris Morgan. Morgan, who has been the major offensive workhorse for UMass all season long, went down earlier this week with a back sprain suffered in practice. Stone said he had hoped for Morgan to return this Saturday, but that his status remains day to day.

"We don't know," said Stone of the catcher's return. "We didn't seem to miss his bat on Tuesday, and it didn't seem to affect us early on [against Harvard.] But not having his bat in the lineup hurt us later on. Tommy [Ellerbrook] does a good job behind the plate, but it's really Chris's bat that we missed."

With or without Morgan the games must go on, and Stone will turn to his pitching rotation to help secure the victories. Senior Travis Veracka will get the nod in the first game of Saturday's doubleheader, while Craig Szado will work the mound in the nightcap. Brian Hourigan will close the weekend out on Sunday afternoon. Veracka and Szado both went the distance last weekend at URI, picking up a pair of key 3-1 victories.

The Bonnies are 9-2 at home, and have been propelled by a team batting average of .323. Eight players are batting over .300, including junior Mark Evers. The shortstop is batting .403 with seven homeruns and 35 RBIs.

On the mound, the Bonnies are led by Saul Solveson. The sophomore has compiled a 5-2 record in seven starts, coupled with an ERA of 3.96. Senior Aaron Bouie has also pitched his way to a 5-2 season record, collecting an ERA of 5.68 with two complete games under his belt.

The first pitch of Saturday's doubleheader is scheduled for noon.

just got enough of it to hit out," Cross said of the record-tying blast.

After game two concluded, Minutewoman coach Elaine Sortino smiled and shook her head as she described the feat of her freshman phenom. Turning around to make sure that Cross was not listening, Sortino whispered only words of praise and promise.

"I'm not surprised. I'm not surprised," Sortino said, again shaking her head. "I coached the hitter that had that record and I know how totally tough she was... hitting the ball over the long fence at Totman [Field]. I think Brandi's going to shatter that record. And I think she's going to shatter her own record every year. She's that good of a hitter."

Not only is Cross the squad's top power hitter, but she's also proven herself as the Minutewomen's most reliable slugger as well. She boasts a team-high batting average of .400. She's tops for UMass with 32 RBI, and has a slugging percentage over .650. Add these statistics to the fact that Cross missed four games this season due to a death in the family and her already strong resume makes a case for her as the team's M.V.P. this spring.

The California native also ranks atop the Minutewomen in on-base percentage (.461) and second in fielding percentage (.990). She and the rest of the UMass softball squad hosts Rhode Island Saturday for a noon double-header.

Minutewomen focus on A-10's; Track faced with possible Hirsch absence

By Regan McKendry
Collegian Correspondent

Spring has finally arrived in the Pioneer Valley.

The temperature is rising and the shorts have come out of winter storage. However, while most students are currently focused, or at least should be, on their final exams, athletes have something equally if not more important things on tap for the next few weeks: league championships.

As many continue to play through the season simply for pride, some, like the Massachusetts women's outdoor track team has a title to defend. Winners of the 1999 Atlantic 10 Outdoor Track & Field Championships, the Minutewomen will travel down to Blacksburg, Va. this weekend in an attempt to repeat as the conference's best.

UMass is not without its share of obstacles. One problem being faced is that the last time the Maroon and White visited Hokieland for the tournament, the team was filled with star-studded seniors. That is not the case this year, however, as the Minutewomen have had to go through what some would call a rebuilding process.

One current senior who remembers last years' A-10's very well is Sally Hirsch. The Brookline, Mass. native set an Atlantic 10 record in the 5,000 meters last year with a time of 17:22.68. On top of that blue ribbon performance, Hirsch also showed in the 3,000 meters. Unfortunately for UMass, Hirsch has been hampered by injury for most of the season and her status for the tournament is up in the air.

Even during the darkest times there is always some bright spots in the sky. For the Minutewomen, this past Sunday's glory belonged to junior Sharyn Harrison. As UMass made its final tune up on Sunday at the Yale Invitational, Harrison wasted no time, getting herself into the university record books. Taking part in the javelin competition, Harrison launched a throw of 131-feet-5, breaking the previous school record by over five feet.

Upon returning from Virginia, UMass will have one week to prepare for their next tournament. On Friday, May 12 and Saturday, May 13, the Minutewomen will once again take part in the New England Championships in Dedham, Mass.

Road no problem for men's track

By Jen Cormier
Collegian Staff

Believe it or not, being a road warrior has its perks. Sure, hitting the road for away games can be exhausting. Playing on unfamiliar turf in front of a sea of unfriendly faces can be intimidating. Living out of a suitcase every weekend can be annoying.

But sometimes, racking up frequent flyer miles can be a team's secret weapon.

Just ask the members of the Massachusetts men's outdoor track team. Due to UMass' lack of a decent track facility, the squad is forced to spend its entire season on the road. Home field advantage? The Minutemen know no such luxury. Supportive fans? Not quite. The Minutemen are accustomed to competing before hostile crowds.

And therein lies the beauty, says head coach Ken O'Brien.

This weekend, the Minutemen head to Blacksburg, Va. where reigning champion Virginia Tech plays host to this year's Atlantic 10 Championship. The Hokies boast the best track facility in the conference, raucous fans, and a squad that is dominant in nearly every event— all of which can make for a daunting atmosphere to the visiting teams. Unless, that is, the team is as adapted to competing on the road as it is to breathing.

Advantage, Minutemen.

"We're at the point where we're used to being on the road, whether it's an invitational meet, a dual meet, or a championship meet," O'Brien said. "If there's any team that's equipped not to be intimidated by home court advantage, it's us."

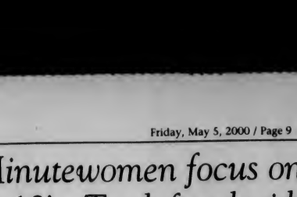
Since Virginia Tech is the undisputed favorite to recapture the title, the real dogfight will be for runner-up status. Massachusetts nabbed second place last year, but the squad will expect heavy competition from Rhode Island, St. Joe's, and LaSalle.

"We did have a senior-laden team last year, so I don't anticipate that we'll be finishing second this year," O'Brien noted. "There will probably be a battle between Rhode Island and ourselves for second and third. They have the edge, but hopefully we'll have an inspired performance and overcome that."

For O'Brien, the week leading up to the A-10 meet has been a hectic one, as the coaching staff attempts to fine-tune the roster, which must meet specific conference requirements.

Fresh off his second place finish in the discus at the Penn Relays last weekend (183'9", a UMass record), senior thrower Vic Morency will lead the charge at the A-10 meet, competing in three throwing events. Morency, who set conference records in both the javelin and discus at last year's championship, will also perform in the shot put.

Meanwhile, sophomore Mike Howell will be back in action for the first time since he pulled his hamstring early in the spring season. The mid-distance runner will compete in the 400-meter and the 4 x 400 relay. Strong performances will also be expected from senior Ben Baraldi in hurdles and sophomore Kevin Curtin in distance.



Although the squad is young, the many of the rookies have the experience of the A-10 indoor meet to guide them this weekend. During the indoor championship, the Minutemen finished second, their best performance in school history.

It's one last Garber goodbye for lax seniors

Bear clash looms in lacrosse finale

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

At 6-7 and well out of the postseason race, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has known for a while now that its season would close tomorrow afternoon.

However, much more lies in this weekend's tangle with Brown. While pride within the region burns with every battle, a sense of improvement, of moving in the right direction laces their season finale.

After having beaten Vermont, Harvard and Boston College, the Minutemen (2-4 ECAC) go for the clean sweep of New England when they take on the Bears (4-6, 3-3 Ivy League) at Garber Field. A victory would not only even up UMass' record, but would send seven seniors out on the right foot. Leaving the fold for head coach Greg Cannella are midfielders J.T. Benazzi, Evan Page, Tim Socha and Mike Young, defender John Hutchen, attackman Mike Janowicz and goaltender Rob Murray.

"We have a good core of players coming back next year, but we're certainly going to miss those seniors," Cannella said. "They really brought a lot of heart and soul to the team."

The Bears have made giant steps since going 3-9 last season. A lineup that was comprised of mostly underclassmen in the past couple years has aged, and the experience has paid off in the win column. A trio of junior attackmen are the ringleaders for Brown's resurrection, led by Michael Monfett, who leads the team in assists (22) and is second in goals (17). That honor goes to Jimmy Murmile and his 22 connections.

"They're a very good team," Cannella said. "We're going to need to be ready. Our guys need to understand that there is a sense of urgency.

"They've had some young guys in the program that have grown older," he added. "The experience that their juniors now have has made them a lot better, and they've committed themselves to getting better."

It is these players that visited Amherst two years ago, dashing the Minutemen's playoff hopes with a 14-6 drubbing in front of a packed Garber Field crowd. With the first and second rounds being held in the Pioneer Valley, UMass was almost assured a spot among the NCAA's pool of 12, but the Bears took the Minutemen out early.

Last season's contest was cancelled due to the death of UMass midfielder Eric Sopracasa. In Thursday's practice prior to the finale with Brown, the junior collapsed last season after taking a ball in the chest. After being revived briefly, he was rushed to Cooley Dickinson Hospital where he was later pronounced dead.

"I'd like to win it for Eric," Cannella said following the Minutemen's 16-11 victory over Rutgers Tuesday. "I think Thursday and Friday will probably be tougher but I hope on Saturday, they'll use his fight, his attitude to inspire them."

WEEKEND PREVIEW

What has really vaulted Brown into the upper tier of the loaded Ivy League is increased pressure on defense. In 14 games, opponents have been held to single digits nine times, including Duke, whom the Bears upset in mid-March, 10-9.

Brown has played a vicious non-conference schedule. In addition to facing Princeton, Cornell and Harvard in the regular season, the Bears have stared down Loyola, Syracuse and the aforementioned Blue Devil squad this season.

The Rhode Islanders, though, did catch heat in Wednesday's 12-10 victory over the abysmal Stags of Fairfield. Monfett's two-goal, two-assist second half carried the Bears after the Stags took a 7-6 lead going into the half. Michael Hughes tied Monfett as the game's point leader, capturing four points on a goal and three assists.

UMass counters with an upstart attack of its own. Save the Syracuse loss, the Maroon and White have flourished on the offensive end in the second half of the season. Junior Alex Racioppi and freshman Kevin Leveille have taken away some of the scoring duties from Rich Kunkel and John Madigan, with Racioppi scoring 16 goals in the last five games, over three goals on average per time out. Kunkel has been steady all season long, putting up five in the Minutemen's victory over Rutgers.

Game time is set for 1 p.m.

Hokies strut into Amherst; UMass looks for revenge

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Denise Brey and the women's lax squad is looking for an all attack and win performance today when they battle Virginia Tech in the first round of the Atlantic-10 tournament.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

At the end of the 1999 season, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team had no choice but to stand on the field at Geasey Field on the campus of Temple University in awe of what had just transpired. In the first round of the inaugural Atlantic 10 tournament, the Minutewomen lost a heartbreaking 12-11 contest against Virginia Tech, which they had beaten 8-7 earlier in the year.

As the No. 2 seed in the conference tournament, a first round exit was frustrating. All that UMass (now 8-7 overall, 4-1 A-10) could ask for was another chance...

With the 2000 season winding down, the Maroon and White have that chance. Once again, the Minutewomen are the No. 2 seed in this weekend's A-10 tournament. Once again, the Minutewomen will be pitted against Virginia Tech (9-7, 4-1), at 2:30 p.m.

There are a couple of key differences this time, though. This time, the season's earlier battle went to the Hokies – again, by a close score – 8-6. This time, the tournament is at Totman Field.

"[Playing on our] home field is great," UMass coach Phil Barnes said. "We're in our locker room, on our home field, we don't have to travel anywhere, and the players get to spend the night in their own beds. It's terrific."

As has been the case on many occasions in the past two seasons, the game will come down to which cracks first: the Massachusetts defense or the opposing offense.

Anchored by the A-10's top-ranked goaltender, junior Jen Nardi, and UMass co-captain and three-time Regional All-American Lynne Young, the Minutewomen currently place third in the nation in scoring defense, allowing only 6.92 goals a game. Rounding out the unit is a foursome of potential All-Conference defenders, in Denise Brey, Jessica Passanese, Melissa Miele and Colleen Wales.

The Hokies, on the other hand, pride themselves in their scoring prowess. Senior Dawn Will leads the charge with 61 goals and 13 assists – a stat line that dwarfs nearly the rest of the A-10. Courtney Hubbard ranks seventh in the conference with 29 goals and 12 assists. The Minutewomen, as a team, didn't reach Will's current output of 74 points until game No. 8, when UMass exploded for 19 points against St. Bonaventure.

In this contest, the first few minutes might determine the outcome.

"This time around we need to come out strong in the beginning," Barnes said. "We came out slow in the first Virginia Tech game, and then we played a great 45 minutes."

If UMass plays a full 60 minutes of tough lacrosse and comes out on top in round one, they will face the winner of the Temple-Duquesne matchup, which will take place tomorrow at 1 p.m.

The Owls enter the tourney as the No. 1 seed, sporting a 4-1 record like Massachusetts and Virginia Tech, but winning a draw by A-10 commissioner Linda Bruno. Temple's only conference loss this year came at the hands of UMass, losing 5-3 to the Minutewomen for their first league

Softball swipes two from Brown

While sweep is nice, Sortino sees it differently

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

They may have made winning look easy, but their coached found plenty of complicated things that seemed to typify the afternoon.

It was almost a side note that the Massachusetts softball team cruised to a pair of wins in its double-header against visiting Brown (14-28) yesterday. As lopsided as the two scores were, 6-1 and 9-1, the Minutewomen (30-20, 11-3 Atlantic 10) had reasons for ambivalence about their performance. steal

Brown	1

And coach Elaine Sortino, always one to nip complacency in the bud, didn't hesitate to share her thoughts about UMass' overall effort. Perhaps concerned that it might be looking ahead to tomorrow's A-10 showdown with Rhode Island, when the regular-season conference title will be on the line, Sortino let it be known that her squad's focus was not championship-caliber.

"I thought that we were up and we were down today," she said. "It's not how I would pick to be at this point in the season. I also think that our focus has been awful this week."

Part of the reason Sortino hesitated to celebrate was that her Minutewomen did most of their offensive damage in large, single doses. Such was the case in game one. UMass scored two runs in the first and its other four in the fourth, but did not consistently hit in the other innings.

Freshman Kaila Holtz drove in the team's first run with a triple, plating first baseman Brandi Cross. The next batter, sophomore third baseman Scooter Wheeler, drove in Holtz with a base hit, extending the lead to 2-0.

Sophomore center fielder Teri Rooney erased any small Bear hopes of a comeback in the fourth inning. Her bases-loaded triple into the right-center field gap widened the Minutewoman lead to 5-0. The next batter, Cross, plated the final UMass game-one run with the help of a Brown error.

In addition to her savvy at the plate, Holtz showed poise on the mound, earning the complete-game victory and allowing only one earned run. While Holtz is well known for her arm and her team highs in strikeouts (130) and wins (14), Sortino was quick to point out that the Vancouver, B.C. native can be just as talented with the bat.

"She's a good hitter, she really is. She always gives us a good at bat," Sortino said of Holtz, who is second on the team with a .344 batting average.

The pitcher of decision in the second game was sophomore co-captain Jen Hadley. Now UMass' hottest hurler, Hadley has allowed only two runs in her last three outings – all complete-game victories over Dayton, Boston College, and yesterday, Brown. With the win, Hadley improved her record to 9-6, and helped chisel her earned run average down to just above two runs per game.

UMass	9
Brown	1

While Sortino was displeased with the smaller inconsistencies during the double-header, she was thrilled with two particular individual feats. The first of which was accomplished by Cross, who, as only a freshman, tied the UMass' single-season home run record. In the sixth inning of game two, Cross belted her eighth long ball of the year.

The other high point was also a homer, although this round-tripper came totally out of the blue. Playing with a broken index finger on her right hand, senior catcher Nikki Faessler somehow mustered enough strength to hit her first home run of the season.

In some situations, Faessler would likely have not played through such an injury. But as UMass approaches its final stretch of the year, Sortino needs her co-captain behind the plate... especially because she has no back up at the position.

"She hasn't had too many days of good health,

Frosh homers again; ties record

By Aaron Saykin

Uncanny is one thing. What Brandi Cross did yesterday is absolutely unheard of.

Only a freshman, Cross, the starting first baseman for the Massachusetts softball team, tied the school's single-season home-run record of eight with a solo shot during her team's 9-1 win over visiting Brown in game two of a double-header.

Her eight long balls constitute nearly 45 percent of the UMass home runs this season.

And with three games left in the regular season, Cross stands a strong chance of breaking the record which had been exclusively owned by former UMass outfielder and catcher Sherri Kuchinskas, who hit eight in 1993.

"It's nice. It's really been a good season," Cross said. "It's something I'll be proud of a lot later. You don't really think about breaking records or anything like that coming into school as a freshman."

With the bases empty in the bottom of the sixth inning, Cross, a left-handed hitter, stepped to the plate and walloped a mid-high, outside fast-ball over the left field fence. Instead of clearing the second park fence, the ball was caught by the protective scoreboard net.

It didn't help. Cross' blast stretched the net far enough for the ball to make contact with the bottom of the board, bouncing back off as her coaches teammates, and fans erupted into applause.

"It wasn't that bad of a pitch. I

Spring Concert brings sunshine indoors

Rap tandem headlines Mullins show

By Jason Trenkis
Collegian Staff

Method Man/Redman and Long Beach Dub All-Stars headlined the University of Massachusetts Spring Concert 2000 last night at the Mullins Center, capping off one of the busiest weekends of the year.

Security was high as students were confronted by metal detectors and were frisked at the entrance by Mullins Center employees. There were numerous police officers standing at all corners of the concert floor, but no large disturbances occurred.

According to UMass Police Chief John Luippold, this weekend has been known to be one of the busiest weekends of the year with the Spring Concert being preceded by Southwest Week in Southwest residential area and Bowl Day in Orchard Hill residential area.

The Spring Concert 2000 featured artists Biz Markie, Percy Hill, Bruce Bass, Beenie Man, Antigone Rising, Long Beach Dub All-Stars, Fuzzbubble, Killah Priest and Redman/Method Man.

Some students expressed their disappointment in having to attend the Spring Concert indoors for the second straight year. Sophomore management major Zev Garell said he felt that having the concert indoors did not help the turnout.

"I don't think it's that big of a turnout considering the size of the school and they would have had a better turnout if it had been outside," Garell said.

Other students such as sophomore management major Nick Andrews felt the music wasn't well-rounded and that most of the bands this year were rap and didn't reflect the broader interests of the UMass population.

"Last year's [concert] was more well rounded," Andrews said. "Everybody likes Cypress Hill whether they like rock or hip-hop because they [Cypress Hill] are from this area and enjoy doing Massachusetts shows and I think everybody realized that."

According to him, the lack of diversity in music genre was displayed when D.J. Biz Markie failed to mention the Long Beach Dub All-Stars as performing that evening.

"I think it's not cool that Biz Markie is snubbing the Long Beach Dub All-Stars," Andrews said. "He should mention all the bands and just because it's not his style of music, he holds some grudges and biases."

The concert was funded by the Student Government Association and was produced by University Productions and Concerts (UPC). Sponsors of the event included swapit.com, boldbrain.com, Lycos, Buzzstream and Mullins Center Production.

Promotions Manager of UPC Amanda Paolella, a junior communications and marketing major, said it was a very successful event but stated that she couldn't compare it to previous years as this was her first year in helping to organize it.

According to her, she said so much work and effort has gone into the production and promotions for the concert.

"It's really rewarding when you look out at the crowd and everyone's dancing and having a good time," Paolella said. "People say all these negative things about it, but when you think about it, we hit on every genre. The only reason people say it's too much hip-hop is that they expect us to get Dave Matthews or Limp Bizkit, but these acts cost $300,000 dollars and we only have $120,000 for talent."

According to Paolella, she said most people didn't realize that Long Beach Dub All-Stars, an alternative rock group, is similar to the group Sublime without their lead singer, who died of a heroin overdose. She said that it may have contributed to a lower attendance turnout but a contract between UPC and the band prohibited them from advertising the group in such a way.

Sophomore psychology major Stephanie Mastropietro said UPC produced a successful concert, but stated that most students don't give them the credit they deserve.

"The whole production is put on by them [UPC] and they don't get much representation," Mastropietro said. "They have work to do at school plus a job in which they don't get paid at UPC that is completely voluntary because they want to better UMass activities."

She said there is a belief among students that UPC has not been able to bring large name bands to the Mullins Center, as they once were able to do in the past when they had larger budgets.

SGA Secretary of Finance Jeff Bazydlo said the funding for Spring Concert primarily comes from the SGA Spring Concert fund which consists of mandatory student fees. He said in the past, UPC has had difficulty bringing prominent bands to campus because they cost too much and thus the burden of funding was turned over to the SGA.

"Next year's budget, which will take effect July 1, will see another increase for the Spring Concert fund," Bazydlo said. "It's an increase, but it's not even a third of what you pay for some bands and it's a large number, but it's not huge in the scheme of the entire concert."

Assistant Attorney General Sofia Cozzolino, a freshman political science major, said despite the funding difficulties, this year's concert has been the most successful.

"I think it's really cool that it's free and there is such a school spirit because it's an event that everyone comes to and looks forward to attending," Cozzolino said.

Earthquake could cause Tahoe tidal

By Usha Lee McFarling
Los Angeles Times

SAN DIEGO - A group of geologists is predicting an unlikely scenario for the normally placid waters of Lake Tahoe. It's possible, they say, that an earthquake could generate 30-foot-high tsunami waves and inundate many areas near the shore.

The study, presented last month at an annual meeting of seismologists, is based on a new analysis of two faults that lie directly beneath the lake. They are now thought capable of generating earthquakes as large as the 7.1-magnitude quake that hit Turkey last November.

The faults were long inaccessible to geologists because they are under more than 1,000 feet of water, but were accurately mapped recently with sonar.

Computer modeling by a group at the University of Nevada at Reno that is working with a Japanese tsunami expert showed ruptures along either fault could lift or drop the bottom of the lake and possibly generate a tsunami. The tsunami in turn could trigger seiche waves - massive sloshing that could crisscross the lake, persist for hours and reach heights of 30 feet or more.

"It was surprising to me the wave heights were that high," said Gene Ichinose, a graduate student in geophysics at the University of Nevada and lead author of the study. Although tsunamis are normally associated with oceans, Tahoe is the 10th-deepest lake in the world, more than 1,500 feet in places, so it contains enough water to generate large and dangerous waves.

While the study is causing some to give new thought to the hazards earthquakes pose to inland bodies of water, it should be no cause for panic, experts

'Love' virus hits college campuses

By Jennie Korb
Daily Illini (U. Illinois)

(U-WIRE) CHAMPAIGN, Ill. – A new e-mail virus dubbed the "love bug," which can rename or damage computer files, was discovered early Thursday. It has already affected almost 1.2 million files worldwide and found its way onto several campuses, including the University of Illinois.

Allison Deitch, a freshman in FAA and a Daily Illini employee, said at about 9 a.m. Thursday she opened an e-mail containing the virus because she recognized the sender as someone who normally sends her similar-looking e-mails such as Yahoo greeting cards, forwards and attachments.

Deitch uses Microsoft Outlook, so the virus was able to immediately get into some of her files. Virus icons were substituted for her JPEGs, or picture files, and her default homepage was changed from Yahoo to a random string of letters, she said.

Microsoft Outlook and Outlook Express are part of the Microsoft Office package, and the embedded script the virus utilizes in order to work is contained in newer versions of Internet Explorer, such as Internet Explorer 4 and 5. The script is not normally present on Windows systems unless Internet Explorer is used, according to www.drsolomon.com/vbslove.htm, a Web page the University provided a link to Thursday for more information.

The subject line of the e-mail containing the virus says "ILOVEYOU," and the text tells the user to "kindly check the attached loveletter coming from me," according to www.drsolomon.com.

The e-mail contains a virus that was created using a programming language called VisualBasic, and when the e-mail is opened on a computer using one of the compatible e-mail programs, it automatically "unloads itself onto the computer," Kramer said.

Because Telnet does not use Microsoft's scripting system, opening the "love bug" e-mail in Telnet does not permit the virus to execute its function.

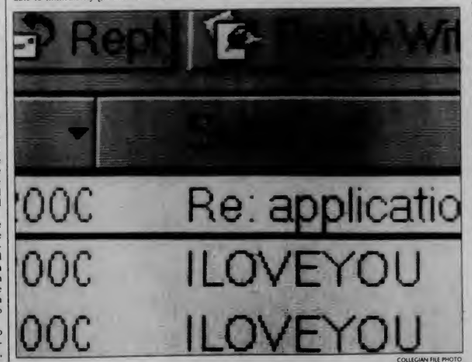
Deitch followed the recommendation of a consultant and updated the virus definitions for her anti-virus software, which allowed it to detect and eliminate the virus.

"When you hear news like this, the first thing you should do is update your definitions," Kramer said. "Virus protectant software is basically useless unless you update it all the time, like every couple of weeks."

Adriane Musselman, freshman in ACES, said that she received the e-mail containing the virus Thursday morning, but because she uses Telnet as her e-mail program, the virus was not able to infect the computer. Almost immediately after she opened that e-mail, she received another telling her not to open any e-mails with "ILOVEYOU" as the subject heading.

Musselman is an employee at the Institute of Government and Public Affairs, and she said that when the president of GPA opened the e-mail this morning, it caused problems immediately.

"It shut down a whole bunch of stuff on the hard drive," Musselman said. She said it also affected the graphics on their homepage. The virus is similar to the Melissa virus in that they both use advanced features of new mail systems, such as Microsoft Outlook, to implant their codes into files, said Paul Kramer, CCSO Resource Center consultant and junior in engineering.



The virus has been classified as high-risk and spreads quickly. In addition to the effect it can have on the user's computer, it uses Outlook to send copies of itself to everyone in the user's address book. Because many users recognize the sender as someone they know, it is not immediately apparent that it is a virus.

If a user deletes the e-mail without viewing it, no harm is done, according to the CNN Web page.

Symantec, which makes Norton Anti-Virus, and F-secure, two anti-virus companies, have already posted virus definition files for the ILOVEYOU virus, according to the CNN Web page.

Because CCSO site computers do not run Outlook, Outlook Express or Internet Explorer, they have not experienced difficulties resulting from the virus.

"We haven't had any problems," said Sean Riley, a CCSO site consultant and sophomore in LAS.

Findings show crime drops to eight year low

By Eric Lichtblau
Los Angeles Times

WASHINGTON - Crime in the United States dropped for a record eighth straight year in 1999, with murders, assaults, robberies and other serious offenses falling 7 percent in what could prove to be the steepest decline in two decades, according to preliminary FBI figures released Sunday.

Never before has the FBI, which began compiling criminal data in the 1930s, reported a drop in crime for eight successive years, said Mary Victoria Pyne, a spokeswoman for the bureau's Uniform Crime Reporting Unit.

"This is more good news for everyone," she said. "Whatever people are doing, it's working."

While explanations of the historic drop-off vary widely, most criminology experts agree that a booming economy is the driving force because it has meant jobs and income for people who might otherwise be out on the streets and in trouble.

"Low unemployment has to be considered the major factor," said Joseph McNamara, a former police chief in San Jose, Calif., who is now a research fellow in law enforcement at Stanford University's Hoover Institution.

Experts point to a variety of other factors that might also help explain the safer streets, including more funding for local officers, greater emphasis on community-oriented policing, increased resources for drug treatment programs and youth intervention, more prison beds, and tougher sentencing laws.

But McNamara noted that there is widespread disagreement over what direct effect such programs have on crime. The decline in crime, he said, has swept all parts of the country, "regardless of what police are doing in one city versus another."

Computer models predict that fault lines under Lake Tahoe could cause tsunami waves.

■ Tahoe

said.

"If you have a lake-shore house, you shouldn't sell it," said David Schwartz, chief of the U.S. Geological Survey's San Francisco Bay Area Earthquake Hazards Project. The study's authors estimate the risk of a magnitude 7 quake under Lake Tahoe in the next 50 years to be between 5 percent and 4 percent, far less than perennial dangers from forest fires and floods in the region.

Nevertheless, the study points out that the area may now face an additional hazard. "At this point, what we have in Lake Tahoe is a distinctly valid hypothesis, and it's worrisome," said Craig dePolo, a geologist with the Nevada Bureau of Mines and Geology who was not involved in the study but is an expert on Lake Tahoe's geology.

"For now, people can treat it as an interesting story, but they should keep in mind if they feel a large earthquake in Lake Tahoe, they should first duck and cover and then sprint 30 feet in elevation."

The closest analogy comes from a magnitude 7.5 earthquake that hit Hebgen Lake in Yellowstone National Park on Aug. 17, 1959.

Witnesses saw "a tsunami and waves that sloshed back and forth for hours that were five or six feet in height," said Bob Smith, a professor of geophysics at the University of Utah who was a college student at the time of the quake. "It must have been quite a sight."

The waves threatened but did not take out Hebgen Dam. Most damage at Hebgen Lake and nine deaths were attributed to an 85-million-ton landslide that poured onto a campground and into a river. The landslide itself triggered 30-foot waves, Smith said.

Another area Smith studies, the Great Salt Lake, could also be affected by earthquakes on the nearby Wasatch fault. Tsunamis and seiche waves are not a concern because the lake is relatively shallow, but flooding of sections of Salt Lake City caused by sinking of the lake bed after an earthquake remains a worry.

Fears of tsunamis and seiche waves at Lake Tahoe have been quietly raised before, because of worries that the waves could overtop and wash out Lake Tahoe Dam in Tahoe City. A U.S. Bureau of Reclamation study in the late 1980s predicted earthquake-generated waves of about 10 feet and led to improvements at the dam.

The new study is more precise because it uses a detailed USGS sonar map of the lake's bottom created in 1998. That map shows that faults under Lake Tahoe have moved considerably in the past and therefore are capable of generating earthquakes of at least magnitude 7.

The map also showed evidence of a massive landslide that tumbled from the Homewood area across the lake on the Nevada side. "That would have been one heck of an event," said John G. Anderson, who heads the University of Nevada's seismology lab and was a coauthor of the paper, which was published last month in the journal Geophysical Research Letters.

Remains of that landslide and faults that crisscross the lake show a region rife with geological activity. One of Tahoe's faults is the fastest-moving in the entire Basin and Range region, which includes Nevada and parts of Utah and California, Ichinose said.

Genetic model nearly complete

By Paul Jacobs and Peter G. Gosselin
Los Angeles Times

Over the next several days, a 2-year-old biotechnology company, Celera Genomics, is expected to announce that it has completed a version of the human genetic code. That will be followed in June by a similar announcement from the public Human Genome Project.

The mapping of the human genome is one of the most significant and widely trumpeted achievements in modern science. The research it enables promises new treatments for disease, new drugs to promote healthy growth and delay aging, and new ways to detect disorders early while there is still time to do something about them.

The expected announcement by Celera will be a defining moment in the bruising, often bitter competition between the biotech company and the international collaboration of academic researchers - a race that remained remarkably close going into the final straightaway.

Yet many of the participants on the public side say that it isn't the time to shoot off fireworks in celebration. This is a meaningful milestone that has come much faster than expected, they say, but the work is far from done.

And there are good reasons to question whether the race to complete the human genome is indeed over. The "finish line" in the race is arbitrary and has been drawn and then redrawn by the participants themselves. Originally, both Celera and the international academic centers making up the Human Genome Project had established exacting standards for completion: determining the order - or sequence - of 99.9 percent or more of the chemical building blocks in the human genetic code. But the sequences to be announced this spring are unlikely to be quite that complete; and the public effort's "working draft" will have as little as 90 percent of the sequence.

A "working draft" of the human genome is, by definition, not a finished product but a work in progress. Both the public draft and the Celera genome will contain many gaps in the listing of the estimated 3 billion chemical building blocks in the DNA molecules that make up the human genetic code. Such incomplete efforts are indeed useful but also frustrating, like a map that includes most main roads and bridges but leaves out some local streets.

-Even in a "finished" version of the genome, which the public project hopes to complete by 2003, there will be vast uncharted regions of human genetic code. That's because there are sizable stretches of DNA within the 23 pairs of human chromosomes that are simply too difficult to decipher with current technology. At a meeting in England last fall, scientists from the Human Genome Project recognized that and agreed on a definition of "essentially finished," knowing that large tracts of terra incognita would remain in each chromosome.

-For a time at least, Celera's map is certain to be more complete than the public one, even though the company's scientists did far less decoding than they promised when they formed their company in 1998. That's because Celera will be able to incorporate the public data into its own. Over the next two years, the gap will gradually close as the Human Genome Project continues its decoding efforts.

Our Opinion
Difficult Choices

More than a week ago, The Boston Globe ran an article about David Stewart, a twelve-year-old boy who had just died from leukemia. His death was noted in the Globe because while alive, he attempted to obtain experimental treatment for leukemia without adequate health insurance. Massachusetts Medicaid refused the $93,000 experimental treatment on the grounds that the treatment would most likely be unsuccessful. His situation sparked a debate about funding treatment for seriously ill, uninsured children.

The culmination of the debate over funding is The David Stewart bill, which would set aside $2.5 million of existing money to help uninsured children pay for the costs of health care. This is a step forward in dissolving some of the health care inequities that result from the collision of medical technology, human rights and tight government budgets that defines America's health care dilemmas today.

However, David's case, like many other cases that have received national attention, brings to light serious moral issues that question some of our basic assumptions. Often the media emphasizes cases such as David's, but in doing so, does society a disservice. Who wants to say that a child should be denied a potentially life-saving treatment because he is poor? Yet consider the fact that $93,000 is involved. This money could perhaps be used to help ten children with serious illnesses, ten children who will not be mentioned in any news story because their conditions are less severe or less controversial. Society never sees the group of people who may benefit from a certain amount of money; society only sees the one individual child whose story is so heart-wrenching that it makes the evening news. Who can look at a child's face on T.V. and deny them the right to live?

David's case does highlight the issue of inequity in our health care system, and most people agree that there are problems in any society where being poor limits access to decent health care. Our country provides the greatest medical care in the world for those who are rich enough to afford the staggering costs. If health is assumed to be a right that all human beings have, then there is something seriously wrong with a system that would deny some citizens the right to a basic level of health.

But given the staggering costs of many treatments today, it is apparent that society cannot devote all of its resources to providing the same extremely high and extremely costly care for all citizens who need it. Choices must be made between people. What makes the choices so difficult is that we believe that each person is of infinite value, and in this country we claim that people are equal. How can we decide between two equal people of infinite value? Denying anyone the right to live based on cost seems a callous by-product of our overly technology-driven, capitalist society. Denying children the right to live touches on our unspoken assumptions that children have a greater claim to life than someone who is older and has fewer potential years to live, based on the average years of life expectancy for people living in the U.S.

Yet with these factors in mind, it is important to consider that if choices must be made, they must be made with society in mind as well as the individual. Physicians still cling to the idea that the individual should assume a greater importance than society when a treatment decision is being made, yet this attitude cannot work all the time given the realities of today's government budgets and soaring health care costs.

The original decision to deny David the experimental treatment was based on sound medical-rationing judgment. However, due to publicity, a fundraising campaign came up with the money to send David to Seattle to receive treatment. Unfortunately, the treatment was not able to cure him, and he died. It is important to remember that had he lived, the same considerations would still necessitate a discussion of health care resource allocation. We cannot provide everything to everyone all the time. Improving health care in the U.S. requires that we as a society sometimes place concerns for the many over concerns for the one.

The media cannot give a face to the many. Instead, it may provide a line graph showing how the health of one group can improve, but people do not connect with the line graph. They connect to the emotional tales of individuals in need. In this sense, the media does Americans a disservice by misrepresenting the serious medical issues facing society today.

Retrospective shout out

I resisted the urge to do an end-of-the-year "retrospective/shout out" column last spring, but this time I find myself reluctant to do anything but such a column. So here goes.

I've had a pretty good academic year, I'd say. I want to point out History 314 with Prof Johnston last semester and History 400 with Prof Laurie this semester as the best classes I've taken so far. I'm going to add a double major in history sometime soon pretty much because of these two classes. It'll be fun.

For bad classes, I'd have to say anything I've ever taken (this year and last) in the one hundred range. Pretty crappy, these classes were, and I wish I'd never taken them.

I also worked two jobs this year. It was pretty stressful at times, but both jobs were worth it. One was getting hired here, at The Collegian, to work on this very Ed/Op page. It was fun to have a say in what you read, and there are some cool people down here in the basement; if you're ever in the neighborhood come by and say hello. We've got a couple of mini-basketball hoops on various doors.

I also had the privilege of working at the Worcester Dining Commons, up near Northeast. That job was very different than the newspaper job: it was real work, with actual customers and using your hands to physically do things. An average kind of work, from the mere labor standpoint, but with such stellar people working there that it became a great job that I am proud to have.

I got a bunch of people angry at me while writing this column week in and week out. I might have felt a slight bit of remorse had anyone ever said anything to my face, but, alas, that never happened. I mean, really; my picture and name are right next to every column I write, and I'm on campus quite a bit. If anyone out there who had a problem with me wanted to say something to me about it, there was every opportunity. No one did, however, which can only lead me to believe that all the people who are so fond of anonymous phone calls and irate letters are pretty much total cowards. But hey – there's still some time left before my last final if anyone wants to come exchange some words or punches with me. I'll be around.

Rob Schulze

I gave up drinking. I find that I like myself much more.

My goal for the summer? I bought a copy of Being and Nothingness at the Raven a couple days ago, and I not only want to read it, but understand it. Probably won't happen, but hey; I'll be a better man for trying. I'd also like to get in better shape, not get a massive sunburn for the umpteenth time (I'm white as the lights and the sun is not my friend), and watch a couple of Sox games while sitting on the couch in only my boxers sipping iced tea.

I'm moving to Southwest next year. I'll miss you, Orchard Hill.

Speaking of which, I'd like to give some love to my roommate Mike. We've been friends for eternity and lived together for two years now, and it was a good time all around. We took turns mopping up vomit and he even fed my fish while I was gone. We're splitting up now, but hey: see you around, bro.

Also my smiles go out to those who're leaving us here at the University to hit the real world. Jenny, you're great and all I have to say about that is WHAAASSSAAAAPPP!!! Scola, some day it will actually be 0000 versa immm, and then we'll see what's up. Alexis and Gary, thanks so much for giving me the chance and teaching me how to do it; I'll try not to let you down. Ledo: you'll figure it out – I have faith in you. I, personally, never want to graduate, and to those brave souls about to do so: I salute you.

I'd like to thank Skybox for booking Gangsta Bitch Barbie. Man, that rocked.

Okay, I'm going to stop now because I don't feel like dealing with the fifth-grade "Why wasn't I on your list?" crap. Do you want to know the truth? You aren't in my column today because I hate you. So there.

Ha – I had you fooled. I couldn't leave out the most important person of all. She may have been far away, but she still had more impact on me than anyone else who was constantly at my fingertips. She's mentioned more than once that, despite the numerous times she appeared in my column, she was always "my girlfriend" and never a name. So this one's for you, Desiree: I've missed you so much and you deserve the #1 spot on this list. You're the best.

Okay, really, that's it. If you're in Plymouth over the summer come by the K-Mart Garden Shop and say hello; I'll be glad of the company. Otherwise, I guess I'll see you next year.

Oh, and to the person who put the "FLUSH TOILET" sign in every stall in my bathroom: up yours. I'm not a child.

This past year I learned...

Well it's official. I know everything. That's the typical mindset of a normal college student. If I do know everything, it's because I've had a miraculous third year of college. As a matter of fact, everything I know about life, I learned in my junior year at UMass.

As A&L Editor, I have the most surreal job in the entire world - "There are truth and there are lies, and art always tells the truth; even when it's lying." John Malkovich

Never assume anything – One time this year, I assumed that college students could flush a toilet. I became a resident assistant, and learned that I was very, very wrong. I also assumed that being an RA was going to be a difficult experience. Wrong again. 7D, you rule!

Women don't want nice guys – Yeah, so this is the point of my column where I whine and moan about how the ladies won't touch me with a ten-foot pole. I've come to the decision that women don't want nice guys, such as myself, because they need someone to talk to when the jerks treat them like crap. Therefore, women are never attracted to a nice guy who won't treat them like garbage. Maybe it's because our congeniality comes off as friendly and not as desirable. Whatever, Scotty N. knows what's up.

If you're funny, people will listen to you – People will always listen to you and complement you on your sense of humor. I still get props for my explanation of my trip to Hooters last December. Not to mention the amount of feedback that I received about my criticism of "The Knife Show." I have been most proud of the columns that people seem to like. It is very difficult for me to sit down and write something that I hope will upset people. Therefore, I've spent most of my time attempting to make you laugh. I hope I was successful. If I wasn't, then get your ass down here and prove me wrong by writing something yourself!

Ryan Benharris

Listen to what the person who cuts your hair has to say – I had my haircut earlier this year, and the woman cutting it said: "Hold on, I'm just going to shave your eyebrow." Yes, "eyebrow," not plural. There's something very sad about a person of the opposite sex pretty much telling you that you're a unibrowed freak. Not to mention how scary it is to have someone coming at your face with an electric razor.

Always be open to new experiences – The absolute best thing that I did this semester was attend a play at the St. Bridges Church starring people with special needs. Sacrificing a Friday night is definitely worth a feeling of accomplishment. I felt pleasant about myself, and truly think that I did something good.

It's not whether you win or lose - My intramural record this year was something like 1-15. Though I did win one football game, my depressive record includes the four other football games I lost, the five basketball games, at least one tennis tournament match, and a volleyball game to a sorority.

All I want to do is Dance, Dance, Dance – Yeah right! If you had the misfortune of ever watching me attempt to dance at anytime, I sincerely apologize. I hope that you didn't spend too much time crying for me, and my obviously pathetic desire to look like I know what I'm doing.

The best place to learn anything is outside the Student Union – I suggest you go outside and listen to the guy with the beard for a while. You won't understand a word he's saying, but it's funny as hell. He yells things like "When I was an undergrad at Harvard, I understood the art of Masturbation. But now, they make $50,000 cars to corrupt your mind."

If you work for a newspaper, people think you automatically know certain things – Okay, despite whatever you think about me, I do not know the answer to 32 down on the crossword puzzle. If you demand that I tell you what the phone number is for the Boston Globe, I can't help you. If I answer the Arts & Living phone by saying, "Arts," I'm probably not going to be able to tell you if we sent a writer to the Women's Lacrosse game, or even what time it starts for that matter. So stop yelling at me!

Being number one is not all it's cracked up to be – The rumor is that I'm number one. Number one in what you ask? Well I'm certainly not the number one intramural sports champion. I'm not the number one filmmaker on the planet, and I'm not the number one thoroughbred at the Kentucky Derby. However, I am number one. Just read the tabloids.

College is a wealth of wonderful things – Of the three years I've been here, I have never actually dreaded the day that I graduate. I've come to the realization that I'm 75 percent of the way done with college. I'm having way too much fun for it to come to an end. I can't wait until next year!

Don't ever travel into someone's head - "That portal is mine, and it must be sealed; for the love of God!" – John Malkovich

Your Opinion
Diversity and difference

On Wednesday, May 3rd, the phrase "Want to end discrimination? End difference!" appeared in the Collegian's Monkey Box. As a woman of color, this statement means that my difference is not a contribution to society but a problem. This statement means we should eliminate difference so we can all get along in this world. This statement discourages all people from proclaiming their individuality. I don't think many people understand how strongly words influence every person's perspective on life. I am labeled as a minority, a person of color, someone who brings difference and diversity to society. This statement makes me feel as though all people who are different should try to be more alike, more normal.

What is normal? What we consider normal is influenced by what we see every day in fashion, T.V., the news and the media in general. When you live in the "normal" it is easier to say that we should end difference because whoever is normal is not eliminated. But difference and diversity are easy to ignore when you are submerged in a society where you are considered normal, not different. This is the University of Massachusetts where difference is supposedly welcomed. We see what has been going on with affirmative action and how "concerned" this university is about bringing people of color or people from different nations to this university to create difference. Then students see the statement, "End difference," in the paper, and that attitude is reinforced.

Obviously, this statement in the Monkey Box was not well thought out. Will ending difference really end discrimination? After all, ending difference promotes the non-acceptance of people. The photograph of the Coke bottle supposes that fixing discrimination is easy. Just flip over the bottle and be like us. Taking this as a joke is a social problem that we have. We need to open our eyes to how people really perceive difference and diversity. Issues like this are easily ignored when someone doesn't think that it affects him or her. I am sorry to say, ladies and gentlemen, perceptions like this affect every one of you out there. Can we as a campus afford to ignore statements like this? The fact that many people probably did not care about the statement reveals people's anxiety about difference. Think about it while you are watching the news or your favorite television show. How much difference is really being brought to you in this nation?

Gladiator
Directed by Ridley Scott with Russell Crowe, Joaquin Phoenix, Connie Nielsen
Playing at Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield

The move into the summer movie market brings with it a shift toward big-screen eye candy and away from thoughtful, subtle, intricate storytelling, and Gladiator is as clear an example of this phenomenon as you're likely to find.

The movie is set at the height of empirical Rome. The emperor, Marcus Aurelius (Richard Harris), is near death, and hands down the authority of his position not to his unstable and unwise son, Commodus (Joaquin Phoenix), but to his most trusted and celebrated general, Maximus (Russell Crowe). The scheming Commodus discovers this betrayal of fatherly love, and murders Aurelius, assuming the throne and ordering the death of Maximus and his family. The warrior escapes, however, eventually being sold into slavery and then rising in fame as a combatant in the bloody gladiator arenas, biding his time until he can avenge the murder of his family and restore Rome to a republic, as was Aurelius' final wish.

Gladiator opens with an impressive military sequence; we join Maximus as he oversees the final conquest of a Germanic tribe, and the battle employs hundreds, perhaps thousands of extras, massive earthworks, incendiary catapults, and all the other trimmings of a good Roman military campaign. The costumes, props, even the landscape all appear totally authentic and immersive. This is not a glorified past of pristine soldiers and bright banners, but a bleak, gritty landscape of walking corpses and men butchering each other for the glory of a distant political abstraction -- Maximus himself has never been to the city of Rome. The battle sequence, although occasionally indulgent of one too many artistic film manipulations, does a wonderful job of whetting the audience's appetite for things to come.

What follows, however, is a lot of awkward story explication and sub-par dialogue, setting in motion a meandering plot that plays out more or less how you'd expect, with some violent gladiatorial battles mixed throughout to keep you interested. And be warned, this movie holds nothing back in its gory depictions and contains some scenes of startling violence.

Gladiator makes use of a considerable amount of CGI in creating the unforgiving realism of the Roman arenas, and the Roman world in general, and too often the results are slightly short of seamless. For instance, in the opening sequence, computers are employed to add flaming arrows soaring between the armies -- the only problem being that none of the extras are drawing and releasing bows, leaving you wondering where all those arrows are coming from. The accumulation of such minor flaws has an overall dampening effect on the audience's ability to lose themselves completely in the movie's historical universe.

The acting, however, cannot be faulted. Russell Crowe, certainly not anyone's first guess for a likely action star, portrays Maximus with a hearty stoicism and strength of character, endearing him to the audience despite his ferocity on the battlefield and in the arena bouts. Joaquin Phoenix plays the psychologically damaged Commodus equally well, and Connie Nielsen manages to bring a commendable level of interest to the role of Lucilla, Commodus' sister, a role that might otherwise easily be dismissed as marginal and merely plot-conductive.

Despite the shortcomings of its story and dialogue, Gladiator is an undeniably fun ride (assuming you have the stomach for it). The atmosphere of Roman political upheaval may be flat and predictable, but concentrating too strongly on such distractions as plot is perhaps a mistake in this sort of movie. B

The gory Gladiator took care of business at this weekend's box office.

Coppola's trying Virgin

By Ariane M. Balizet
The Student Life (Pomona College)

(U-WIRE) - If you're like me, and read Jeffrey Eugenides's The Virgin Suicides on a lazy summer afternoon in 1993 after Sassy magazine gave it a rave review, you might be a little puzzled by Sofia Coppola's new film adaptation. Then again, if you've never even heard of Eugenides's novel but have the hots for Kristen Dunst, you still might come out of the theater feeling a little baffled. Coppola's brave if somewhat sparse translation of this haunting, elegiac novel onto the screen is beautiful to watch and in many ways perfectly executed, but on the whole the film seems to completely miss the point of the book, assuming the metaphorical world to be reality and leaving us with a lingering but utterly bewildering experience.

Let's cut to the chase: The Virgin Suicides, in both its manifestations, is a story about five sisters who commit suicide. There's no getting around it; both Eugenides and Coppola open the story with the first and grisliest failed attempt.

The story is told collectively by a group of men who, as boys in the mid-1970s, had lived and worshipped the five Lisbon sisters -- Cecelia, Lux, Bonnie, Therese, and Mary -- from afar. Worshipped is too mild a term for the narrative Eugenides presents; obsessive reconstruction of the girls' short lives from fragments collected and hoarded for years. The film is narrated by a faceless and even ageless voice (Giovanni Ribisi), but the necessary limits of the cinematic form focuses on a group of four or five boys (a handful out of the dozens mentioned in the book) as adolescents. This is the primary weakness of the film; Ribisi's laconic gravel is right for the weight of the narration, but gone is the feeling that a group of middle-aged men obsess over these girls as living (and dying) symbols of innocence and youthful struggle. The book makes much of the parent generation's connection to World War II and the way their petty, gossipy existence in suburbia pales in comparison to the atrocities of the 40s. The film tries hard to foreground the Lisbon sisters instead of the boys, but this shift in focus makes the girls too real, less ephemeral, and completely incapable of doing what they do.

The five beautiful sisters are held all but captive in the home of their strict parents (James Woods and Kathleen Turner), and after the youngest (Cecilia) attempts suicide, Mr. and Mrs. Lisbon spend the next year of their lives trying to alternately relax and then harden their rules according to what they think is best for their children.

Kristen Dunst is perfect as Lux, embracing the young would-be vixen's repressed and explosive sexuality as well as her mesmerizing effect on men of all ages. Yet Dunst falls victim to one of the major downfalls of the film: she looks and acts entirely too healthy in the year after her sister finally succeeds in killing herself.

All the girls, played skillfully with a wealth of young blond talent, seem so beautiful, happy, and healthy. The stunning A.J. Cook, as Mary, looks like she walked off the set of Dawson's Creek moments before the offs herself. We are given the impression that the girls are perfectly "normal" young women with the burden of overly attentive parents, a nod because Woods and Turner give Mr. and Mrs. Lisbon plenty of sympathetic, stunned heart and soul, in the end they are neither villain nor victim, but simply innocent bystanders.

What Coppola's directorial debut does best is place most of the blame on suburbia itself; some of the best scenes are the bright, gossipy "interviews" with neighbors sipping tea in atrociously decorated living rooms. She also handles the one love in Lux's life -- a playboy named Trip Fontaine (Josh Hartnett) who falls madly for Lux but then abandons her inexplicably -- exceptionally well, showing Lux's first transgression outside her parents' rules to be as closely related to her demise as the rules themselves.

After she breaks curfew, however, the girls are removed from school and essentially locked in the house -- a punishment Coppola takes all too lightly, for all its implication that four girls cooped up in a house have no choice but to commit suicide.

This period is illustrated by a few shots of the girls draped over one another, flipping through magazines and applying makeup. Eugenides's book shows this period as one of overwhelming decay, of both the house and the girls themselves. We never see the girls waste away and show signs of anything more than mysterious beauty; the only time we see any of them cry is when Lux is ordered by her mother to burn her Kiss album.

The deaths themselves are barely shown and, because the girls are so vibrant for the majority of the film, we don't really get the sense that they're really dead. The first successful suicide is technically sloppy, but the horrifying finale is almost immediately forgotten.

Instead of walking ghosts finally reaching their desired rest, the celebrated Lisbon sisters are given an unceremonious and abrupt exit. I am too harsh; those who have not read the book will probably not feel the emptiness I felt when I came to the end of the film.

In and of itself, it is certainly safe to say that the film casts a powerful, lingering spell over the audience, mostly due to the immense amount of talent on the screen. But instead of an allegory of war, innocence, and memory we are left with one resounding idea: these girls wanted to die. And I left asking the question that is (surprisingly) rarely asked in the movie: why?

The Workhorse Movement has their trust in weed and whiskey and Black Sabbath.

THE WORKHORSE MOVEMENT
Sons of the Pioneers
Roadrunner

Every so often a rock album comes around that brings things back to basics and just celebrates the classic elements of rock n' roll, like rebellion, sex, drugs, etc. Monster Magnet's Powertrip did this in 1998 and AC/DC and Motorhead do this essentially every album. Add Detroit's The Workhorse Movement to this list, since their debut Sons of the Pioneers is one of the most endearing and balls-out rock records in recent memory.

The Workhorse Movement has its roots in Michigan, where vocalist Myron, guitarist Freedom, and drummer Joe were all attending college. They released an album on their own, Dopamine, and added vocalist Cumbread before relocating to Detroit and adding bassist Pete. An EP on Overcore followed, and while touring the band caught the eye of Roadrunner Records, who will release Sons of the Pioneers on June 6. The name The Workhorse Movement comes from ideas in Tom Wolfe's excellent book The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test, an expose of a group of 1960's free thinkers. The album title is given an explanation inside the sleeve, which claims that although the free thinkers of that time forged the way, they have now become the very accusers they rebelled against, thus The Workhorse Movement is their seed, the Sons of the Pioneers.

The Workhorse Movement's sound is firmly entrenched in old-school rock ethics, but that's not to say it doesn't keep pace with new ideas to keep things interesting. The Sabbath and 70's rock influences are very present but combined with all kinds of other aspects like horns, hip-hop/rap elements, Panteralike chugga, and a hint of stoner rock. The Movement even resurrects the old band-photo-on-the-cover ideal, last seen most memorably with the devil-horns-flaunting goodness of Powertrip.

You'd be hard-pressed to find a better opener than "Keep the Sabbath Dream Alive," which pays tribute to Black Sabbath through new-school bounce, while the gruff, Clutch-style vocals give things a gritty, timeless flavor. The lyrics pay a superbly silly tribute ("Man I'm driving down Sweet Leaf road") while simultaneously celebrating the joys of weed and hard liquor. This is music that would make Ozzy and the boys proud, as would presumably "Feel Like Bob Marley," which closes the album. Celebrating his music and lifestyle, the lyrics ("the legend man for sure he had it right/livin' like it's Friday on Monday") are backed by an easy going reggae groove that builds towards the climactic sing-a-long closer.

Sandwiched in-between these two standouts are an endless amount of irresistible hooks, layered arrangements, and countless references to sex, drugs, and rock n' roll. But don't think that these Workhorses only rock for rock. they still tackle issues of racism ("Charley Don't Surf") and bring in rapper Esham for variety on the build-release "Zero." And you can't help but be won over by the roaring "Beotch," which features a riff whose bounce meter is incalculably massive and hilarious lyrics like "Hey, Hey, Beotch what did we smoke/damn I can barely see the ground."

Turning my cliché meter up to maximum since I am lazy, I'll say simply that Sons of the Pioneers is an incredibly enjoyable record from beginning to end and no fan of new rock or metal or good music should be without it this summer. A

Offense sputters in A-10 limelight

Veracka rolls, but UM bows to Bonnies in two of three

By Matthew Despres
Collegian Staff

It was to be the biggest weekend of the year for the Massachusetts baseball team: a three-game series with St. Bonaventure, which held a mere half-game lead over UMass heading into play on Saturday. Three games and two days later, however, the song remains the same as the Minutemen dropped two, failing to gain crucial ground as the season winds down.

UMass	3
St. Bonaventure	1

St. Bonaventure	8
UMass	3

St. Bonaventure	12
UMass	3

The Minutemen (22-19-1 overall, 9-8-1 A-10) picked up their lone victory in the first game of Saturday's doubleheader, a 3-1 win highlighted by another strong outing from senior pitcher Travis Veracka. Veracka went the distance for the seventh straight time, yielding just three hits and one run in his nine innings of work.

UMass kicked off the scoring in the second inning, scoring one run to take the early lead. First baseman Kevin O'Connell doubled to get on base, and took third on a wild pitch from Bonnies hurler Aaron Boule. Third baseman Aaron Senez then singled to third, sending O'Connell home to give UMass the 1-0 lead.

The Minutemen struck again in the third, thanks to the strong base running of senior Shaun Skeffington. With one out, Skeffington stole his 25th base of the year, moving into scoring position for Nick Gomauli. Gomaulli welcomed the opportunity, doubling to right center to send Skeffington home, pushing the lead to two.

Tom Ellerbrook, who assumed catching duties over the weekend while Chris Morgan recovers from a back sprain, did an admirable job in relief. Ellerbrook collected two of the five UMass hits in the game, and scored the third and final run in the fifth inning.

In the nightcap, the Minutemen fell into an early hole and never recovered, falling by a score of 9-3. Junior Craig Szado was knocked around for five runs in the first inning, failing to gain his usual command while the rest of his team struggled mightily at the plate. Szado was served the loss, ultimately allowing nine runs on eleven hits to fall to 3-4 on the season.

Sophomore Mike Tegeler keyed the five run outburst by the Bonnies in the first inning. After Szado served up four consecutive singles, Tegeler ripped a three-run triple to clear the bases, giving Bonaventure the early advantage.

The Bonnies maintained their attack on UMass into the third, rallying for three runs with two outs already on the board. Heading into the fourth the game was essentially decided, as Bonaventure had posted an 8-1 riddle that the Minutemen simply had no answer for.

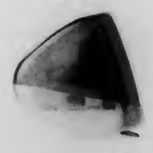
The Minuteman offense rested on Sunday as well, collecting only seven hits en route to being on the wrong side of a 13-3 massacre. Freshman righty Kyle Johnson held the Minutemen to five hits through 7 2/3 innings, striking out eight batters on his way to the victory.

Bonaventure struck for three runs in the bottom of the second, when senior Jason Milleisen hit a three-run home run over the right-center fence off of UMass starter Brian Hourigan, going up 3-0 heading into the third.

The Minutemen answered with two runs in the top of the third. Mike Kulak doubled with two men on, scoring Ellerbrook and Shaun Skeffington to pull within one. The rally would end, however, as UMass committed three errors and allowed five hits and five runs in the bottom of the fourth to seal the deal for Bonaventure.

The Minutemen would collect only one more run, a bases loaded walk to Senez that scored Kulak Hourigan was dealt the loss, falling to 3-2 on the season.

The Minutemen will return to action on Wednesday when the University of Maine visits Earl Lorden Field. The first pitch is scheduled for 3:00 P.M.



JON SWABLE / COLLEGIAN

Chris Morgan's presence in the lineup was missed this weekend, as UMass scored just nine runs in three games. The sophomore strained his back in practice last week, leaving the catching duties to freshman Tom Ellerbrook passing, but it was the defense that allowed the offense the opportunities.

The vaunting Bear defense stopped the Minutemen's extra-man opportunities (EMOs) all day allowing them to keep extending their lead. And extend they were able to do.

Coming out of the half Brown notched a goal 24 seconds in, which seemed to deflate the Minutemen more than they already were. The goal came when Monfett picked up a loose ball and was able to beat a defenseless Campolettano. But again just as UMass tried to respond Dickson was there to clean up the mess.

Dickson had perhaps his best save of the afternoon when he stoned Leveille from the doorstep after a 2-on-1 break. Leveille tried to beat Dickson low but he read the shot and sprawled to kick the ball aside.

UMass would mount a comeback late in the fourth quarter exploding for six tallies in the frame. Trailing 12-5 Kunkel scored his second goal of the game after picking up a loose ball and firing a spinning shot that found its way past Dickson. Racioppi would then find his touch as he fired a blistering shot from the restraining line that found the back of the net to cut the lead in half, 12-6. Kunkel would then find Leveille for the third consecutive UMass goal.

Brown would tack on the next two before the Minutemen would mount their last surge. Racioppi would score on a shot that beat Dickson high and on the ensuing faceoff Jeff Seals scooped up the groundball and scored seven seconds later. Keith Gabrielli would score the final goal of the game at the 27-second mark of the fourth quarter to make the final count of 14-10.

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Rich Kunkel scored two goals and added a career-high five assists against Brown, but the Bears ripped the Minutemen, 14-10.

Future bodes well for NE foes

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Following the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's 14-10 loss to Brown on Saturday, there was still a consistent flow of smiles distributed despite getting thoroughly outplayed by its New England rival.

The game was never really close and the Bears left no doubt in anyone's mind who was the region's best.

But this year's game was nothing. Wait until their next hookup.

Neither team was loaded with seniors on what was Senior Day at Richard F. Garber Field. Instead, the only thing they were loaded with was promise.

The more evident squad of the future came from Rhode Island, that of the Bears (9-6, 3-3 Ivy League). A team that suffered through back-to-back 4-9 seasons had pieced together a 9-6 campaign, which included a 10-9 victory over heavily-favored Duke. With only two seniors among their top ten in points, Brown is set for a run at the NCAA postseason. Their top four scorers will be around next year, including a trio of juniors that have carried the Bears to the next level, after floating in mediocrity for all too long. In addition, goaltender Beret Dickson makes his way back, this after making a season-high 22 saves on the Minutemen (6-8, 1-4 ECAC) this past weekend.

With the Ivy climbing the ranks as college lacrosse's top conference, Brown is making a move to the top. Despite having lost to Princeton, Harvard and Cornell this season, the Bears were hanging near the cellar last season. Staying above water was more on the mind than competing with the league's elite. Next year's returnees ought to give Peter Lasagna a shot at his first league championship since 1995.

The Minutemen, who haven't beaten the Bears since 1997, will unquestionably miss the seven-player class that thrust their sticks over a shoulder and gandered off the Amherst turf for the final time. The transition from defense to offense will certainly be the x-factor in the 2001 season, as the Maroon and White lose five midfielders, including co-captain Mike Young. In addition, they lose defenseman John Hutchen and attackman Mike Ianowicz.

But through loss comes gain, or so the Minutemen hope. They return their four leading point scorers, but will likely feel some growing pains early on next season in an attempt to fill the voids left by the seniors seven.

The emergences of Alex Racioppi and Kevin Leveille on offense have complemented the soon-to-be senior duo of Rich Kunkel and John Madigan, who paired up for 48 goals, nearly one-third of UMass' goal total in 13 games this season. But the real void will be felt on defense, as head coach Greg Cannella loses tremendous physical strength in front of returning senior Chris Campolettano. Hutchen, J.T. Benazzi and Mike Young offered smothering defense, this for a defense who slowly stretched at the tail end of the season, leaving its netminder up for target practice. Marc Morley's return from a mid-season suspenslon will undoubtedly ease the fall, but the aforementioned handful of middies have left gaping holes between the two cages.

Freshman Tom Fallon played considerable time in the second half of the year and will challenge for Hutchen's spot around the net. Leveille started in front of Ianowicz, but will likely play more with a year now under his belt.

each of her season averages. Young also held North Carolina's Kellie Thompson to a single goal.

Nardi, the heart of the defensive unit, was ranked fifth in the nation with an astonishing save percentage of .632, and goals against average of 7.00. Nardi has had 15 or more save in five regular season games and more than ten saves in another three games.

Offensively speaking, senior midfielder Stephanie Pavlick tallied five times in the tournament, one of them being the game-winner against the Owls of Temple.

Pavlick led the team in regular season scoring with 30 goals and six assists. She's had nine games in which she's scored more than one goal, including two four-goal games and four hat tricks.

Minaker is second in regular season points, tallying 19 times this season. She has the distinction of being the only player to either score or record an assist in every regular season game.

Junior Fay Naber finishes the regular season with 16 goals, and leads the team in draw controls with 24. She's also picked up 17 groundballs this season. Against St. Joseph's Naber put the sphere through the pipes four times, and dished out two assists, for a total of six points to contribute to her 23 points on the season.

The A-10 All Championship Team included four UMass players, Rebecca Minaker, Young, Nardi, and Stephanie Pavlick.

Pavlick also has the distinction of being the highest scoring on the Minutewomen's squad and the ninth highest overall in the A-10.

Nardi holds the honor of being the number one goalie overall in the A-10, and of the top ten in the nation.

Also honored this weekend were the three UMass players elected to the Atlantic-10 All-Conference Team. Nardi, Young, and Pavlick.

UMass finishes the season 10-7 overall and 7-1 in the A-10 Conference, including its two wins this weekend.

The 2000 season saw the Minutewomen rattle the cage 144 times, with 104 shots getting past goalies Nardi and freshman keeper Cyndi Doyle.

There are nine seniors vacating the team after this season, Katie Carey, Noelle Gorski, Sara McNabb, Melissa Miele, Minaker, Passanese, Pavlick, Wales and Young.

Gonzo, others have done nothing after winter swap

One of baseball's oldest axioms is that the best trades are the ones that help both teams. Just the opposite can be said of the blockbuster between the Tigers and Rangers in November that sent two-time American League MVP Juan Gonzalez to Detroit along with pitcher Danny Patterson and catcher Greg Zaun for pitchers Justin Thompson, Francisco Cordero and Alan Webb, catcher Bill Haselman, infielder Frank Catalanotto and outfielder Gabe Kapler. It's too early to determine who got the better of the deal, but so far, it hasn't benefited either side.

Gonzalez was to be the showpiece of Detroit's first year at Comerica Park, but the focus has been whether he will remain with the Tigers beyond this year or test free agency and leave in his wake an eight-year, $140 million offer.

For the $7.5 million the Tigers are paying him this season, they have gotten a .225 average with four home runs and eight RBI. For all the moaning about Comerica Park, which is not the hitters' playground so many of the new parks are, Gonzalez is hitting .265 at home and .200 on the road. Home or away, Gonzalez has not hit in the clutch. After Friday's game, he was 1-for-20 (.050) with runners in scoring position and 8-for-46 (.174) with runners on base.

Patterson has pitched well in relief but some feel he was responsible for starting the brawl with the White Sox two weeks ago that resulted in multiple suspensions.

The Rangers were hoping to reshape their team in exchanging a slugger for pitching and defense. But Thompson, recovering from shoulder surgery, has had a setback in his rehabilitation and may not pitch until June. Cordero has settled in nicely in the bullpen (1-0, 1.89 ERA), but that makes it pretty much a push with Patterson. Kapler and Catalanotto started out like gangbusters but both are on the disabled list. Kapler, who hit two home runs opening day, slumped to .200.

The outfield situation is such that the Rangers signed former All-Star Ruben Sierra, who ate his way out of the majors two years ago, to a minor league contract. Catalanotto, platooning at second base with Luis Alicea, was 12-for-24 (.500) when groin problems put him on the DL. Webb is pitching at Double A Tucson and is 0-3 with a 13.76 ERA in five starts.

So it's not too surprising that the Rangers and Tigers are both in last place.

An off-season trade on a lesser scale has proved to be a big one for the White Sox, who dealt pitchers Jaime Navarro and John Snyder to the Brewers for pitcher Cal Eldred and shortstop Jose Valentin. Eldred, left for dead a year ago (2-8, 7.79), is off to a 2-1 start. Valentin is hitting .279 with five home runs and 18 RBI, although he has been inconsistent in the field (11 errors in 26 games).

But look what Milwaukee got in return. Snyder is on the DL, and Navarro was released April 30 with an 0-5 record and 12.54 ERA.

JANET BARR/COLLEGIAN

After defeating the Owls of Temple for the first time in 20 seasons earlier in 2000, the Minutewomen captured their first ever Atlantic 10 Championship with a 3-2 overtime victory over the very same team.

UMass takes A-10s

Pavlick, defense sparkle in wins

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts' women's lacrosse team came through big this weekend, winning the Atlantic 10 Tournament in a tight one against the Hokies of Virginia Tech, who beat them earlier this year, and then beating Temple in the final, which the Minutewomen put away for the first time in twenty years this season.

Senior midfielder Stephanie Pavlick netted five goals in the tournament, including the game-winner against Temple with 39 seconds left in the first overtime period.

Junior goaltender Jen Nardi stopped 28 goals in the two games, with 17 of them against the Owls.

Lynne Young held Temple high scorer Kelly Ruch scoreless throughout the Championship game.

UMass scored first, when Pavlick tossed her fourth goal of the weekend past Iris Alvarado, the Owls' senior goalkeeper on a free position with 16:27 left in the first half.

Temple came back, though, and tied the game at one, where it would stay until late in the second half.

Nardi anchored the defense in the first half, stopping nine of Temple's 10 shots. She had a total of 17 saves on the day.

The second half displayed more excellent play by both defensive units, with each team taking less than 10 shots in the half.

UMass added to the scoreboard first, when freshman midfielder Lydia Robinson scored her sixth of the season, making the score 2-1, with 7:40 left.

UMass called a timeout with 1:35 remaining, and the lead 35 seconds later, Temple tied the game at two.

With two three-minute overtime halves to get through, the defenses for both teams continued to stop the scoring efforts of the other.

Pavlick tossed what proved to be the game-winning goal through the pipes with 39 seconds to go in the first overtime half to put the Minutewomen up 3-2.

Temple got off a couple more close shot in the remaining minutes of the game, but Nardi stood tall in the net to save UMass' lead.

"Everybody had their hearts in it [the game] today," Nardi said. "The defense was great and their goalie is awesome, it was a battle of the defenses once again, we just came up on top."

On Saturday the Minutewomen took on the Hokies of Virginia Tech, a team that beat them 8-6 the last time they had met. This time the Maroon and White went home with the win, 10-9.

Junior midfielders Denise Brey and Rachel Ingraffea, senior midfielder Rebecca Minaker, and Pavlick all scored multiple times in the game, with Brey, Ingraffea and Minaker tallying twice and Pavlick nailing down a hat trick.

Junior attacker Fay Naber contributed three assists in the win over the Hokies, and Nardi saved 11 of Virginia Tech's 22 shots.

Both UMass and the Hokies struck early in the first half, scoring within the first three minutes of the game. Minaker tallied her first of the day on a behind the back shot as she fell to the ground.

The teams exchanged goals twice before Ingraffea put the Minutewomen up 4-3 with 14:50 left to go in the first half.

As the clock wound down, Virginia Tech tied it up once again and then went ahead by one with a goal from freshman attacker Lisa Trimbidis.

UMass' second half play roared out of the gates with goals from Pavlick, senior midfielder Noelle Gorski, Minaker and Brey, before the Hokies could send an answer.

The Maroon and White led 8-6 when Pavlick rattled the cage for the third time in the game.

The Hokies tossed in two more goals to bring them within one point, until Ingraffea increased the UMass lead to two with her second goal of the day at 13:07.

Virginia Tech tossed one more past Nardi to again come within a point of the Minutewomen, but UMass' stellar defensive play shut the Hokies down for the remaining ten minutes of play.

Young wasn't finished either. She held Dawn Wills of Virginia Tech, who was recently awarded the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year honor, scoreless in the game.

"Out of all games to do it this was the best time to do it," Young said.

Head Coach Phil Barnes commented that none of the top three teams has beaten any of the other top teams more than once in the season.

"It was good to beat them [Temple] twice in the same year," he said. "Both teams played very well defensively," Barnes said. "Lynne Young is the MVP, I know it wasn't voted that way, but she held Dawn Wills and Kelly Ruch, two of the top scorers in the A-10 scoreless for two games in a row, and in championship play," he continued.

Defense was key component for champs

Defense.

The third in the nation, actually, and it certainly proved it was worth the rank this weekend.

Massachusetts women's lacrosse came into the A-10 Championship looking at a team that had defeated them in a well-played game earlier in the season, as well as a shot at the team they beat for the first time in twenty years just two weeks ago.

Defense was big this weekend with players such as senior co-captain Lynne Young keeping the A-10 Player of the Year, Dawn Will of Virginia Tech, and the highest scoring player in the A-10, Kelly Ruch of Temple, scoreless in two weekend games.

Also coming up big on "D" for the Minutewomen was junior goal tender Jen Nardi, who came up with 11 saves against the Hokies and 17 against Temple.

Massachusetts' defense is ranked third in the nation in scoring defense, allowing an average of 6.93 goals per game. The next lowest of their A-10 contenders is Temple, with 8.11 goals per game.

The defense is anchored by senior Jessica Passenese, who has picked up 13 groundballs this season, adding to the scoring column against St. Bonaventure, and senior Colleen Wales, who is tied with Stephanie Pavlick for the team high of 35 groundballs in the regular season. Wales also tallied her lone goal of the season against St. Bonaventure.

Young, a senior, is also a defensive fixture, picking up 17 groundballs and scoring against the Bonnies and Duquesne. Not only did Ruch feel her wrath, but also Dartmouth's Jaque Weitzel, who scored two goals, more than two goals below

Brown bounces UMass in New England clash

By Bryan Smith
Collegian Staff

The final chapter of a career was written Saturday afternoon in front of packed house at Richard F. Garber Field for seven members of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team.

Unfortunately it was not the way they would have scripted it.

Brown	14
UMass	10

The Minutemen concluded their season with a 14-10 loss at the hands of No. 16 Brown.

UMass (6-8, 1-4 ECAC) came out flat and was never able to recover as the Bears took it to the Maroon and White from the opening faceoff. Brown (9-6, 3-3 Ivy League) scored the first two goals of the contest and never looked back.

The uphill battle for the Minutemen started just 48 seconds in when Todd McNamara drove along the left side of the UMass defense and found a cutting Jeremy Metz. The junior then fired a shot through the five-hole of Minuteman goalie Chris Campolettano for a 1-0 lead.

But it was not the offense on this day that would frustrate the Maroon and White, it would Brown netminder Beret Dickson. On the first UMass possession the junior stopped four shots including point-blank attempts by Alex Racioppi and Kevin Leveille. This would not be the only time that the Columbia, MD native would come up big for his team as he went on to make 10 stops in the quarter and 22 saves in the contest.

The Bears would double their lead moments later when McNamara made a great spin move on Jeremy Guski and fired a shot that beat Campolettano low. UMass would finally find an answer for Dickson at the 2:38 mark of the first frame when John Madigan finished after an excellent feed from Rich Kunkel.

Brown extended its lead to 3-1 after Jonathon Thompson deposited his first of two goals on the afternoon. Michael Monfett found Thompson on a great look from behind the net and wasted no time putting the ball home.

Brown would continue to pad its lead as the Bears put up the first two goals of the second frame. The first was by McNamara and the second by Michael Hughes. Madigan would score his second goal of the game midway through the quarter to bring the deficit to 5-2, but that would be as close the Minutemen would get until a late surge in the fourth quarter.

Brown would go to score the next four goals to go into the half with a 9-2 advantage. The Bears abused the UMass defense with great interior

UMass takes A-10 crown

By Brett Mauser

As if five wasn't enough.

This weekend at the new Softball Complex, the Massachusetts softball team showed its greed, its infatuation with stealing the spotlight away from others. That, though, is sport, and the Minutewomen (32-20, 13-3 Atlantic 10) have become synonymous with the phrase "Atlantic 10 champions."

What started out as a sorrowtale has cheered up for head coach Elaine Sortino and UMass, as the Maroon and White blitzed through the conference schedule, clinching their sixth consecutive A-10 title with a sweep of Rhode Island. A stellar afternoon on the mound might have been upstaged by an explosive offensive attack that buried the Rams by mercy rule on both occasions, 13-0, 8-0. ■

The story was Nikki Faessler, and fittingly, as the Queens, N.Y. native put on the catcher's gear for the final time in front of the Amherst faithful. In a season which she's been hampered by injuries, the sole senior went a perfect 4-for-4 at the plate, driving in seven runs with two doubles and a home run. Not only that, but she also caught a pair of shutouts behind the pentagon.

"It was just unbelievable. I'm really happy for her. It's one of the few games this whole year she's felt good physically," Sortino said. "This was as good as she hit in her career and it's a very nice way for her to play this game."

After freshman Brandi Cross scored fellow newcomer Emily Robustelli with a single, Faessler stepped up and banged a single to left, which plated Cross to give UMass a 2-0 padding.

It turned out to be all co-captain Jen Hadley would need on the rubber. After starting slow in the season, the sophomore has rallied, picking up her 10th victory of the season, scattering two hits and fanning five in five innings of work. Hadley hasn't lost in over a month.

Much to the chagrin of the Rams, UMass was just getting started at the plate. The Maroon and White scored four in the first and six in the second, giving Hadley plenty to work with. Ashley Bakken and Debbie Tomoguchi closed with first with a pair of RBI-singles, plating Holtz and Faessler, with UMass then squandering the opportunity to put more on the board.

The second was much of the same – more, in fact. With the bases juices, Faessler ripped a double to left, scoring Holtz, Cherra Wheeler and Teri Rooney. To add insult to injury, the senior would come around just moments later with the 10th run of the day on a wild pitch.

UMass scored three more in the fourth, plenty for the mercy rule to come into effect as Hadley buried the hatchet with a perfect fifth.

Faessler would prove to be the difference in game two, as it was a near-sequel of round one. Already ahead 6-0, the catcher belted a walkoff two-run blast in the fifth to capture the A-10 crown. It marked her second longball of the season and 11th in her career, moving her into sole possession of second place in the UMass record books.

"It doesn't feel real. It was perfect. I was excited but very relaxed today," Faessler said. "It feels right, now that I've overcome all of the obstacles I've faced this year."

Game One
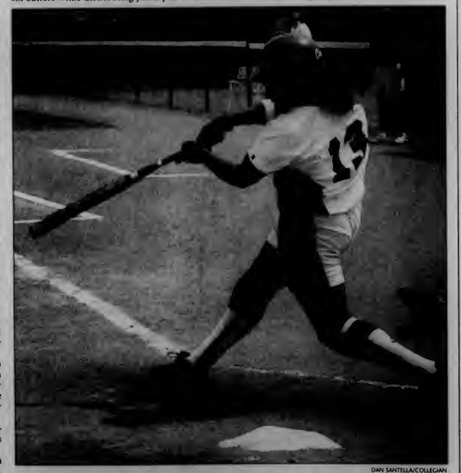
Rhode Island	0

Right on her tail, though, is Cross. Just a freshman, the California native took it deep for the ninth time this season, breaking Sherri Kuchinskas seven-year-old mark of eight. In the second inning, the freshman phenom crushed a two-run blast to the opposite field, scoring Robustelli along with her.



By this juncture, Holtz was in cruise control. She improved to 14-7 on the season, striking out six batters while distributing just a pair of hits.

Game Two
UMass	8
Rhode Island	0

Teri Rooney set up Faessler's heroics with a single UMass run in the fourth. After doubling to left, she advanced to third and then home off wild pitches. Rooney is first on the team in runs scored and fifth on the team in hitting with an average just under .300.

With the A-10 in its wake and the tournament just three days away, one that the Minutewomen will host at the Complex starting on Thursday, UMass will prepare for the championship by taking on arch-rival UConn tomorrow in Storrs. The contest will mark Sortino's 1,000th game at the helm of the Maroon and White. The Huskies will hope to ruin the festivities by avenging a 5-4 loss at the hands of UMass less than two weeks ago.

"People thought we were worse than we were because of our early season record," Sortino said. "They're starting to get a sense of who they are, and that's important."

Chancellor Scott shakes the hand of Hector Colon at yesterday's Community Service Awards Ceremony.

Wofford speaks at ceremony

By Anna Faktorovich
Collegian Staff

A group of individuals dedicated to community service gathered to present former U.S. Senator and head of the Corporation for National Service Harris Wofford with the Distinguished Citizen Scholar Award, on May 8, at 11:30 in the Campus Center Auditorium.

A variety of other awards were also given to students, faculty members and community serving leaders.

Chancellor David K. Scott spoke about the University's dedication to community service at the beginning of the event. He commented that the University had always shown integrity in acting upon the vision of community service. He went on to say that he saw "increasing imprints of the habits of the heart" developing in the University.

Wofford began his presentation by urging the audience and the community at large to become involved in community service. He said that he saluted Scott's plan to get two-thirds of the student body involved in community service.

"Physical fitness is important but so is civic fitness," he said. "That is what it's all about."

He also drew parallels between his memories of World War II and the need for community service. He explained that he saw people, "pulling together to win a war everyone knew had to be won."

Wofford further stressed that since WWII Americans, "lost the fierce urgency" necessary to make change, "Crack the atom!" he exclaimed.

He explained that community service should focus on issues regarding children and on education against discrimination.

He said that children should be encouraged to participate in service and should be thought of as both future resources and as teachers. Hence, Wofford said that college students and youth in general should become "a major carrier of the Peace Corps" and other service organizations.

Overall, he saluted all service groups and individuals, commenting "so far so good." However he also asked all listeners to "think of the potential that is there."

Wofford had a long career serving the community as a whole. While serving as a Democratic Senator in Pennsylvania from 1991-1994 he had many service related initiatives. He worked to gain passage to the National Civilian Community Corps, and worked with President Clinton's task force on

The Seventh Annual Chancellor's Outstanding Community Service Awards Banquet was held yesterday in the Campus Center to honor highly involved students and members of the community.

The event was held in conjunction with the Citizen Scholars Program, which began last year as part of the Commonwealth College's Office of Community Service Learning. The participants are a group of students who partake in a two-year program that spans to include elements of community service, research and project development.

Students involved in the program are required to complete five community service learning courses and at least 60 hours worth of community service each semester that they participate in the program.

Thirty-one students that took part in the program were recognized for their individual community service projects. Participants were acknowledged for their commitment to such organizations as MassPIRG, TEAMS, Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (MSPCC), Amherst Shelter for Adolescents, Amherst Survival Center, and the Hospice Alliance.

Also recognized for involvement were faculty members from the University. Eleven professors from a variety of different departments were awarded grants that allow them to develop or modify courses to include an element of service learning within them. Since 1994, when this portion of the program began, over 50 professors have been awarded these types of grants.

In addition, departments within the school were rewarded for their commitment to the community through departmental fellowships. These were awarded to the School of Marketing and the School of Education, and are to be used to incorporate and develop Community Service Learning into a main aspect of the curriculum for the department.

Another major aspect of the program is the annual presentation of the Distinguished Citizen Scholar Award. The qualifications for this award, according to the Commonwealth College are to, "an individual who has an outstanding record of translating civic ideals into action."

The award this year went to Harris Wofford a former Senator from the state of Pennsylvania. Wofford contributed a great deal in the area of community service.

Some of his notable accomplishments are helping to launch the Peace Corps, establishing an Office of Citizen Service in Pennsylvania, and assisting in the civil rights movement.

In the 1970s he chaired a panel studying the idea of national service, and helped to produce a report entitled "Youth and the Needs of the Nation" that highlighted that work. In addition, he also served as Pennsylvania's secretary of labor and industry, managed the Pennsylvania Conservation Corps, and promoted school based service learning and youth corps.

The final awards given out during the presentation were the Class of 1991 Public Service Fellowship and the Kathryn F. Furcolo Award. The Furcolo awards was given out in memory of Kathryn and to recognize students that complete a internship in either public service or in the area of government.

The Service Fellowship was created to highlight the importance of community service in a democratic society. This award recognizes sophomores and juniors that have had an outstanding commitment to community service during their early years at the University and plan upon assuming a leadership role later in their college career.

Demonstrators disrupt protest

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

Demonstrators disrupted a Republican Club sponsored candlelight vigil Friday afternoon, protesting the club's stance on the trial of Mumia Abu Jamal, who was convicted in the shooting death of Philadelphia police officer Daniel Faulkner.

According to Ken Campbell, a Republican Club member, problems started with protestors blowing out the candles, which were meant to honor the memories of fallen officers, and escalated to verbal assault and the Republican Club being followed to their office.

"People were very threatening," Campbell said. "I was glad to have the police here."

"UMass showed how much it hates cops on Friday," he continued, commenting that during a prayer given in Faulkner's memory "people booed, and when we said 'cop killer' they cheered."

"I can't imagine seeing someone who shot a cop in the back being touted as a hero," Campbell said, comparing the recent rise in Jamal's supporters to "taking a picture of Timothy McVeigh and plastering it all over Oklahoma City, and saying he's innocent."

According to Campbell, the club had just put away their equipment and was preparing to go to classes when they heard what sounded like a large mob coming up the hill.

It was then, Campbell said, that the crowd outside the office, which the Republican Club shares with the University Democrats, the Silent Majority, the Campus Crusade for Christ, the Intervarsity Christian Fellowship, and the Born Again Students In Christ, began banging on the door and "tore everything off the door," regardless of which group the posters and pamphlets hanging there belonged to.

Mike Marin, president of the Republican Club, called the actions made by the protestors "classless" and said they "lacked respect."

"We have in the past shown them respect, and they didn't show us that same respect," Marin said of the protesting groups.

In the week before the vigil the Republican Club put up posters around campus that said such things as "Fry Mumia!"

"I basically have no regrets of that poster going up," Marin said. "I have no apologies for anybody, I'm glad we put it up."

"I stand by what our club does," he said, "I like the publicity."

Campbell however had a different view on the matter

"I had absolutely nothing to do with those posters," he said.

"I found them tasteless," he continued, stating that the posters "just looked bad for the club."

"We tried to exercise our freedom of speech and our freedom to assemble on Friday," Campbell said. "We were definitely treading a dangerous line and we were silenced."

Marin said that the club fared "extremely well" in the situation and "we kept our composure and acted in an adult manner."

"Despite what they [the protestors] were doing out there, I'm not intimidated. This won't stop me or my club in any way," Marin said.

"We will continue to be the voice of reason on this campus."

Campbell commented that the insults hurled at the club were vulgar enough that "I don't know how I'm going to be able to tell my parents or my grandparents about days like Friday."

Gore, Bush exchange heated words during ongoing campaign

By Matea Gold
Los Angeles Times

Just as voter interest in the presidential race was slipping, Al Gore engaged George W. Bush in a rhetorical battle that has injected a negative tone unusually early in the campaign.

Vice President Gore, the presumptive Democratic nominee, lobbed a flurry of verbal grenades in recent weeks, calling Bush's attitude "smug" and "arrogant," and dismissing his proposals as "reckless" and "irresponsible."

The Bush bunker fired back with the Texas governor charging that Gore is an "inventor" and "exaggerator" with a "willingness to say anything."

The language is designed to instill voters with negative impressions of their opponents. But experts in political communication say the candidates have to be careful about not slipping into name-calling.

"You don't want to push it so hard that people begin to see it as an assault," said Roderick P. Hart, author of "Campaign Talk," a book about political language.

"When language or a label can become a presumption rather than an argument, it works best. There's some magic to when that happens."

Even as both candidates promise to focus on the issues, they're honing a proven strategy of trying to stick labels on each other before one sticks on them.

Gore has been trying to paint a picture of Bush as a flaky, irresponsible lightweight who doesn't have what it takes to run the country. Meanwhile, Bush, mostly through aides, has been calling Gore a negative campaigner who has a problem telling the truth.

"It's all a frame game," said Leonard Steinhorn, former speech writer and professor of communications at American University. "You're going to see those words melting into images they want to communicate."

In the last two weeks, the vice president has been replaying the tactics he used successfully to defeat former Sen. Bill Bradley in the primaries, aggressively attacking his opponent with a litany of words that have a decidedly personal tone.

Gore started the fusillade in Michigan at a news conference April 21. "Gov. Bush seems to have this smug assumption that he can get away with calling himself an environmentalist, despite his record of what has gone so badly wrong in Texas."

In Atlantic City last week, Gore repeatedly accused Bush of having a "secret plan" of Social Security privatization that resembled "stock market roulette."

In Chicago on Thursday, after criticizing Bush's health care proposal, Gore denied that his verbal assault on the Texas governor amounted to a personal attack. "Vigorous discussion of the substance of the issues is healthy for our democracy," he said.

The bombardment of insults so early in the campaign, however, runs the risk of turning off people, analysts say.

"The language does seem to me to be pretty up on the temperature scale for May," said Gary Woodward, professor of communication studies at the College of New Jersey. "We are going to be in utter campaign fatigue by the time the fall rolls around."

It's no accident that Gore is using words like "smug" and referring obliquely to Bush's smirk.

A poll of almost 1,200 voters in March conducted by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press showed that 31 percent of people mentioned a negative word like "arrogant" when asked for a one-word description of Bush, up from 21 percent in September.

Unlike Bradley, who reacted angrily and somewhat clumsily to Gore's attacks, Bush seems less fazed by the torrent of biting words. He has carefully steered away from personally labeling the vice president, calling himself "a uniter, not a divider."

GEO to protest delays

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Members of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) are mobilizing to protest against inadequate wages tomorrow on the steps of the Student Union at noon.

The group negotiated their forth contract with the Administration back in October and now feels as if their contract is being held up by Governor Paul Cellucci's Office, according to statements made to the press. The president's office at the University submitted the proposal to the state in January.

According to state law, the governor has 45 days to submit a request to fund the contract to the legislature the organization explained in their statement. The 45 days are now up and the Graduate Employees have not been given any of the new benefits that were to be allotted to them.

The new contract included initiatives to allow graduate students to receive raises of $300 to $500 per employee, which is up from the current minimum rate assistantship of 10,000 dollars per 20-hour/38 week work period.

In addition, at the rally protesters will also be unveiling the results of an informal survey that was given to students to access the performance of the University over the past year. The reports were filled out by student on campus last week and addressed such issues as quality of life and education on campus.

During the grading period students were asked to rate the campus from A to F on the issues of willingness to answer requests for information, respecting democratic rights of workers to organize into a union, their accountability to students, support of diversity on campus, and whether or not they provide both accessibly housing and affordable childcare to the people on campus.

The Graduate Employee Organization spans to include 2,500 working graduate students. The group represents Teaching Associates, Teaching Assistants, Research Assistants, Project Assistants, Assistant Resident Directors, and other graduate workers at the University.

Afghan drought kills livestock

By Pamela Constable
The Washington Post

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan – Like his father and grandfather before him, Azim Khan has spent his entire life in the Rigestan desert, living in a tent and tending his herd of 200 sheep. When the grass and water ran low, his clan would pack their belongings onto camels and trek to a new spot in the sand.

But this spring a yearlong drought suddenly worsened, scorching vast areas of southern Afghanistan and Pakistan. One by one, Khan watched his flock die of thirst until only 10 sheep were left. Across the Rigestan, tens of thousands of other nomads, known as Kochis, have lost 90 percent of their herds.

Now, Khan and his family are camped beside a river with 200 other nomadic families on the outskirts of Kandahar. The Taliban government, which controls 90 percent of Afghanistan, rescued them from the desert in truck convoys and brought them here.

"This is the worst thing that has ever happened. All the animals are gone, and if the trucks had not come, our people might have died too," said Khan, a leathery man of 40, clutching one of his lambs and speaking in Pashto. "We have nothing here, but we have nothing to go back to. We do not know what will become of us."

This week the United Nations issued a special appeal for international aid to the drought-stricken region, saying that at least 2.5 million farmers and herders, and an equal number in Pakistan, have been affected. There have been no large numbers of fatalities in either country. U.N. officials in Pakistan said they have begun distributing wheat and corn to 400,000 people from the hardest-hit areas.

Drought also has affected millions of people in India, and the government has declared a state of emergency.

In Afghanistan, Taliban officials said they have done what they can to help the suffering nomads, but they lack the resources to provide permanent assistance. In the past two months, officials said, they have sent trucks and army helicopters to rescue 8,000 to 15,000 Kochi families, who have since been temporarily relocated.

The regime tried to save some animals as well, loading thousands of sheep and goats onto trucks and carting them to safe spots. But as the drought worsened, officials said they had to abandon that effort and concentrate on saving human lives.

"Our goal now is to rescue people from death," said Maulvi Sheraza Rashidi, the Taliban's planning chief for southern Afghanistan. "We have had to do this with our own resources, and unfortunately all the animals have died. As Muslims, we believe that everything happens according to God's wish, but if the drought continues, what should we do?"

Taliban authorities expressed frustration that the United Nations and other international groups have not done more to provide emergency relief. They complained that despite the large U.N. presence, assistance has been too slow and bureaucratic.

U.N. officials said it is difficult to raise funds to assist Afghanistan, which has been internationally isolated since the Taliban took power in 1996. The United Nations said it has been distributing food and water to about 200,000 people since January, and plans to dig 250 deep wells in the desert. But officials said most of the U.N. aid is geared toward long-term development and rehabilitation of the country, which has been decimated by 20 years of war.

"All of the aid ... is focused on the drought, and we are doing all we can," said Leslie Ovqist, the U.N. coordinator for southern Afghanistan. "But for the Kochis, a whole way of living has been destroyed. Normally we give loans to people, but the nomads would just buy some livestock and disappear. And without animals, they will be stuck here as beggars and laborers in Kandahar."

The drought also has affected thousands of farmers in southern Afghanistan, reducing the nation's wheat output by as much as two-thirds. Ironically, it also has damaged the current crop of poppies, which the Taliban and the United Nations have been trying to curb because Afghan poppies are a major source of opium and heroin.

In Nangahar, a lush province east of Kabul, golden wheat fields and ripe poppy plants are being busily harvested. But in the region surrounding Kandahar, about 300 miles southwest of Kabul, ragged patches of wheat and poppies droop in parched plots of brown earth.

Egg donation ad at U. Illinois creates stir

By Connie Hsu
Daily Illini (U. Illinois)

(U-WIRE) CHAMPAIGN, Ill. -- "Egg Donors Needed," the ad proclaimed in large font. Underneath, it offered "$5,000 Compensation" to all donors, enticing college women to donate their eggs for money.

Third-party reproduction is a process in which an egg donor gives her eggs to an infertile couple to be fertilized with sperm outside of the womb. The fertilized embryo is then transferred to an infertile woman's womb, where the baby can grow and be born.

"Third-party reproduction gives infertile women an opportunity to have children and experience giving birth," said Colleen Nuxoll, coordinator of infertility services at Christie Clinic.

Some students are only willing to donate their eggs to a couple they know.

"If I knew the couple, I would do it as a good deed, but not for the money," said Jill Duchnowski, freshman in LAS.

Most ads ask for confidential donors.

"The donors are completely anonymous and confidential," Berman said.

In confidential egg donation, a donor fills out an application and is not asked to donate her eggs until a couple chooses her as a candidate. The application process includes height, weight, interests, academic performance, medical history and a picture of the donor.

"On the flipside, if I were infertile, I would want to go through with the procedure." Duchnowski said. "I would want the egg donor to be anonymous."

Personal and ethical issues prevent some students from donating.

"I wouldn't do it, I don't think it's a good idea," said Caroline Sanchez, freshman in LAS. "That's like a part of me, and I wouldn't want to sell it to someone else."

Simmi Mandal, sophomore in engineering, had similar feelings about donating her eggs.

"Rationally, I can see the merits of the scientific argument ? the eggs are just a biological part of me," Mandal said. "However, I know that deep down, I would feel that the child is mine."

Although some students might not want to donate their eggs, third party reproduction gives infertile couples a chance to have children, said Jessica Van Tine, freshman in LAS.

"Even though I wouldn't do it, it's good for infertile couples," she said. "There are a lot of good parents who wouldn't have a chance to be good parents otherwise."

For many women, money is not a significant reason to donate their eggs.

"I'd have to be desperate to do it for the money," Van Tine said. "I'd find other ways to make money."

Some students believe infertile couples should explore other alternatives.

"I think adoption should still be a priority, but I guess you can do whatever you want if you want to pay the money," said Maria Roditis, freshman in LAS.

Nuxoll said women who are able to cope with selling their eggs have the right to do so.

"We've used donor sperm for a long time already. As long as you think of it as a sell and not as a part of your persona, then a person can donate their eggs," she said. "A donor should meet their own ethical criteria."

Some women donate their eggs to help someone else, while some college women do it to pay for school, Nuxoll said.

"I know of many college students who do it for the money," she said. "There is one woman who was offered $23,000 for her eggs. She matched the recipients criteria perfectly ? over 5 (foot) 9 (inches), blond hair, blue eyes, with a GPA over 3.6."

Women contemplating donation should know about unsafe donation centers and the medical procedure egg donation entails, Nuxoll said.

"Students should research different donation sites before making a decision. They can ask a local infertility specialist who can refer them to a reputable donor site," she said. "They should understand the procedure before getting involved. Many women agree to egg donation before they fully understand, and they don't know what they're getting into."

Because a woman's ovaries only release one egg during ovulation, a donor is given hormonal injections to induce more egg production. This process is called controlled superovulation. When the eggs are mature, they are retrieved from the donor through the vagina with an ultra-sound guided needle.

Sagas Fuel Debate on Viking Settlements

By Guy Gugliotta
The Washington Post

Thorfinn Karlsefni, his wife, Gudrid, and 160 Viking colonists steered their three ships past a small island covered with birds, then sailed up a broad fjord to a likely campsite. "There were mountains and a pleasant landscape," the Sagas say. "The grass grew tall."

The colonists called the settlement Straumfjord – "Current Fjord" – and used it for three years before abandoning it, driven away by fierce native skraeling@ warriors who fought with bows and arrows from fleets of skin-covered war canoes. What – and where – was Straumfjord?

To date, the only confirmed Viking settlement on the continent that Leif Eriksson dubbed "Vinland" are the remains of eight buildings near the Canadian fishing village of L'Anse aux Meadows at the northernmost tip of modern-day Newfoundland.

But since the site's discovery in 1960, experts and Viking enthusiasts have tried to determine whether L'Anse aux Meadows is all there is, or whether there might be a second Viking settlement farther south – in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia in Canada, or maybe on Cape Cod, Mass., Narragansett Bay or New York Harbor.

The second settlement remains a subject of intense speculation today partly because of the "Greenlanders' Saga" and "Erik the Red's Saga," the Icelandic epics that describe the voyages of Viking exploration that began with Leif Eriksson's trip in the year 1000. The discovery of L'Anse aux Meadows authenticated what had been regarded as hyperbolic – and perhaps apocryphal – accounts.

The sagas mention three encampments in or near Eriksson's Vinland: Straumfjord, Leifsbuder (Leif's Camp) and Hop (Tidal Pool). One of these, and perhaps all of them, is L'Anse aux Meadows. Or maybe not.

Birgitta Wallace, L'Anse aux Meadows' archaeologist for the past 25 years, says Straumfjord is L'Anse aux Meadows, and that Leifsbuder is a composite of both Straumfjord and Hop, a temporary encampment that she thinks lies south across the Gulf of St. Lawrence on the coast of New Brunswick. Vinland is the Gulf region itself.

Hers is the conservative view. There was no second settlement, she said, because there were never enough people available to build one, but "I caution you," she added with a laugh, "not everybody buys that."

One who doesn't is Danish businessman Jorgen D. Siemonsen, who helps finance research to debunk fraudulent Viking finds in North America even as he searches for another settlement.

Based on the sagas' descriptions of climate, topography, currents and habitat, Siemonsen theorizes that Straumfjord was considerably south of L'Anse aux Meadows, probably around Narragansett Bay or the coast of Connecticut.

Most of Karlsefni's colonists were new immigrants with livestock. "They are bound to have built stables and barns, and to have fished with nets and net sinkers," Siemonsen said, but there is no evidence for any of this at L'Anse aux Meadows. Therefore, he said, there had to be another settlement.

The Age of the Vikings is generally reckoned to have begun in 793 A.D., when Norse raiders sacked the Lindisfarne monastery in England. Gentle farmers at home, the Vikings spent their summers for the next 250 years despoiling cities and towns throughout Europe.

Their great advantage were their elegantly shaped, single-sail wooden ships. "They were really versatile," said William W. Fitzhugh, director of the Smithsonian Institution's Arctic Studies Center. "They could be made beamier for the open Atlantic, without a lot of internal construction, and they handled magnificently." No one in their world could match them.

They were also master blacksmiths, and made utensils, tools and weapons from smelted iron. "They had iron-tipped arrows, broad-bladed axes, knives, hand daggers and swords," Fitzhugh said. "You could tell when they intended to attack, because their ships would bristle on the horizon from the sun on the steel."

In 870 A.D., the Vikings settled Iceland, and the Vinland Sagas begin there with a description of how a hot-tempered settler named Erik the Red took 14 ships to found the colony of Brattahlid on the southwestern coast of Greenland in 985. Fifteen years later, his son Leif reached Vinland – "Grape Land."

Scholars and archaeologists generally agree that L'Anse aux Meadows was probably a "gateway" settlement where voyagers rested, replenished and wintered in anticipation of more ambitious trips during the summer.

Air Conditioner Spread Fumes

By Oscar Corral and Steven Kreytak
Newsday

ROSLYN HEIGHTS, N.Y. – Investigators said Monday that the heating system in a Long Island home where six people died had been emitting carbon monoxide since last year, but became lethal when the air conditioning unit was turned on over the weekend.

With the heating and cooling units in the same small room, the air conditioner sucked in the poisonous fumes because the vent that should have allowed fresh air to circulate in the system was closed.

"It had been happening a long time," Nassau County homicide Detective Sgt. Robert Edwards said of the carbon monoxide seepage from the gas heat furnace. "This was the first time that it had reached deadly levels."

A carbon monoxide detector, which had been disabled by the homeowner, Andrei Kranz, because he thought it was a malfunctioning nuisance, was so saturated with the deadly gas that it shrieked constantly when armed, police said.

The First Alert alarm lay dormant Saturday night as the home's central air conditioner circulated fatal doses of the gas around to every bedroom in the house, killing six people including Kranz's daughter and parents.

The natural gas furnace and the central air conditioning unit shared the same closet-sized utility room in Kranz's home. Both units were running at the same time because the unit had not been turned off after last week's cooler weather, Edwards said.

The room's door was closed, as was a vent that was supposed to bring in fresh air from the outside. Police are still trying to determine why the vent was closed. Edwards said he believes it may have been the first time the air conditioner was turned on this year.

As the furnace was operating, the air conditioner struggling to find a source of air to circulate through the house and began pulling in the fumes from the utility room, which contained high levels of carbon monoxide, a byproduct of burning fuel. Because the fresh air vent was closed, carbon monoxide was circulated throughout the house instead.

The victims included Kranz's 2-year-old daughter, Simina; the girl's baby sitter, Emelia Dumitru, 58; Kranz's parents, Marcus Kranz, 86, and Victoria Kranz, 74, who were spending the night at their son's house because Simina was sick; and Emil and Maria Campeanu, 75 and 68, Romanian friends on vacation.

Bob Wheatley, a spokesman for First Alert, said the carbon monoxide alarm had been going off for a reason. "Even if someone had hit the reset button on the alarm, if the gas level is high enough, it's going to ignore the reset and continue to alarm because there is a dangerous level of carbon monoxide in the house," Wheatley said. "When a CO detector goes into alarm, you never ignore that."

Andrei Kranz's wife, Anca, a pediatrician, was in Romania at the time of the accident with her 18-year-old daughter from another marriage visiting family and trying to straighten out immigration papers for Dumitru, neighbors and friends said Monday.

Our Opinion
Microsoft Divided

(U-WIRE) MINNEAPOLIS — To resolve Microsoft's antitrust trial, the government recently decided to divide Microsoft into two distinct companies. During the court case, the government presented strong allegations against the company, suggesting that it purposely and unfairly stifled its competition. This behavior is harmful to a free market, which relies on innovation, often from smaller companies that lack the capital to wage war against giants. If the allegations are true, then in the interests of consumers and free enterprise, limitations must be placed on Microsoft.

Despite Microsoft's stronghold, some innovators still manage to develop competitive software. The small but growing support for the Linux operating system demonstrates that Microsoft cannot horde every niche of the market. The problem, however, is when a competitor grabs a market share large enough to get the attention of the mighty Microsoft. When Microsoft wants to market Internet Explorer as an alternative to Netscape, they merely package it with their operating system. This gives the company an undeserved advantage over its competitors. While the software industry thrives on grass-roots innovation, the software titan can overcome contenders without developing a technically superior product simply because it already developed the dominant operating system on the market. A company that can so easily defeat its rivals without providing a superior product only harms its customers.

In court, Gates seemed unable to remember the details of an alleged plan to join forces with Apple to undermine Sun Microsystems, despite strong evidence suggesting there was such a plan. Microsoft cannot be allowed to unfairly compromise its competitors in any case. Additionally, a government filing cites an e-mail by Chairman Bill Gates in which he allegedly told employees to redesign software to function better with Microsoft's own products than its rivals.

Critics argue that Microsoft's monopoly helps ensure compatibility between software packages. The theory is since Microsoft manufactures the most commonly used software, more applications will be compatible with each other. A fundamental characteristic of the technology industry is its ongoing effort to establish standards and compatibility among its many disparate parts, with or without a single monopoly governing the whole of the industry. All companies that want to stay in business must manufacture technology and software that is compatible with the current standards. In fact, if Microsoft made any effort to harm the competition by redesigning software to function less well with rival products, the Microsoft monopoly would actually be damaging what compatibility does exist. Maintaining compatibility and industry-wide standards should be a priority. The software industry requires both competition and cooperation.

The decision to break up Microsoft might resemble a punishment for being too successful, but the government is not punishing success, despite the claims of critics. It is defending consumers and the free market. A successful company like Microsoft cannot stand in the way of creativity and invention simply to protect its own assets. To defend itself, Microsoft must prove that it did not intend to directly harm competitors, regardless of the mounting evidence to the contrary.

Overindulgent protesting

It's typical of the right-wingers to show up at an event, make asses of themselves, and leave, their job done. Just the other week, a gentleman at a Student Government Association meeting decided to complain bitterly about "take your daughter to work and teach her to hate men day" because his mom never took him to work.

And what happened? He ended up a bitter Republican totally incapable of accepting the possibility that young girls being invited to workplaces isn't necessarily a part of the "giant lesbian conspiracy" or whatever the movement's being called these days.

Imagine my surprise when I got so wedged into a corner that I feel the need to write in support of that guy and his cronies.

Because the Republican Club, god bless them all, are really a bunch of cronies. I neither agree with their politics nor pretend too. Straight white males aren't suffering as much as they believe, kids shouldn't get handguns, gays should get to be married and women should have the right to choose.

However, there they are, up there in that office across from the Student Government Association, plotting out various ways to return America to the "good old days" when men worked and women cooked, and honestly, that's fine. They have every right to believe that, every right to subscribe the political beliefs that they see fit.

And even more so on this campus, as free-thinking liberals have a choking grasp on our politics. We hear about the suffering of the poor, the downtrodden, the desolate, the weak, the frozen, the lefties, and the commies. Everybody's a victim of the "system" and to, in any way, ally yourself with said system indicates that you're only part of the evil plot to keep us all down.

I learned about alliance with the system the other day when, in a Communications class, I had the out and out audacity to not automatically believe the majority belief of the classroom I was sitting in. Bold stuff, I know, but I really just don't believe that making puppy dog eyes at the media and meekly demanding fairer coverage will change a damn thing. Further, I'd suggest that complaining and bitching and moaning about the racial stereotypes in the media is ridiculous because everybody out there, be they black, white, gay, straight, female, male, whatever, is stereotyped by the media. Everybody.

Needless to say, the class believed otherwise, and I was told so, followed by the clapping of those surrounding me. So have I learned my lesson; don't ever suggest that the system will continue, don't dare challenge a large group of people, and don't ever expect the other side to remotely respect what you have to say when they're nothing but a bunch of brainwashed people incapable of actual thought, only the ability to recycle what two or three professors told them over and over.

Sam Wilkinson

But my example is for naught; who cares, other than the Communication majors who will waste my time sending me nasty emails telling me what a bad bad man I am; I was talking Republicans and I'm getting right back to that point. When it comes to supporting the party line, individuals like those that exist in the Republican club usually are great at it.

"We must maintain the system, the system is necessary, c'mon, please?" So says the typical Republican in a desperate attempt to maintain a system that has flaws.

Those flaws brought people to the Student Union steps last Friday to protest the Republican protest. While the Republicans were protesting Mumia Abu Jamal and attempting to show support for fallen police officers, the protestors booed during read prayers, blew out candles lit in memory of fallen officers and were generally nothing more than a petulant bunch of kids who knew, like Frankenstein once said in a paraphrased sort of way, that "System, Bad! Not-System, Good!"

But there's a point at which protest isn't protest; it's nothing more than disrespectful, and while I totally support people protesting Republicans, at what point will those kids who were out there acknowledge that it is possible that the other side has something to say?

Let's ignore the flyer that was sent out saying "Fry Mumia" because that was designed to be incendiary and easily achieved its goal as a bunch of pawns, or maybe some of those Communication majors, showed up to say that the Republicans were evil people, and, thus, a combative atmosphere was created. Perfect for a group desperate for attention.

Instead, there's the second half of the rally, the part about fallen police officers. The idea that kids would cop (heh) such an attitude about fallen police officers is just ridiculous. Officers go home at night, they have kids and wives and husbands and families. People love them. Nobody said they had an easy job or that they do it perfectly, but c'mon; for every questionable case, there are more straight up cases of bad people being jailed for doing bad things.

Or people simply breaking the law and police officers enforcing the rules. It isn't police officers that make the rules, they just enforce them, good bad or ugly. If the law says you can't make out in public, who has to enforce it, regardless of its stupidity? Certainly isn't the politicians that write the laws; it's those officers.

To boo a prayer or blow out a candle lit in memory of officers is crass, idiotic, and an absolute insult to the families of those officers that have died in the line of duty. It's as disrespectful as blowing out candles lit in memory of AIDS patients or cancer patients or soldiers or freedom fighters. Does pain somehow work differently for the families of police officers? Are they supposed to write off the death of their loved one because of the way they chose to pay the bills?

Those people who were booing or blowing out candles weren't thinking; they were being nothing more than a group of lemmings trained to think that police departments are awful places, thus doing a huge disservice to the thousands of officers they've never met and probably never will meet. In "fantasy land" these people believe that because Jamal might have been jailed incorrectly, the entire justice system is nothing more than a tremendous sham, a joke constructed merely to jail the incorrect people. Beyond that, they place the entirely unfair justice system on police officers, who are the lowest rung on the proverbial ladder.

Of course, that's something that people who are too stupid to realize that it is disrespectful to blow out candles lit to the memory of dead officers will probably never figure out. Their focus isn't on people, on families, or on people that have died; it is on a system that they're so hell bent on destroying that they ignore common courtesy.

Republicans are rarely right and fighting them to the gates of Hell is a holy and wonderful pursuit, but not if it means disrespecting those that have died supporting a system which they are required to defend. They can fight them about Jamal all they want, but disrespecting the dead is deflating their basic argument and is nothing more than insulting.

Help battered women
Ensure rights of victims

Domestic violence continues to be a vital problem in society but why does the legal system not recognize this dilemma? Every year, millions of women are killed as a result of domestic violence. Evidently, the number of women killed daily is not of paramount importance because the legal system neglects aiding the needs of the victims. I think it is time for the legal system to punish the offenders rather than the victims. The justice system needs to take domestic violent cases more seriously since the number of women killed continues to proliferate rapidly.

Wenda Moise

As a result of a domestic violence research project that I just recently conducted, each victim lamented that the legal abuse was the most detrimental stage. One woman recalled, "I demanded my rights, but the court said that there was no case." This is the exact phrase which I found most of these women crying out. The victims in this study repeatedly marked the legal abuse that accompanied the abuse from their partners. Are not these women receiving enough abuse from their partners? Why does the legal system need to contribute to the problem?

I think that certain laws need to be instituted to recognize the rights of domestic violence victims. In most domestic violence cases, women drop the case because they do not want to testify against their partners. Although it is of importance for these women to testify, they usually avoid testifying since they fear further abuse from their offenders. But however, the judicial system needs to administer a "no drop policy." This policy just basically assures that the offenders get prosecuted and get what they deserve. It would not allow the victims of domestic violence to drop a case once it has been reported to officials. Further, this policy would serve as a deterrent in domestic violence cases. Such a policy would definitely have offenders think twice before abusing their partners.

In some domestic violence cases, the victims are severely punished for trying to protect themselves. Today, the prison system holds millions of women who are serving time for killing their husbands due to the legal system concerns with protecting the offenders. In most of these cases, the victims take the matters into their own hands since the legal system fails at fostering the victims. But why should the victims of domestic violence suffer when it is the judicial system that purposely chooses to neglect administering full protection?

The justice system also operates in a biased fashion in terms of ignoring the lower class. One of the women that I interviewed deplored that "due to my financial status, the legal system ignored my plea for help extensively." Apparently, the underclass is severely deprived of receiving legal aid. If you have been domestically abused and categorized as lower class, then the chances of obtaining legal aid are pretty slim.

I think it is time that we write to legislators about instituting policies to protect victims of domestic violence. Since the legal system fails at protecting the victims, it is our duty to reassure that they recognize that domestic violence is a serious problem. It is affecting our community intensively by killing or locking up innocent lives, and the only victims that find legal aid are usually financially well off. Poor victims' lives are as important are rich victims' lives. One way to abolish the disparities is to introduce new policies to deal with the offenders. It is dehumanizing that victims of domestic violence have come as far as being imprisoned for taking matters into their own hands, but if the legal system is more concerned with protecting the lives of the offenders, then what is left for the abused to do?

Last call for Boomer

So it ends. After three long years here, I'm finally getting out of here with a degree. Of course it's an English degree, and therefore about as worthless as Weimar currency in 1920. Hard to believe I actually paid forty grand for the damn thing. But c'est la vie, as they say in Sweden. God bless the Swedes.

My graduation couldn't have come at a better time. Everywhere I turn, omens tell me it's time to get out of here. My apartment is being devoured by ants. My landlord is beginning to suspect that I am in fact not Beth Lombardi, the name on my lease. Most depressing of all, Amherst is slowly becoming New Jersey. The sorostitutes with their platform heels, black pants, and dark sunglasses, the dudeguys ("Yah dude!") in their white baseball caps cruising along in their SUVs. Lately there's even been an alarming number of mullets. It's all going to hell in a go-cart.

Boomer Pinches

So I'm off to Australia, which is literally as far away from UMass as you can get. Australia seems like a wonderful place, inhabited by criminals and freakishly dangerous creatures with poison and sharp teeth. I suppose it's possible that I'll get eaten by a crocodile or murdered by outlaws. But at least I'll never have to write another 25-page term paper.

There is nothing more shameless in the world of publishing than gratuitous name-dropping. But what the hell. The following people have all loaned me money, bought me dinner, and kept me out of jail at one point or another. The least I can do is give a shout-out. Anyway, they're probably the only people reading this. And after three years writing here, I have nothing interesting left to say. So in no particular order:

Mike Garelick and Randy Kovac have earned international fame as a crime-fighting duo. But what their loyal fans might not know is that back in 1998, they joined forces with me to become the Frequently Asked Questions, which remains to date the losingest team in Haigis Hoopla's history. We lost three games out of two in the Couch Potato division. Sounds impossible but check the records. It happened.

Amanda Gordon, waitress extraordinaire, has always been good to me, though she disappeared six weeks ago and no one seems to know where she is. Among her many talents, she is a gourmet chef, capable of cooking anything except grilled cheese. Her grilled cheese tastes like dried-out Play-Doh and should be considered lethal.

Not to be overlooked is her former thespian housemate Jana, who can be seen off-Broadway this fall in Jesus Christ Pornstar, and who once cooked me a wonderful chicken dish.

Anyone I lived with in IA deserves mention: Jenn, Rachel, Maya, Ryan, Matt, Brendan, Ethan, Paul, Jay, Katie, etc. (too damn many of them).

Rich, who is currently doing time for stealing bicycles from Northampton.

Kenyon King, now the premier salesman at Yes Computers, was instrumental in my escape from Amsterdam. Were it not for him I would still be over there, doomed to become someone else's hallucination.

Lee Phelan was with me in London, where we were accosted by the Turkish terrorists who stormed the Greek Embassy in London; they confiscated our film and ran us out with death threats. It was also Lee that first introduced me to The Dude.

My three lusciously sexy housemates: Katie Batchelder can be seen on page six of the April 16th issue of The Los Angeles Times about to be arrested by a line of Washington, D.C. riot police. Fortunately we got her out. Without Katie, our apartment would have fallen apart even sooner than it did. She also has the endearing habit of launching bottle rockets in the house at 4 AM, just to keep the rest of us on our toes. Deborah Adler is a master glass-blower and a collector of obscene rubber puppets which she uses to frighten off small children. Contrary to reports, we were never in a fight. Heartbreaker Emily Heiple, writer and punk rock diva, can be seen in her weekly syndicated advice column, "True Dat," in which she tells it like it is and sticks it to The Man. Props also go out to honorary housemates Andrea, Maggie, and Kara.

Tricia Siudut is the only girl I know who can get away with wearing a cowboy hat. Her paintings of the darker parts of life, particularly the Dangerous Midgets series, can be seen on display at the Karl Hungus Gallery in SoHo.

The staff of Short Cuts magazine (plus Bill Peters). The new issue will be out on the streets this Monday, for those of you eagerly awaiting.

Kathleen Banks and I have made more late night coffee runs than I can recall. The woman is a dangerously violent criminal, but she has a lovely singing voice.

Chris Lucas was more brilliant than any of us remember and God rest his soul (those of you at home know him better as the Cappa). Alas, he was found crushed beneath a ton of parking tickets and midget porn tapes which had apparently been accumulating in his closet. He is survived by his lovely wife Emily (who, as you all know, recently won the 14th Annual Smith College Jello Wrestling Tournament), and their son, Baby Jeebis.

Amelia is and will always be fascinated with robots.

Frenchy, Jess, and the whole ABC crowd, who ensured that, if nothing else, there was always one place to go and get drunk.

Andrew and Troy became irritable and became DJs.

My neighbors Alan, Jake, and Ryan, who are masters of multi-media entertainment, ultimate Frisbee, and beer, respectively. Also the enchanting Becky Bowen, who has done much to further cow-human relations, and her animal studies cohorts Alicia, Jess, and Cici.

The beautiful and brilliant Jennie Hayes, who ran off to Australia but we love her anyway.

Also thanks to the following professors, who made the tuition worth it:

The wise and decadent David Lenson;

Martin Espada, who did the impossible and taught me how to write poetry;

Nick Montemorano, a TA but you wouldn't know it, whose encouragement of my writing was invaluable;

Emmi, also a TA, who actually made French fun for a while.

Thanks also to all my editors, particularly poor Rob, who have put up with my late articles without shooting me.

Well, that's it. I should probably have something clever to say, some final anecdote or some such, but it's hot and I'm late for lunch. Thanks to all those readers I encountered from time who stuck my articles on your doors, bought me a beer, or made me dinner. It's been fun. Godspeed, good luck, and all that. Don't take wooden nickels.

The Dude abides.

Long set, good times

Pat McGee Band
Pearl Street Night Club
May 4, 2000

By David Siegel
Collegian Staff

On Wednesday night, May 3, the Pat McGee Band brought its special brand of happy-rock to Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton. This second Pearl Street appearance of the school year brought out a strong following of mostly college age fans. PMB is on tour now in support of their newest album, "Shine" which was released at the beginning of April. The band has grown rapidly since their inception in 1996, taking a grass roots approach to touring and exposing people to their music. They draw fans from both the jam band circuit as well as from larger acoustic acts like the Dave Matthews Band and Ben Harper.

Going into the show, I was expecting to hear many songs off the new album as well as some old favorites, plus a good cover or two if we were lucky. Sure enough, they jumped out of the gates with a spirited "Passion" with its chorus demonstrating how passionate this six-piece ensemble really is about their music. Next up was "Girl from Athens", giving an indication of their southern rock roots. They continued the fast pace with "Gibby" until finally giving themselves a break with "Nobody Knows" before hitting up the new album with a trio of songs; "Lost" into the happy "Minute" and eventually leading into "I Know".

The entire band left the stage except for guitarist Al Walsh, who stayed and performed a solo "Life is Grand". Walsh, whose voice gives a strong resemblance to that of James Taylor gave a strong intimate performance. Al was than joined back on stage by keyboardist Jon Williams for another slower, melodic tune before the rest of the band joined in for another barrage from the new album. This time they played "Haven't Seen for a While", displaying Pat McGee's sweet and gentle melodies, "What Ya Got" and "Hero", an upbeat song with a solid bass line.

Pat, Al and Jon left the stage finally giving the rhythm a chance to "Shine". They most certainly did not disappoint. Standing out was the superb bass jamming of John Small playing his miraculous six-stringed bass. His fast fingers and solid technique made me wonder why he doesn't solo more often. The entire show thus far was comprised entirely of original songs, so the crowd was hoping for a cover to end the set.

Although PMB has been playing fewer covers as of late, they are still known for popping out with solid cover material to break up their sometimes-monotonous style. This time, they broke out into the familiar guitar licks of the Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young's classic "Southern Cross", once again showing their southern rock heritage. After a short break, they came back on and played an awesome "Runaway" with its layered chorus harmonies and strong beat.

This was a great show through and through, impressing me again with the band's incredible talent and unprecedented songwriting skills of Pat McGee. The band promised another return trip to the area this summer, so please check them out while you have the chance before they begin selling out larger venues.

Cannes offering broad artistic spectrum

By John Anderson
Newsday

If you're a film director, film distributor, film festival programmer, agent, actor, model or maybe even waitress, the center of the universe this Wednesday evening becomes a sunny little town on the French Riviera.

The only question: Which center of the center is your center?

The Cannes Film Festival, now 53 years old and showcasing international cinema from May 10-21, prides itself in offering something for everyone – even if, in defiance of the small-d democratic ethos of most festivals, it is strictly "for film professionals only."

That won't stop hordes from clogging the Croisette hoping for the next Jean-Claude van Damme sighting, but variety is the spice of the Cannes experience. Younger audiences, for instance, will be intrigued to know that Virginie Ledoyen, French starlet and center of "The Beach" will be the festival's master (mistress?) of ceremonies this year. Those with longer memories might be tickled to learn that Jean-Luc Godard will be presenting a 12-minute short on the history of the century titled Origins of the 21st Century. Those with punctuality issues could be relieved to know that as of last week, Hong Kong's Wong Kar-wei was reportedly still shooting his new film, In the Mood for Love, which is in the Cannes competition later this week.

Those with their ear to the political rail might be interested in the fate of one Olivier Barrot, a former journalist who was to have taken over the Cannes Festival's artistic direction from Gilles Jacob, who is to follow Pierre Viot as the festival's president next year. Last week, French newspapers reported that Barrot had been dismissed; "miscasting," according to sources, was how the festival was portraying his adieu.

For social/cultural bon vivants, the big fromage at Cannes this year has to be the annual fund-raising gala/auction on behalf of AMFAR, the American Federation for AIDS Research. Moved to a larger venue than last year (when Miramax honcho Harvey Weinstein – for a good cause – tried to get model Elle Macpherson to change clothes onstage), the event is to be hosted by Elizabeth Taylor and Elton John. A spokeswoman for Miramax, which is behind the event as usual this year, said that the fashion show planned by co-sponsor Victoria's Secret – featuring supermodels Stephanie Seymour, Naomi Campbell and Heidi Klum, all being whisked to the festival via Concorde from New York – had helped the gala sell out in record time.

For the diplomacy-minded, it's no surprise that the festival's opening-night film will be a French production – Vatel, by Roland Joffi, starring Girard Depardieu and Uma Thurman, among others. But that the film is an English-language French production – Mon Dieu!

"If you go by money, it's French," said Henri Behar, film critic at French Vogue, former cultural correspondent for Le Monde, the main moderator of news conferences for competition films at the festival and author of Hollywood on the Riviera: The Inside Story of the Cannes Film Festival (William Morrow).

"But Roland Joffi is British," he said. "Depardieu is French. Uma Thurman is American. It's the story about a French chef. Ages ago, the festival made a big hoopla about whose flag was flying over a film, but with the realities of international co-production, it's really no longer an issue."

Hollywood, however: Now there's an issue. Why, for example, isn't Mi-2 –Mission: Impossible 2, the no-brainer marketing bonanza of this summer – playing at Cannes?

"The feeling among the studios is that if you play at Cannes, then what? You're going to open up against the kind of films that open Memorial Day?" Behar said. "That kind of movie isn't a festival movie. So they don't come, unless they're not entirely sure about the marketing – or the director is very pro-festival, or international. E.T. was the perfect example: It played Cannes two weeks before it came out in the States (in 1982) and was a runaway hit.

"But," he added, "the marketing arm of Hollywood has become a bit more rigid than it used to be." And the willingness to take risks has all but evaporated. Why take a chance on bad word of mouth at Cannes when you're hitting the American market in just a few weeks?

"A lot of the question about the studios has to do with the time of the year," said Richard Pena, program director of the Film Society of Lincoln Center and an 18-year veteran of Cannes. "Europeans aren't as big moviegoers during the summer as Americans are, and the movies we tend to go to are the summer blockbuster kind of films, which aren't really appropriate for Cannes. The artier, more challenging fare that comes out of Hollywood tends to be ready for the fall. So these films aren't ready, and that's part of the reason why they're not there.

"There still seems to be enough glamour at Cannes," Pena added, "depending on the given year. But I think it's a conundrum for the festival that the artier Hollywood releases simply aren't ready."

There are films willing to "risk it," of course, and studios, too. Touchstone (Disney) is sending the new Coen Brothers movie, O Brother Where Art Thou? with George Clooney, Holly Hunter and John Turturro, (the title is a reference to Preston Sturges' "Sullivan's Travels," but the film is based on Homer's Odyssey). Miramax is bringing Kenneth Bramagh's adaptation-with-music of Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost the Merchant Ivory production of Henry James' The Golden Bowl and The Yards, by James Gray (Little Odessa). "Nurse Betty," which marks the first time that Neil LaBute (In the Company of Men) is directing someone else's script, arrives courtesy of USA Films/Universal. Also being shown at a special screening, out of competition, will be A Conversation With Gregory Peck, by two-time Oscar-winning documentarian Barbara Kopple. And adding to the luster of the festival will be Peck himself.

Multiple choice made easy.

Ward also broke the A-10 Championship record of 4,525 set by former Ram Jessica Lincoln. Ward's mark, second best all-time for the University, also broke her previous career best of 4,516.

While nowhere near as ferocious as in the heptathlon, the Franklinville, NY native also placed in the long jump with a distance of 18'2.25". Though good enough for second, local favorite April Byrd easily launched herself to first with a leap of 20'0.25".

Sharing in Ward's energy on the first day of competition were fellow seniors Liz Sheptyck and Giselle Nicholas. Both seniors won their events, the 10,000 meters and the hammer throw, respectively, and both were rewarded not only with victory but also by being named to the All-Conference Team.

Sheptyck ran ahead of all others in the 10,000 meters, breaking the tape with a time of 38:13.80. The time was a comfortable 20.77 over runner-up Kathy Heable of LaSalle.

Two fellow members of the Maroon and White also garnered themselves top-ten finishes. Senior Monica Elmore crossed the line in eighth place, while freshman Elizabeth Mitchell ended up in tenth place.

Like Sheptyck, Nicholas was only one a trio of Minutewomen to do well in the hammer throw. The senior hurled the hammer a distance of 148'06". While the throw was good enough for victory, host-school Hokie Paula Allan was a mere two inches behind at 148'04".

Further back for UMass were junior Shannon Hamilton and sophomore Nellie Giffune, rounding out the top ten with ninth and tenth place, respectively. Hamilton launched the hammer for an even 124', while Giffune's throw trailed behind at 108'10".

New Jersey native Chrystal Murphy put forth a solid effort in the 100-meter high hurdles, coming up just short of victory. First place went to local favorite Jennifer Cook with a time of 14.59 seconds. Murphy, a junior, placed just behind with a final time of 14.78.

While not as victorious as it was in the 10,000 meters, UMass welcomed solid performances in the 3,000 meters. Led by sophomore Kristin Ciswoski, the Minutewomen got three runners into the top ten. The Granite-Stater, Ciswoski put forth a yellow-ribbon worthy run of 10:06.76. Her time was just.12 seconds off the second place finisher, Tara Storage of Dayton.

Rounding out the top ten for UMass was an eighth place performance by senior Sharon Tillotson of 10:25.10 and tenth place finish by junior Melissa Henderson with a time of 10:32.12.

While unable to defend their 1999 A-10 title, a solid third-place performance by UMass was the first in series of three championships. This Friday and Saturday the Minutewomen travel to Dedham to participate in the annual New England Championships. The following weekend the Minutewomen will venture to New Jersey for the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC) Championships to be held at Princeton University.

claim a small victory in the tie, since the Rhode Island Rams were favored for the runner-up spot. Although the Minutemen placed second in the A-10 meet last year, O'Brien felt that this year's less experienced squad would be faced with a much tougher challenge.

Fortunately for the Maroon and White, the squad was able to make up the underdog differential due to some fireworks from a trio of performers –senior Vic Morency, junior Marc Sylvander and senior Ben Baraldi.

Once again, Morency stole the spotlight, winning two of his three events. He nabbed first in Saturday's javelin competition (217'9") and placed fifth in Sunday's shot put event (48'10"), but it was during the discus throw that Morency raised eyebrows. His toss of 182'6" was good enough to break the previous A-10 meets record of 172'2", which was set by Morency last year.

Not to be excluded from the record shattering, Sylvander awed the crowds with his performance in the 400-meter. His first-place time of 47.30 was the fastest In A-10 meet history. The time was also the best UMass performance in the 400-meter to date.

Baraldi also fared well over the weekend, turning in a second-place finish in the 110-meter high hurdles with a time of 14.44. The time was a personal best for Baraldi, and was good enough to jettison the senior to second on the UMass all-time list.

Despite the fact that the jumping events have been considered the squad's Achilles' heel, two rookie jumpers turned in admirable performances. Freshman Tony Or.tega placed second in the long jump with a distance of 22'02.25 while freshman Reggie Oden placed third in the triple jump, with a 44'11.75 leap.

Next up for the Minutemen is the New England Championships to be held May 12-13, followed by the IC4A Championships which will take place the next week.

■ Faessler

of her catcher. "Before this year, you never really knew what you were going to get from her [at the plate]. She might blast a ball over the wall, or she might swing and miss at the next five pitches."

As Faessler slowly adapted to her broken finger, she began to play her best softball of the season. Two days after her awkward strikeout against Boston College, Faessler responded strongly against Brown, throwing out two base runners and tallying three hits – one of which was her first home run of the season. She also started to find humor in her injury.

"If I had known (that I would hit this well), I would have broken my finger a long time ago," she said with a smile that had returned to her face after a brief absence. "It wasn't that bad today."

The following two days of rest would become crucial.

Less than a week after Sortino revealed Faessler's injury, the two embraced on the pitchers mound for what seemed like a small eternity. It was Senior Day, and Faessler was about to play her final home game for UMass.

Neither had any idea of the hug that would follow two hours later. In just one at bat, Faessler erased any bitterness about her injury-plagued senior season.

Fittingly, It was her final one.

UMass was in the midst of sweeping Rhode Island for the regular-season A- 10 Conference Championship. The Minutewomen had won the first game of the double-header via the mercy rule, 13-1. In game two, UMass led 8-0 in the last of the fifth inning as Faessler came to bat. Two more runs, and, again, the mercy rule would end the game.

With two outs, and a runner on first base, Faessler walked to the plate. As she dug into the batter's box, one finger could not grip the bat. It was coated in a brown, temporary cast.

Faessler already had three hits on the afternoon – including a three-run double – and jumped on the first pitch. In seconds, her line-drive shot had cleared the left-center field fence. Her final home at-bat wasn't only a long ball, it was also a walk-off home run. The game was over, and Faessler, Sortino and the rest of the Minutewomen were first stunned.

Just seconds later, they scurried out to home plate, offering a hero's welcome to their bruised but triumphant captain. Her indomitable Queens spirit – one that Sortino, a Yonkers natives shares – had produced one of the more memorable moments in the recent UMass softball history.

"It was perfect... it almost didn't seem real," Faessler said, eyes watering a bit. "It felt storybook. Perfect."

For the first time all season, Sortino did not talk to her team after the contest, allowing it to savor the moment. Not one to break from her critical post-game mode, Sortino jogged to the outfield fence, and found the child who caught Faessler's home run.

Two minutes later, Sortino emerged with the ball... and with 12 grammar school girls, all waiting for the autographs and team posters that Sortino promised them in return for the memento.

"That was unbelievable. It took me a second or two to realize that the game was over," Sortino said of Faessler's blast, as she handed out high fives for each child. "It was probably one of the few days this season that she's felt good physically. This may be the best day of her career. She just did it all. That was a very, very nice way for her to play this game."

And without uttering the sarcastic "I told you so" saying, Sortino turned to a group of three reporters, smiled and spoke.

"You don't need that finger," she said in reference to Faessler's wound. "It's all in the wrist."

DAN SANTELLA/COLLEGIAN

Despite a broken finger, Nikki Faessler smacked a home run in her final collegiate at bat in Amherst in an 8-0, mercy rule win over Rhode Island to capture UMass' sixth consecutive A-10 title.

V-Ball's Meyers named MAIWA scholar-athlete

Add another accomplishment to the many that Jill Meyers has achieved in her four years at the University of Massachusetts.

The senior was recently named the Massachusetts Association for Intercollegiate Athletics for Women (MAIAW) Division I Scholar-Athlete Award recipient.

A native of Huntington Beach, CA, Meyers has also received the most prestigious award that can be given to a UMass athlete, the Female Athlete of the Year. She was presented the award at a ceremony on April 20 at the Copley Plaza Hotel in Boston. She was chosen by a committee that consisted of members of the Alumni Association.

At the ceremony, Meyers seemed wide-eyed at receiving the honor. Before Meyers got a chance to accept the award her aunt, Ann Meyers, one of the most recognized names in women's athletics, spoke to the crowd about what it is to achieve and what it is like once one reaches his or her goals.

"Don't let what you 'can't do' get in the way of what you can do," the elder Meyers said.

The captain of the volleyball team, Meyers maintains a 3.84 grade point average (GPA) double-majoring in English and political science. Her academic standing also allows her to be a member of the Phi Beta Kappa, and she is a candidate for the Rhodes and Marshall Scholarships.

In addition to her accomplishments on the court, Meyers has spread herself thin with her community service duties. She is a volunteer for the Western Massachusetts Department of Youth Services as well as the local Boys and Girls club.

For her efforts on and off the court, the senior was named one of Glamour magazine's "Top 10 College Women."

game, thanks to underclassmen like Amy Black, Megan Perry and Anne Dethloff stepping up."

Saturday's war with Princeton was highly anticipated by the Minutewomen who had fallen to the Tigers in three regular-season showdowns including the final of the Eastern Tournament. And much like that forgettable game, this weekend's contest started out with UMass unable to capitalize on a number of prime scoring opportunities.

Grogan got things started for the Maroon and White by stealing an errant outlet pass and dishing ahead to Chassy, who was mobbed in front of the Tiger goal to set up a 4-meter penalty shot for UMass. Grogan's ensuing attempt clanked harmlessly off the left post; however, drawing a collective groan from the UMass faithful in attendance.

The ejection of Princeton's Alina Brown at the 6:04 mark of the first gave the Minutewomen another chance to get on the board early, but Clement's skip on a wide-open look once again bound only the left post. Tiger Cassie Nichols then made the misses hurt worse by employing a nifty spin move in the hole to beat Sinkwich and draw first blood for Princeton.

"I was like 'oh no, here we go again,'" said McOsker. "Just like last week against them, we totally dominated at the beginning and they were not able to score the first goal."

Grogan wasted little time righting the Maroon and White ship, putting a shot past Tiger keeper Goga Vukmirovic off a rotation play on the right wing to tie the game at 1-1. Princeton's Katherine Kinmiller answered just before the end of the first with a hard liner from the point, and it wasn't until the 5:27 mark of the second that Chassy leveled the score with a shot from the right side.

"Marci Hupp, in my opinion, had the most outstanding tournament of anyone," McOsker said. "Not just by scoring, but by shutting down the best 2-meter players in the country."

But the Aztecs proved that their 26-5 regular-season record was no fluke, as goals from Whitney Winlow and Casey Finnegan evened the score at 2-2. The teams remained locked until a mere 11 seconds remained in the first half, when Grogan powered through the SDSU defense and socked home UMass' third goal.

The Minutewomen would hold a 3-2 edge until the closing minutes of the third quarter, when Aztec 2-meter Larisa Baltgalvis shoved away from Grogan in the hole set and flipped a backhand past Sinkwich. But the desire of the underdog Maroon and White simply wouldn't be denied, as California native Perry fired a perfectly-placed shot under the left arm of SDSU keeper Curran Tegan to put UMass ahead to stay, 4-3. The Minutewomen put on an absolute clinic of team defense over the fourth quarter, enduring a double kick-out of Hupp and Grogan and numerous desperate adjustments by Aztec coach Carin Crawford to prevail and capture fifth place.

"The entire team, top-to-bottom, played excellent defense," McOsker said. "Sarah Newell was matched up against the team's best driver, who had scored six or seven goals [on Saturday] and she didn't let her score once. But if I had to choose an MVP, it would go to the entire team."

One player that did receive a higher degree of recognition was Grogan, who earned a spot on the All-Tournament first team with her five-goal performance on the weekend.

The National Championship ended up in the hands of UCLA, which blasted the Trojans 11-4 in Sunday's final. But the talk of the tournament was undoubtedly UMass, which garnered accolades from nearly every other program for its unlikely top-five run. By the end of Sunday's action, the Maroon and White's reserve "posse" of Megan Thompson, Rosie Baker and Lizzy Boyle was leading scores of newly won-over UMass fans in chants and cheers.

"People keep coming up to me and saying 'this is the best thing that could have happened for water polo,'" McOsker said. "I feel like I'm in the movie Hoosiers."

UMass to see what's in Storrs v. UConn

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

The words UConn and UMass are synonymous with rivalry, and nothing less than a very heated exchange between the top two softball teams in New England can be expected today at 4:00 p.m. when the Minutewomen travel down to Storrs for a non-conference matchup.

If this game is anything like the last meeting between the two schools, a single contest in Amherst on April 27, then it should be a treat for both fans and players alike. That game came down to the wire, as the Maroon and White built an early 5-1 lead behind a pair of two-run homers by Brandi Cross and Teri Rooney, and then held on for the win after witnessing a furious sixth inning Husky rally that plated three runs and brought the game dangerously close to extra innings.

The Minutewomen put the game in the seventh and closed Jen Hadley came into the game in the seventh and closed the door on the UConn rally, picking up her first collegiate save in the process.

This game is taking place at two different points in the season for the two softball powerhouses, as the Huskies are hoping to vent some frustration after falling in the finals of the Big East Tournament to Notre Dame 7-0, while the Minutewomen are trying to tune up for their conference tournament, a three day event at the New Softball Complex in Amherst starting this Thursday.

"[Today] we start the biggest week of the season," said head coach Elaine Sortino, a veteran manager that has spent the last 21 seasons at the helm of the Minutewomen. Today's game will mark the 1000th time that she will lead her ball club out onto the field.

UMass has been playing extraordinary of late, having won its last seven outings and 17 of the last 18. Last weekend, on Senior Day, the Maroon and White showed why they have won six consecutive conference titles by destroying Rhode Island, 13-0 and 8-0, in two mercy rule contests. The lone senior on the team, steady catcher Nikki Faessler, had a career day, going 4-4 at the plate with a two doubles, seven RBI, and monster shot to left center that cleared the fence for a home run with room to spare.

On a day in which winning the Atlantic 10 regular season Championship and watching Faessler culminate her fine collegiate career could have been enough for a great softball day, but Cross matched these and more by snapping the seven year old home run record of eight with a lined shot to the opposite field. To make this all the more amazing, Cross is only a freshman and will have three more years to work her way into the Massachusetts record books.

"It's good to get it over with," said Cross, "but we will still be back next year and it's going to keep getting better and better."

Unlike UMass, which has been crushing the ball out of the park at a torrid pace, UConn relies mostly on pitching and defense for its 36-17 (12-4 Big East) record. Barbara Cook leads a staff that does not have a single pitcher with an ERA over 2.00, going 21-6 on the year with a minuscule 1.15 ERA. Megan Biddle plays second fiddle to Cook, but still has nine wins and a 1.69 ERA to go along with eight losses.

The Husky batting order is not as powerful or dangerous as that of the Minutewomen, but it is a strong lineup nonetheless. Things all start out with leadoff hitter Jessica Yanosy, who is pacing the team with .333 average and has done her job by scoring 34 runs. Second baseman Lisa Girolamo (.305, 4 HR, 30 RBI), first baseman Abbie Link (.285, 4 HR, 30 RBI) and catcher Jamine Blesoff (.279, 2 HR, 20 RBI) form the meat of the order and are responsible for driving Yanosy home.

Coaching the Huskies will be another veteran skipper, Karen Mullins. She is one of the few people that has almost as much experience as Sortino, and has helped the Huskies to 511-233-4 record over the past 16 years.

DAN SANTILLO/COLLEGIAN

The UMass softball team will look to continue their winning ways when they battle UConn in a tune-up for the upcoming Atlantic 10 Tournament.

Cinderella glory

Water polo rocks Nationals with highest finish ever

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

INDIANAPOLIS, IN – It has been said that a winner is someone who saves his or her best performance for when it counts the most.

Ladies and gentlemen, we have a winner.

The No. 12 Massachusetts women's water polo team shattered all expectations at this year's Collegiate I National Championship Tournament, stunning a trio of higher seeded programs en route to a fifth-place finish at the IUPUI Natatorium. The Minutewomen shocked No. 5 San Jose State 8-4 in Friday's opening round, then gave the Trojans of No. 4 USC a scare before falling in a 10-7 thriller. UMass went on to exorcise some regular-season demons by upsetting No. 8 Princeton 9-6 on Saturday, and finished off the weekend by rolling over No. 6 San Diego State 4-3 on Sunday.

The Maroon and White's finish is the best in school history at the National Tournament. The team also matched its best record ever by finishing 31-9 on the season.

"Placing fifth is basically the same as winning a National Championship for us," said UMass coach Dan McOsker. "If you consider the operating budgets and scholarship money that the top four programs have, they are really on another level. That's why what we've done is so unbelievable."

UMass' first round showdown with San Jose State (20-17) began on a rather sour note for the Minutewomen. Spartan Inna Fedoseyeva won the opening swim-off and rocketed down the pool alone, capping her breakaway by beating UMass keeper Dana Sinkwich bottom-left to open scoring.

The Minutewomen answered less than 30 seconds later behind a goal from freshman Kelly Chassy, but SJSU returned the favor via a Dottie West hole-set score to retake the lead. Whereas the teams' regular-season meeting on March 14 had unfolded in a scoreless first half, the opening action Friday saw two goalkeepers struggling to stop a flood of scoring.

"At the beginning, I just didn't feel warmed up," Sinkwich said. "I hadn't been in goal for four days, after all. But the whole team really stepped up defensively."

As the Maroon and White defense began to tighten up, the offense cut loose and peppered SJSU goalie Lisa Greenfield. Chassy let loose with a rocket from the left that struck paydirt and knotted the score at 2-2, after which teammate Claudia Clement took a dry pass on the right wing at the 3:40 mark and lofted a lob shot past the Spartan keeper to stake UMass to its first lead. A dynamic steal by senior Laurie Edwards put the Minutewomen right back on the attack, and 2-meter Marci Hupp made the Spartans pay with a vicious backhand goal to beat the shot clock and give her team a 4-2 lead with 2:55 to play in the first quarter.

"The entire team had a ton of intensity during this game," Chassy said. "There weren't any real individual standouts; we really played a great game as a team. It was intensity, but it was fun intensity."

The second quarter saw the Minutewomen extend their lead even further behind more heroics from their senior stars. Clement capitalized on a man-up opportunity by taking a wet pass from teammate Katie Grogan and beating Greenfield top right for her second goal of the game, and Chassy powered through the Spartan defense two minutes later to set up a 2-meter chip shot by Grogan that padded the UMass cushion to 6-2.

SJSU's West gave the Spartans a shot of redemption on the next Maroon and White possession, picking Amy Black's pocket and starting a break the other way that Fedoseyeva finished off with her second score of the game. That left the score at 6-3 heading into halftime, and left the underdog Minutewomen thinking upset all the way.

"At halftime, I said in my head that we were going to win," Chassy said. "But we knew that we had to keep it up."

The Spartans made a push to close the gap in the opening minutes of the second half, as junior 2-meter Christy Taylor unleashed a backhand from the hole set that the sprawling Sinkwich couldn't reach. But with the UMass lead whittled down to 6-4, Hupp made perhaps the statement of the first round and effectively put SJSU away for good. The senior from Ohio uncorked a missile from the point for her second goal of the game, then followed up less than two minutes later with a majestic lob from the right side that Greenfield could only helplessly watch land in the Spartan net. Hupp's improbable shot completed a hat trick, but more importantly, spelled the end of San Jose State's title hopes.

"Never once have I ever taken a lob shot. But I saw it, it was there, so I took it," Hupp said. "I watched the tape of our first game against them three times, and there was no doubt in my mind that we could beat these guys."

The UMass defense took over down the stretch, and Sinkwich finished with eight saves in the 8-4 final.

The defending National Champion Trojans were next up for the Minutewomen, and McOsker's troops seemed eager to prove that their first round upset of the five seed was no fluke. But Coach Jovan Vavic's USC squad charged out hard from the opening whistle and immediately set UMass back on its heels with two quick goals, prompting McOsker to call a timeout at the 5:19 mark of the first to try and calm his team down.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

The twelth-seeded Minutewomen shocked the five, six and eight seeds en route to an unprecedented fifth-place finish at this year's National Championships in Indianaoplis, IN.

"The key when you're an underdog is to come out and take an early lead," McOsker said. "But they're defending champs for a reason, and that just didn't happen."

The Minutewomen showed world-class composure after the timeout, calmly resetting their offense and drawing a double kick-out of USC's Jennifer Durley and Shelli Tinza. Hupp then took advantage of the two-player advantage by rifling home her fourth goal of the tourney and slicing the Trojan lead in half.

USC showed off its international talent on its subsequent possession, as German National Team member Nina Wengst outmuscled Hupp in the hole set and blasted home her second score of the game. Clement responded almost immediately with a lob from way outside that beat both the shot clock and USC keeper Kendra Browne, but Trojan Aniko Pelle answered right back from the left wing with 1:06 to go in the first. Clement would again provide the UMass response, this time via a perfectly placed skip shot, but USC would get the quarter's last laugh from a Tinza bullet that capped the opening frame scoring at 5-3, Trojans.

"Giving up five first-quarter goals is what killed us," McOsker said. "They have so many national-level players from other countries on their team, you really can't allow them to get up on you early like that."

The first three minutes of the second quarter saw more domination by USC's foreign contingency, as Wengst simply overpowered UMass' hole set defense and racked up two more goals. Hungarian Pelle then pushed the Trojan lead to five, 8-3, with a nasty skip shot from the point that the screened out Sinkwich couldn't get to.

But rather than lose its cool with less than a minute to go before the half, UMass dug in and earned a second double kick-out. Chassy made USC pay with a low liner through the Trojan zone that cut the UMass deficit to 8-4.

"We weren't going to let them push us around," said junior Sarah Newell. "We just kept feeding off of each other and getting our intensity up. The key was to view them as just another team, not as the defending champs."

The two teams traded goals during a flurry of third quarter shots, and a Hupp shuck-and-shoot move in the 2-meter at the 4:20 mark left the Trojans nervously eyeing the 9-6 score. Neither squad could gain the upper hand throughout the remainder of the third set, and it wasn't until the 2:40 mark of the fourth that Wengst finally smashed the stalemate with her fifth goal of the game. UMass roared back twenty seconds later behind a Mattie Newell skip shot from the point, but 10-7 was as close as the Minutewomen would come to upsetting the Trojans.

"We kept saying in the huddle that we needed to get within two," McOsker said. "But overall, I am really happy with our total team effort. We were able to go deeper into our bench than ever before in such a big

Grit and determination fuel Faessler

Senior bids farewell to UMass with walk-off home run

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

As strike three found the catcher's met, Nikki Faessler's swing kicked all wrong.

The senior captain of the Massachusetts softball team was late on a fastball that wasn't that fast. Her head had spun away from the ball and toward the third base dugout. The swing itself was not level.

And the inning was over. Runners were left on base.

Head down and bat in hand, she jogged back to the UMass dugout. A catcher, Faessler quickly began to reattach her protective gear.

Jogging over from the third base coach's box, Minutewoman skipper Elaine Sortino removed her trademark sunglasses and peered into the team trench. Her typically stale countenance crumbled in favor of a perplexed expression.

"Are you all right?" Sortino yelled to Faessler, who is usually a much tougher out at the plate.

The team's lone senior, Faessler softly responded no. But two innings later, the public address announcer had to look twice, as he nearly introduced Faessler as the batter when she was due at the plate.

Much to everyone's surprise, Sortino had decided to pinch hit for her.

No one, except Faessler's coaches and teammates, knew why. After the double-header concluded, Sortino finally explained.

"I don't want you to put this in the paper," she requested, unsuccessfully. "But Nikki's been playing with a fractured right index finger. She's in a lot of pain."

As Faessler, who is right-handed, peeled a dirty Band-Aid from her fingertip – which was noticeably larger than the knuckle under it – she grimaced while trying to bend the digit. Earlier in the week, she was hit on the hand by a pitch, leaving her black and blue nail resting above a hook-shaped gouge.

"It gets a little numb sometimes," she said, trying to bend it again. "I wish I could be at 100 percent. But nothing is going to stop me."

It wasn't just the finger. Faessler had been playing with Strep throat, the hives, and a back that was still sore from an earlier injury.

"She hasn't had too many days of good health, that's for sure," Sortino said of her gritty catcher, without whom she could ill-afford to play because the team has no backup at the position. "I can't think of a game she's played this year when she's been okay."

But injuries, Faessler said, bother her least. On many occasions, she has expressed concern about her duties as captain. Faessler played through her pain, hoping to remain emblematic of the Minutewoman tough tradition that produced two College World Series appearances in 1997 and 1998.

On a UMass team of mostly freshmen and sophomores – which has no junior that plays every game – Faessler is the last of a rare, elite group of Minutewomen. As Sortino watched, the strike out was of little concern to her. The coach was worried about her captain's finger, and about how her young team might react without it leader in the lineup.

"It's hard to understand her leadership role because she couldn't always do what she wanted to do as a player," Sortino said after the game. "She wasn't happy with the results she was getting physically, but at least she had the wherewithal to maintain the mental toughness and poise that we needed from a leader."

Born on Pearl Harbor Day in 1977, it's only fitting that Faessler is attacked every time she steps onto the field.

She had learned to inhale ground balls when she played shortstop on cement playing fields as a child in Queens, NY. By her sophomore year in high school – after she moved to catcher and her family moved to Milford – Faessler's favorite burrow was behind the plate.

Having caught former UMass star and current U.S. Olympic Team pitcher Danielle Henderson for a year and a half, Faessler, who has started behind the plate in 134 collegiate games, absorbed some of the best pitching in the country. And while her hand often throbbed from Henderson's fastball, her mind swelled with expertise.

And when Sortino's pitching squad was relatively untested before this spring, it fell on Faessler's shoulders to guide the young UMass arms through each contest. But the Minutewomen began the season at 0-9, and Faessler exerted much of her energy merely blocking wild pitches.

But the young pitching staff soon developed confidence in Faessler's stonewall presence. Bad pitches were not hitting the backstop. Instead, Faessler's battered body was absorbing many of the pitching mistakes.

"They trust me," Faessler said of her pitchers. "They trust that if they throw a wild pitch, I'll get it somehow."

According to Sortino, no one ever realized Faessler's gift for blocking. Or that she was a two-time Atlantic 10 All-Tournament Selection, as well as second in Minutewoman record books for career home runs. But the indirect results speak for themselves. The UMass pitching staff has settled down to become one the best in its conference.

"They're very comfortable with her. That's very important to pitchers. The day we realize Nikki's greatest worth will be the first time our pitchers throw to another catcher," Sortino said. "They'll realize what they had... she's a wall. How often do you see that ball hit the backstop?"

Despite her bad finger, Faessler has also come a long way in the batters box. Sortino recalled a time when she would swing for the fence during each trip to the plate. By her senior year – although her average had dipped – Faessler began showing patience as a hitter.

That's why Sortino was miffed by Faessler's awkward strikeout.

"She's matured a lot this year," Sortino said

Defending champs capture third at A-10 Championships

By Regan McKendry
Collegian Staff

For the eastern two-thirds of the nation, this past weekend was a prelude to the climate of the coming months. Summer weather was in full force on Saturday and Sunday as temperatures soared into the 90s.

As many Americans took the opportunity to relax on the patio with a tall glass of lemonade or go for a cooling swim, if their pool was ready, the members of the Massachusetts women's outdoor track and field team had different plans on how to deal with the heat. With no say in the conditions, the Minutewomen took part in the annual Atlantic 10 Championships in Blacksburg, VA.

Carrying with them the title of defending champions, UMass realized that a good showing was in order. While goals were high, reality forced the team to be pragmatic about their chances.

The 1999 squad had a surplus of seniors who all rose to the pinnacles of their careers at last year's tournament. Head coach Julie LaFreniere remarked about her 2000 Minutewomen "being good enough to finish in at least third." And that is exactly where UMass was when the scores were totaled up.

Host school Virginia Tech ran away with the title tallying 194 points. Massachusetts neighbor Rhode Island was the runner up. The Rams accumulated 157 points. UMass scored 119 points, good enough for third.

It was a strong third place finish, as fourth-place Temple was 31 points behind the Minutewomen with a score of 88.

While the thermometer reading was high, even hotter for the Maroon and White was senior Melissa Ward. Competing in her final A-10 Championship, Ward set a new Championship record in the Heptathlon, racking up 4,582 points. Her score was over 1,600 points ahead of second-place finisher Janelle Erskine from URI.

Minutemen tie for second at A-10's; Hokies protect home

By Jen Cormier
Collegian Staff

Sometimes, second place can be a good thing.

Sometimes, when the champion is so exceedingly dominant, when the first-place team is so preposterously untouchable, nabbing the runner-up spot can be cause for intense celebration.

Such was the case for the Massachusetts men's outdoor track team at this past weekend's Atlantic 10 Championship. The Minutemen tied for second with Rhode Island with 133 points, finishing 102 points behind the Virginia Tech Hokies, who captured the A-10 crown for the fourth consecutive season. St. Joseph's nabbed the fourth-place spot with 112 points.

Heading into the weekend, head coach Ken O'Brien suspected that Virginia Tech would defend its title with ease, particularly because the meet took place on Hokie turf, in Blacksburg, VA.

"The fact that it's on their home track with all of their fans actually makes the score differential a little bit greater than it would be," offered O'Brien. "But I think their team is strong enough to win even if it was at another facility."

Although the battle for second ended in a draw, the Minutemen can

Busy weekend for police

Drug bust made in Southwest

Students arrested after spring concert

By Daniel Ruetenik
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student was arrested in his room and charged with possession of a class B substance with intent to distribute and possession of a false driver's license on Apr. 30, when UMass police executed a search warrant on his room.

Eric J. Rocha, 21, of Fall River, was arrested in room 917 of John Adams Dorm. According to the search warrant police discovered 30 jell caps of ecstasy, a bag containing empty jell capsules, a small bag containing cocaine, seven thousand and nine hundred dollars cash, a fake NY driver's license with the name Juana Pabon but a photo of Rocha, and a fake NJ driver's license with Rocha's name and picture on it.

Police obtained the warrant after receiving information from an informant concerning Rocha's activities. The informant was supposedly familiar with how ecstasy is used and is packaged and admitted to being a past user. The informant told police that he knew of an individual named Eric Rocha who lived in room #917 of John Adams Dorm and distributed ecstasy. The informant described Rocha as being "a black male approximately twenty years of age, approximately 5'7" in height and medium build."

Police conducted a dormitory check with the 2000 student UMass Student Directory regarding room #917 of John Adams which revealed that an individual name Eric Rocha did in fact live there.

Police conducted a check of Rocha's previous criminal history and found that Rocha had been charged with disturbing the peace on Oct. 12, 1999 by the UMass police and on Apr. 29, 1997 had been charged with underage transportation of alcohol by the Fall River District Court.

Police arranged a meeting with the informant, at which point the informant told police that he had met with Rocha and discussed buying a quantity of ecstasy. Rocha told the informant that he was storing the ecstasy at a location in Hadley. Police knew this location to be #110 North Maple Street in Hadley. The informant was searched and sent to the location in Hadley. While at this location he purchased a quantity of ecstasy.

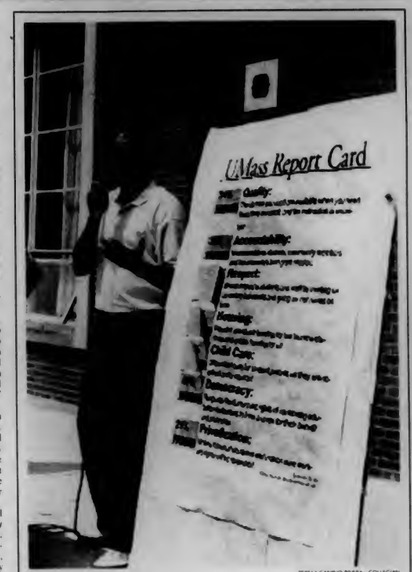
Later, police met with the informant again and the informant told police that he had spoken with Rocha about purchasing a quantity of ecstasy. Surveillance officers followed the informant and a police officer to Rocha's room and observed the informant and the officer enter the John Adams Dormitory and stay for a brief time and return to a predetermined location.

The officer who had accompanied the informant into Rocha's room stated that he saw the informant knock on the door, and enter into the room. The informant said that upon entering into the room, Rocha retrieved a large bag containing ecstasy capsules and handed Rocha a specific amount of ecstasy. The informant then handed Rocha a predetermined amount of cash. The informant left the room and met the officer. The informant and the officer left the building and met the surveillance officers.

According to the warrant, prior to the search, Detective Michael S. Ross said that, he believed that Rocha is a distributor of ecstasy and that he uses his dormitory room, as a distribution point for his narcotics business.

The officers involved in the execution of the search warrant were UMass officers D. Hagan, M Billelle, D. Black and Amherst Police Department Detective J. Jeronimo.

Last weekend, historically one of the busiest weekends for the University of Massachusetts Police Department, officers received several reports of assault and arrested numerous individuals around campus for disorderly conduct and assault and battery.



At the conclusion of Asian night in the campus center last Friday night, police monitoring the event noticed a disturbance near the information desk. Officers converged on the location and found Sergio Perez, 23, and Pedro Pena, 19, engaged in an alteration.

According to Jim Lyons, spokesman for the UMPD, the two individuals were punching each other and then fell on the ground. Perez continued to resist efforts by police to control the scene, even after he was put into handcuffs. Perez is being charged with assault and battery, disorderly conduct and resisting arrest. Pena is being charged with assault and battery, disorderly conduct and possession or use of a false or stolen RMV document.

During an event at the Campus Center on Saturday night, UMass student Dina M. Rodrigues, 20, of Amherst, was arrested while attempting to by-pass the mandatory search before entering. Rodrigues became quite belligerent in her attempts to enter, at one point trying to force her way in. Police were called into the scene and arrested her for disorderly conduct.

Later in the evening, police received a call from an individual who was reportedly assaulted and robbed in front of James Dorm. The individual was told police he was standing in front of the dorm when two males, described as Hispanic, and wearing baggy pants approached him and attacked him. They allegedly grabbed a gold chain from his neck and left the scene. Police arrived and found the individual bleeding from his forehead and nose. He was taken to the hospital

UMass joins consortium

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Chancellor David K. Scott accepted a proposal yesterday from the Licensing Code of Conduct Review Committee that allowed for the University of Massachusetts to join the Workers Rights Consortium (WRC).

The WRC organization aims to be sure that any products made and distributed by colleges and universities are produced under conditions that are suitable for workers.

This decision itself was made with a great deal of support from groups on campus such as the UMass Students against Sweatshops and members of the Student Government Association.

Rebecca Austern, a senator from Southwest that authored a motion regarding workers rights was pleased about the University's decision to join the WRC.

"I didn't expect it this, I thought that they would vote," Austern said. "I'm impressed that they did this so quickly and with such respect for what students wanted."

UMass Students against Sweatshops (SAS) are also enthusiastic about the decision but still feel that there is work that needs to be done. The group is still striving for the implementation of an on-going task force within the University setting, designed to be sure that licensees are in compliance with the standards set by the consortium.

In a statement made to the press, Meaghan Hamilton, a member of the University Licensing Code of Conduct Committee and SAS, commented that although progress was made that the group hopes that more will be done in the future about the issue.

"UMass Students against Sweatshops has been in dialogue with administration around this issue all year, so we are very excited to see UMass decide to officially join the Workers Rights Consortium," she said. "But this is just a beginning, we look forward to continue working with the administration to set up an ongoing committee to deal with the challenges that lie ahead."

Doug Kandt, a graduate student in Labor Studies and member of the Committee, said in a statement to the press that the consortium was the best choice for the University.

"Our committee took a close look at the various monitoring groups available to us, and we determined that, for true independent monitoring, the WRC is currently the best choice," Kandt said. "By ratifying our recommendation, the administration has demonstrated a strong commitment to ending the use of sweatshop labor to produce UMass products. UMass did the right thing, students should be very proud of their University today."

Speaker candidates discuss platform ideas

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association's speaker seat is up for grabs Wednesday night as Mikale Billard, a graduating senior, vacates his seat.

Aaron Saunders, current chair of the Administrative Affairs Committee, said he was running for the soon to be empty seat because, "I think I can do the best job."

His platform consists of dealing with conflicts surrounding the Student Legal Service Office, attempting to get the Spring Concert out of doors, and diversity within the SGA.

"Greek affairs is going to be an issue," he said.

"There are a lot of qualified people running," Saunders said, "but I think I've proved myself as a leader."

Michael Whitehouse, current SGA senator, wants to regain the respect the SGA once received from the administration on campus.

"The SGA needs a speaker that can claim the respect that has been lost over the past years," he said.

According to Whitehouse the "student's don't know what we do. The students get upset with the SGA because it's not doing an work, but the SGA can't do any work because the students don't respect them."

"I think there are some very strong candidates," Whitehouse said. "The other three all have leadership roles on the SGA. I think it's going to be very close and very interesting."

Jim Eltringham, Coolidge senator running with the current associate speaker, said they "felt we could do a good job in making it a stronger body, and a more effective body."

"One thing I'd like to see," Eltringham said," is a better focus on preparing senators for senate session. We have meetings running long because people weren't up to speed or are intimidated by the rules." He said he wants to hold "mock meetings" to help new and old senators used to the pace and setting of the meeting and it's methods.

"I remember feeling as a freshman that my head was spinning, sitting in the meetings."

"I want to have workshops to tell people how to write a motion, how to get an idea of university policy. A lot of freshman senators may feel intimidated by the SGA office," Eltringham said. "As if it was only for people who have been there before. We want to have a stronger presence in that office so senators feel they have a place to work."

Eltringham said he is "really nervous" about the upcoming election. "There are good people running," he said. "Although we may differ, our hearts are in the right place."

Jen Worcester, currently a commuter senator, is running because she wants "senate to be more structured, more professional, and more serious."

"I want rules to apply, and the constitution followed," she said.

As for her platform, Worcester said she wants more socially oriented activities for the senators.

"Everyone says it's a social meeting. If we keep the meetings serious and have social activities outside, we can get our job done and stay professional," Worcester, who was in favor of ALANA Caucus senator Patrick Callahan's motion, presented at last week's meeting, to force senators to hold office hours.

Callahan's motion, which failed by a 29-19 vote, would mandate that each senator hold one office hour a month within the campus center.

"I wondered if there was a means by which office hours could be used to increase the communication between students and representatives," Callahan said. "As far as what happened, I'm glad people debated. Debate is a form of communication in the senate that allows for ideas to be discussed."

Journalism student to speak at commencement

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Senior journalism major Litza J. Melendez, of Amherst, has been selected student speaker for the 150th University of Massachusetts Commencement to take place May 21 at 10:30 a.m. in Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Melendez was selected by a committee consisting of faculty and students. She was chosen based on her dedication and commitment to the community and her involvement with new students.

Melendez was born in Puerto Rico and grew up and attended school in Amherst. She is the daughter of Ianet Reyes, a teacher at Morgan Elementary School in Holyoke, and Eduardo Melendez, principal of Holyoke Alternative School, both of whom graduated from UMass with master's degrees in education. Her brother and sister are currently graduate students on campus and two other cousins are currently serving as undergraduates.

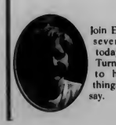
Litza J. Melendez

Melendez's accomplishments range from advising and assisting prospective new students and participating for the last three years as a New Students Program counselor. She has involved herself in scheduling and coordinating public relations events, administering math placement tests for international students and for overseeing the design, production and organization of hundreds of sings for information sessions scheduled during orientation days on campus.

A Dean's List student, Melendez is a member of the ALANAI (African, Latino, Asian, Native American and International) and Phi Kappa Phi honor societies. She was recently awarded as a Commonwealth Scholar and holds a four-year Talented Minority Scholarship and was also named a William F. Field Alumni Scholar.

Working directly in the on-campus residence halls, she has been an academic program assistant in Patterson residence hall in Southwest Residential area. From serving as a residential advisor for first-year students to becoming a teaching assistant for the course "UMass Unplugged," Melendez has even dedicated her time to being a volunteer tutor and mentor for international students on campus.

According to a press release, Melendez will talk about the ups and downs of college life and the lessons that she and this year's graduates have learned as they move on to their new lives.



"Ever since I was a freshman, I would tell people that I wanted to be the student speaker at my graduation, but I never though I would actually accomplish that goal," Melendez said. "Now, I'm a little bit nervous."

Reward offered for fake fire

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

A $500 dollar reward is being offered by the Amherst Eyes of Life chapter for the information leading to the arrest and conviction of the person or persons responsible for triggering a false fire alarm that occurred early Sunday morning at the University of Massachusetts Pierpont Residence Hall in Southwest Residential area.

According to a statement by the Eyes of Life Chairperson Larry Kelley, the false alarm was triggered when the alleged person or persons vandalized the fire call box that alerts the Amherst Fire Department when a fire alarm is triggered on campus. When the call box was smashed, a faulty signal was sent to the fire department alerting them to a fire that didn't exist.

The false alarm caused the night shift of eight full-time Amherst Fire Department firefighters to respond while another actual house fire was in progress at College Inn Apartments. He said these kinds of false alarms are dangerous because they cause the fire department to become preoccupied with a false fire, causing their response time to be delayed when a real fire arises.

According to Kelley, taxpayers pay an estimated $300 dollars each time the fire department responds to a false fire and he said this year's statistics indicate that there were 41 false alarms on the UMass campus compared to 25 at Amherst College and 16 at Mt. Holyoke College.

"Not only are false alarms costly to Amherst taxpayers, but this particular prank could have proved deadly," Kelley said in a statement. "Having experienced a major fire, I know how vital it is to get as many firefighters to the scene as quickly as possible."

According to Kelley, during instances when the full-time force is responding to a fire, the call force acts as back up. However, when the College Inn Apartment fire was reported, the call force was preoccupied battling a series of dumpster fires at Brandywine and Townhouse Apartments.

Kelley said the student firefighters were the only reserve force available to respond to the scene of the fire and "they did a wonderful job and thank God they were there because there could easily have been a tragedy," Kelley said.

The Eyes of Life was founded after the Worcester fire tragedy last year and has already purchased one thermal imaging camera that was used in the College Inn Apartments fire to help locate any individuals possibly trapped inside the burning building. He stated that there were no significant injuries as a result of the fire, but said that it could easily have been more serious.

"Anytime you have a serious fire in a building that is occupied by people sleeping, that's just a dangerous situation," Kelley said. "What would have been unfortunate is if someone had died; everyone would have stopped and said, 'this can't happen again and let's take measure that this doesn't happen again.' It's unfortunate that someone has to die before people take notice of conditions that are inappropriate."

According to a statement by Amherst Fire Department Chief Keith Hoyle, his firefighters responded to a total of six dumpster fires last Saturday night and early Sunday morning, costing the town close to $1800 dollars.

Kelley said he believes alcohol to be the contributing factor behind such behavior. According to him, "that sends out a message that there's a certain element of kids at UMass that can't handle their alcohol."

"The Chancellor is basically the mayor of the university and he's looking at it from a public relations standpoint," Kelley said. "His viewpoint is that this makes us look bad and my viewpoint as a taxpayer is that your kids pulling false alarms could result in public fiascos when incidents continue to happen. The University should be sending out this message that we condone this type of activity and continue to control alcohol consumption."

Suspect released in virus case

By Rojiv Chandrasekaran
Washington Post

MANILA, Philippines – Investigators hunting the author of the "Love Bug" computer virus shifted their sights to a loose-knit band of young Manila students and hackers Tuesday after a Philippine prosecutor, citing lack of evidence, released a 28-year-old bank employee who was taken into custody Monday.

Despite several new leads, the turn of events in a high-profile probe into the virus that hobbled millions of computers worldwide made it clear that investigators still have not reached their goal: determining who is responsible for crafting and spreading what has been described as one of the most potent plagues ever to infect the Internet and a dramatic reminder of fragility in the age of the web.

Although police arrested the young bank employee with fanfare and interrogated him for several hours, a prosecutor ruled investigators have not yet assembled enough evidence to hold him and charge him with a crime. As a result, he was released and, using information provided by the FBI, the investigators turned their attention to a group of current and former students of a Manila computer college, including the younger brother and sister of the man's live-in girlfriend.

The sister, Jocelyn de Guzman, graduated last year from the college and lives in the same dilapidated public housing apartment as the arrested suspect, Reonel Ramones, and his girlfriend, Irene de Guzman. The brother, Onel de Guzman, is a senior at the computer school and was a frequent visitor to the apartment.

Officials said they believe that key parts of the virus originated from a computer that was connected to the Internet through the apartment's phone line, which was the clue that took them to Ramones.

Now investigators want to question Irene de Guzman's brother and sister, both of whom are in their early 20s, but police have been unable to locate them. A computer that was reportedly set up in Irene de Guzman's bedroom also is missing.

Authorities believe Onel de Guzman's online pseudonym – as well as that of a fellow student, Michael Buen – were included in the text of the virus program, sources said. The investigators are attempting to interpret eight other coded monikers that also were embedded in the program text and, they believe, could represent other hackers in Manila and elsewhere.

The list of 10 pseudonyms was given to Philippine authorities by the FBI, which has been assisting in the search for the person or people who created the virus, said Elfren Meneses, the director of the Philippine National Bureau of Investigation's computer crime unit.

Investigators this morning wanted to charge Ramones with violating a Philippine law that forbids using fraudulent information to obtain goods or services. But the prosecutor told the investigators to gather more evidence that more directly ties Ramones to the distribution of the virus, a source close to the case said.

"The evidence is incomplete," Senior Prosecutor Severino Gana said after meeting with NBI officials to discuss whether Ramones should be charged. "There are still diskettes which they need to evaluate."

Officials said Ramones is still a suspect and they promised to present more information to the prosecutor in 10 days. "He's not off the hook," Meneses said.

Ramones told the prosecutor that he was a victim of "mistaken identity." Tuesday evening, he told reporters that he is happy to "have the opportunity to prove my innocence without being detained."

"I view my temporary release a victory of sorts and I am confident that a thorough investigation will result in my final vindication," Ramones said, reading from a prepared statement.

Officials want to interview Irene De Guzman, who had promised to report to investigators but has not yet done so, officials said. Her attorney, who met with investigators Tuesday, said she "has nothing to do" with the virus.

It is de Guzman's young brother and sister, however, whom investigators want most desperately to question, sources said. "We are very interested in him," one official said of Onel de Guzman.

Onel de Guzman has finished his senior year at the computer college, but he still needs to complete a few more classes before he can receive his bachelor's degree in computer science, one source said. Part of his thesis proposal was initially rejected by professors because it would have required creating a program that would have used at least one database in an unauthorized way, the source said.

The names of de Guzman and Buen –and references to the school, the AMA Computer College – also appear in a virus called Myclangelo that was written by a student at the college last year, computer specialists said. That virus, not to be confused with a 1992 Michelangelo virus, refers to a group called "GRAMMERSoft," which also was mentioned in the text of the "I Love Bug" virus.

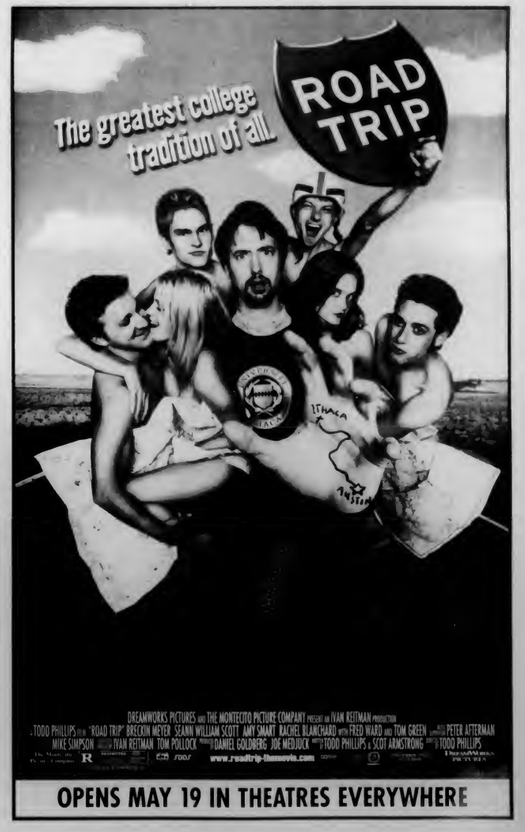
and treated for his injuries. The incident is currently under investigation.

Early Sunday morning police received a report of a medical emergency in Coolidge Dorm. A group of several girls and guys reported they were riding in an elevator when Albert J. Morello, age 20, of Saugus, who was also riding in the elevator began harassing and disrespecting the females traveling with the group. The males in the group allegedly attempted to stop the individual from harassing the girls. In the process, one of them was kicked by Morello in the head. Police arrived and arrested Morello. During their investigation they found a can of pepper spray on Morello's person, of which he did not have the proper licensing for and someone else's driver's license. Morello is being charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (shod foot), possession of pepper spray without an FID card, possession of a false or stolen license and three counts of assault and battery.

During the spring concert at the Mullins Center on Sunday night, James P. Webb, age 20, of Methuen, was arrested after he jumped on stage during a performance and allegedly grabbed the buttocks of one of the females performing on stage. Police apprehended Webb and are charging him with disorderly conduct, resisting arrest and indecent assault and battery on someone over 14 years of age.



After the concert, a female reported to police that 10 females while leaving the Mullins center had assaulted her. She told police she had received multiple abrasions to her back, but refused medical attention. There were no arrests made and police did not have any descriptions of the assailants.

Also after the concert, a female reported being bitten by a stranger, there is no description of the biter available but the incident is under investigation.

Our Opinion
Napster not to blame

A federal judge ruled on Friday that the Internet company Napster will indeed have to face up to a copyright infringement case leveled by the Recording Industry Association of America. This announcement by U.S. District Court Judge Marilyn Hall Patel comes on the heels of similar proceedings against the company initiated by recording artists Metallica and Dr. Dre, who have expressed anger at the ability of fans to download new and even unreleased material via its website.

While the rights of artists must be respected, we at the Collegian feel that Napster is justified in its method of making music available and that these artists and organizations are simply denying the inevitable power of the Internet over conventional methods of releasing music.

The first and most basic defense offered up by Napster is a simple explanation of how its site works. Prospective downloaders log onto Napster.com and are given access to MP3 music files stored on the hard drives of the site's other members. The fact is that Napster simply offers a link to pirated music via its site; the company itself does not upload, store or make available the music on its own computer systems. Hence, it is merely a conduit through which to obtain music, not an actual source.

The aforementioned judge didn't exactly see eye-to-eye with Napster in that regard. Patel contended that the company "has not shown that it reasonably implemented a policy for terminating repeat infringers," i.e. cracking down on Napster users who make available illegally pirated tracks on the site.

But the fact is the number of users on Napster has increased exponentially since the site's inception, particularly in the face of such repeated controversy. There is really no way for the company to effectively monitor every track that passes across its site, or to target those who use Napster for repeated criminal activity such as trading illegally obtained music.

Hence, the only viable solution seems to be shutting the site down completely, at least according to the RIAA. But what will this really accomplish?

The truth is that pirated music is everywhere on the Internet. The new Pearl Jam CD, scheduled for release on May 16, is already available in its entirety online. The same goes for the new release by rap star Eminem. Just as Napster's user base is too huge to effectively police, the Web itself is too vast for record companies to hunt down music pirates and prevent pre-release trading of new music.

The answer lies, therefore, in protecting new music from its very source. How did fans get their hands on Metallica's "I Disappear" in the first place? The band's drummer, Lars Ulrich, expressed his gravest concerns regarding the incident over the fact that the song, which is to appear on the soundtrack to the upcoming Mission Impossible sequel, wasn't even finished when it appeared online.

So the question remains: how does an unfinished studio work make it onto the web in the first place? It seems as though it would be easier to police a leak at that level than to turn Napster into a scapegoat for Internet pirating as a whole.

The company does have another line of defense in the RIAA case, similar to the one successfully used by Sony against litigation-hungry Hollywood studios angry at the introduction of the VCR. If fans are downloading music for personal, non-commercial use, that would seem to fall under the same "fair use" clause that protects those who tape television shows at home for later viewing.

But the fact is that Napster should not need to defend itself against artists, record companies or the RIAA. The site is simply being used as a target for the anti-pirating angst of all three, and only because the site has the guts to stand up and take accountability for exactly what it does offer the public.

If only the artists themselves could be held so accountable.

Internet campaign finance

Paul Piwko

This is an open letter to everyone who dreams of fixing the money problem within our political system. It is a challenge to abandon your fantasy of a messiah who "gives the government back to the people" and join in a different dream, one which is grounded in technology and fair competition. Did I mention that this dream has already started coming to life????

The impact of technology upon politics has been profound. Through the miracle of radio and FDR's fireside chats, regular Americans were able to hear their politicians. In the 1950s and 1960s, television allowed regular Americans to see their politicians. And, finally, through the miracle of the Internet, regular Americans are now able to be their politicians – they just don't know it yet.

11/17/99: We reserve the web address (URL) www.paulieforprez.com at a cost of $119. Coupled with the earlier purchases of a digital camera, the investment now equals about $2,600. One month later, we will buy website hosting ($19.95/month) and purchase an editing board ($35) to create streaming video.

Before we dream about how the Internet can bring knock-you-socks-off change to the campaign process, let's examine the classical approach. In 1907, the Tillman Act instituted campaign finance disclosure. In 1974, in the wake of Watergate, the Campaign Financing Act instituted stronger disclosure provisions, established contribution limits, and created the Federal Election Commission (FEC.)

By 1999, mainstream America had again awakened to the alarming influence of big business and special interests. Meanwhile, the beat goes on. The FEC reports that as of 3/31/00, Al Gore and George Bush have raised a combined $118MM.

Yet, let's consider if more lawmaking is really the answer, since it hasn't worked yet. In a 1999 interview, then-Chairman of the FEC, Scott Thomas said "When I talk to young people, I explain there's this flaw in our human nature, that is 'Every person has his or her price.'... when push comes to shove, and they (the candidates) need to get that last minute t.v. ad on, they'll go out and scrape for that money anyplace they can get it" Is this indeed the character of all potential office seekers?

Walking among us there are artists, social workers, software engineers and car mechanics, many of whom possess the skills required to govern effectively – they are our neighbors, friends, and co-workers. Given the chance, would these people engage in the fund-raising lambada with faceless multi-national corporations, and party bosses? This question is critical in determining whether lawmaking is required, especially in light of the increased potential that these regular Americans may seek office in the Internet Age.

1/13/00: It's a cold night in Durham, New Hampshire outside the debate hall. Among the young crowd, my wife, my seven-year-old son, and I hoist homemade signs for www.paulieforprez.com (Staples - $5.99 each.) We're heckled by many, but high-fived by a few.

The dream isn't so crazy. In e-business, the Internet is creating a revolution. Sure, dot-coms might be less shiny today than one year ago, but they're an awesome example of natural creativity, born out of a start-up mindset. Scrappier competitors have provided us with the ability to do things quickly and on the cheap (priceline.com, freefax.com.) Even consider the impatient Internet mindset – when surfing the Net, we want information and results, and we want them now. Imagine if this mindset was applied to politics.

Imagine if change-hungry political dot-coms put pressure on the middlemen of politics – the Two Party System – and created vibrant competition. While experts have estimated that only 60% of voting age adults are registered as Democrats or Republicans, the Two Parties hold 99.8% of the seats within the U.S. Congress. In soft drinks, another business where two enormous players dominate, at least the facade of additional other competition exists (Coke and Pepsi together account for less than 75% of the market.)

2/17/00: Streaming video (4 minute short films) starts at www.paulieforprez.com. Par for the course, our video quality is grainy, and the audio is lispy. We mix-in small doses of entertainment to make our politics more watchable. We begin to test freedom of speech – especially the Fair Use Doctrine.

What if the media were to view a candidate's campaign as Example #1 of that candidate's problem-solving approach. In other words, it is reasonable to believe that those who solve Example #1 by "throwing money at it" could be viewed as wasteful spenders. Alternatively, those who operate with little cash, but utilize maximum creativity, and an entrepreneurial spirit, would be viewed as creative problem-solvers.

Might an unbiased assessment of the problem-solving skills of a wider variety of candidates be valuable to voters? If this service were provided, discrimination against the un-moneyed candidates would lessen, and competition would flourish. The underdog would win, at least as often as in the NFL. A powerful and valuable new role would exist for the media of the Internet Age.

4/16/00: The eve of the Boston Marathon. My 13 year-old son and I travel the Marathon route from Hopkinton to Newton. We stop at each "Port-a-Potty" (1507) along the Marathon route, and once inside tape flyers for www.paulieforprez.com ($.03/copy at Staples.) The next day, Evelyn – a friend and runner – is featured by Channel 4 in a close-up t.v. shot on Heartbreak Hill, wearing a paulieforprez.com shirt.

To date, debate regarding the "digital divide" has been theoretical. Arguments have been made that the 33% of households that have the wire aren't perfectly representative of the country as a whole. While these arguments are correct, the question is whether the Net is relatively more representative than a body politic which is dominated by big money. If that question is answered in favor of the Net, then the gates should be opened, and the cleansing waters of Internet competition should be introduced immediately.

"And, finally, through the miracle of the Internet, regular Americans are now able to be their politicians – they just don't know it yet."

5/2/00: 2:40 A.M. I'm writing the opinion editorial that you are reading. Let's go over this one more time. The old dream was a lawmakers' approach to campaign finance reform, and was enabled only by the benevolence of our elected officials. The new dream is grounded in technology, competition, and equality.

One dream feels decidedly more American than the other.

The Internet Generation has jumped at the consumer and profit-making opportunities of the Net, and started a revolution. Public service activities little opportunity for material gain, but speaks volumes about our character. Hey Internet Generation – Got Game???

Knowing what to say:
Vacanti gives her goodbye

As you go through life, you have a tendency to take in a lot of BS. Some of it is necessary, but a good portion of it would be easy to go through life without. This past semester I have taken some time to really listen to what people have been saying and to evaluate whether it's necessary, or whether it's just nonsense and a reason just to speak. There are some phrases that I'm just sick of hearing and that I find completely unnecessary to make. Most of the unnecessary comments are okay to be made by a close friend, but not an acquaintance or someone you don't know and may never see again.

The comment that I find most unnecessary is "Man, you look like hell." I honestly don't see the point of this comment. What more, it pisses me off. A person generally knows when they look like hell, when they're sick, when they're sunburned, etc. This comment finally pushed me over the edge enough, the Monday after Easter Sunday, to include it in my column. I decided to stay home on Easter night (mainly because I was drinking on Easter and it's a bad idea for anyone, especially myself, to drive, even a few hours after I have had a drink) and realized that I would have to leave home at 8:00 a.m. in order to make my first class on Monday morning.

Emily Vacanti

The next morning I got up an hour and a half late and hit traffic or construction on routes 146, 90 and 91. The only route that was clear was route 9 (go figure). By the time I parked my car illegally and ran to class, the class had been finished for five minutes. So I just drove back to my dorm and as I was unpacking I realized that in my morning rush I had forgotten my bath kit (I didn't shower right when I got up because I was in a major rush). So I went and got what I needed and on my way back to the dorms several acquaintances commented on my appearance "Jesus, you look like st. What the hell happened to you?" What I don't get is why so many people found it so completely necessary to comment on my appearance and attitude when I knew just how much like st I looked. Does the majority of this campus honestly think that when someone looks horrible, that they don't know it already. No one needs to point out just how horrible someone looks, especially if the person is just having a bad day. Everyone looks like hell occasionally. Let them be. It's so damn annoying when someone points it out. I would like to hit them in response, but I don't do that (I'm not like Jon).

Even though there are many statements that we can live without, there are also a great deal that get us through our daily life. I have trouble thanking the majority of the people that say things that do get me through life. Now most of you who know me know that I'm a free spirit who is blunt and forward. So this must mean a lot to me, thanking these people and telling them how I really feel about them. But sometimes I actually get the guts to do it, generally after some sort of push. These are the types of things that should be said, that need to be said.

For example, about two weeks ago I bumped into my friend Brian Corbin (spelling might be wrong, sorry). To clear it up for my regular readers, Brian is the man on campus with balls that I included in a column about a month ago ("So what would you do?"). He's the man who said that he would never let anyone hurt me. It would never happen. Anyways, about two weeks ago I bumped into him and ended up talking to him for a little while. Now this was on the day that I looked like hell. And he was great about it. He didn't comment about my appearance, he just opened up his arms for a hug. So I felt that he deserved an ego boost and I told him how much I value our friendship. This is the kind of thing that people need to hear, not "Damn, you look like hell."

Another example is from Brett Mauser. Now if you know Brett, you know what I mean. A while ago I had been having another not so good day when Brett was coming my way. He did what people sometimes need: he just listened. I don't know if this is the way that he acts with everyone, but with me he only commented when I asked him what he thought. This kind of behavior is a nice change of pace from what I'm used to. Everyone always seems like they're waiting for their chance to talk. When I was talking to him, it wasn't like that. So, again, I said screw it and told him how much I value my friendship with him (major risk of face).

My third and final example of telling people what they either need to or should hear brings my friend Sarah into play. I met her in September and I truly valued her friendship. She and I both have a tendency to be a bit eccentric, to put it mildly. Now throughout the time that I have known her, I've always been upfront about how much her friendship has meant to me, but recently I put it all to the test, I risked it all for the safety of both of us, and I came out okay. I told her and her boyfriend what I honestly thought of him and his actions. It was not well accepted to say the least. Even though she didn't want to hear what I had to say, it needed to be said. To this day I don't know if I've lost her friendship. We haven't really spoken since then, but it is partially because I won't initiate the conversation. I care so much about her (and I'm hoping that she is reading this), but it feels like she doesn't know what I feel I'm risking by being around her and her boyfriend. I truly believe that I said what needed to be said, and that's what keeps me hoping.

There are times that things do need to be said, and there are times when nothing should be said. If you think you might end up insulting someone by making a statement that really shouldn't be made by you (saying to an acquaintance "You look like hell"), then don't do it. Think twice. If necessary, think a third time. I mean c'mon. Treat people with the decency and respect that they deserve. Tell them (me) how amazing they (I) look. Tell them what a great person they are. You get the picture. Unfortunately, Brett is graduating this year. He won't be around to just listen and make occasional comments where they are appropriate. So yes, I'll have to depend more on the others that have meant the world to me, for the next three semesters (Brian, Martin, Summer, Jen, random Collegian people, etc.). To those of you who are graduating this year and that have made a significant impact in my life I would like to send out thanks to you all and good luck on life after college. Good job in delaying reality. I'll see you all in September!

Here's my two cents

Well, this is a quasi-senior column. I'll be back in the fall for one final go at that vaunted thing called graduation. Ha, ha... three more months of partying for me until I have to encounter the real world. Wait a minute; partying is the reason why I have to stay that extra semester.

No, no, no... that's not it at all. Part of the reason, if not most of the reason, is the Collegian, but I have already written my piece on what is to work here, so I'm going to let you in on some things that you should or should not do while at UMass.

Live everyday as if it were your last her at the University. If you do this your experience here will be unparalleled. Where else can you wake up late, contemplate going to class, go back to sleep and then wake up questioning what it was you missed while you were dreaming?

Eat as much Antonio's as possible. It might just be the most taste-pleasing slice that you'll ever eat. I'm not kidding. The place is always open and the service is like no other. In and out in less than five minutes. It's kind of like the Soup Nazi from Seinfeld, except substitute "No soup for you" with "Hot cheese up front."

'Club Sidewalk' might be the bets thing that the town of Amherst has to offer. It promotes friendship. Everyone is happy, but I'll let you use your imagination as to why they are. 'Club Sidewalk' is open Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights from 1 a.m. until 2 a.m. The location is "Uptown Baby."

Haigis Hoopla is the best basketball tournament around. There are players from all walks of life and from various skill levels. Children to adults, it is two days of fun in the sun. The free t-shirts also help out the cause.

"Beer, it does a body good." Enough said.

Go to class on a regular basis, you might just find it interesting. Hey, I can't vouch for this one, but I heard an old fable about it. So what if the professors could care less if you attend or not. They'd rather have you not there than for those that don't go to class regularly, go once in a while just to piss the professors off. In fact go to a random class, it's kind of cool.

The Horseshoe In Southwest is by the far the best place on campus when the sun is out. People playing Frisbee, sunbathing playing basketball, they have it all there. It's fun for all ages and for both boys and girls.

Bryan Smith

Take all your dates to Northampton. For that extra special someone, there is this little pastry shop on a side street. I'm not going to tell you where exactly it is or the name, but trust me a little research will be well worth it. Despite the traffic on the Coolidge Bridge NoHo is a quality place.

Well that concludes my list of things to do or not to do. Now for some about outs.

Brett Mauser, my ligga. This could possibly be the most strange, but hysterical person you could ever meet. I don't know how you do it, but it works for you. And for me, too. Anytime you want to talk about anything he should be the one you call.

Kathleen Ralls, this woman is special. She has got what it takes to be the best and most of all she has the highest tolerance for putting up with 'the guys' that you could imagine. She has worked alongside men for four years at the Collegian and will continue to do so in the future. Good luck, even though you don't need it.

Deb Sheehan, we've had our ups and downs, but I'm going to miss you. I wish you the best of luck in whatever path you choose to follow.

To the rest of my peeps that will be parting ways with the Collegian and more importantly the University. You'll all be missed dearly, I'm just sorry that I'll have to be here to pick up your slack. My time here has been fun and I'll get all teary-eyed when you're all gone and I'm here for another semester. But let it be known, I'll be out, too, soon. But not soon enough. You may now throw your caps in the air, it's over.

Some random thoughts

I have tried to bring a mixed bag of interesting, off-beat, and wacky topics to you this semester and hopefully you have finally we've reached the end. In a last parting shot, I will reinforce a smattering of things that I have seen in the news over the last few weeks. Hold on kids, this is going to be a wild ride.

First up is Bob Smith, the hefty, lovable Republican Senator from New Hampshire. Smith is hell bent on keeping my favorite Cuban lad Elian (don't call me "Gonzo") Gonzalez in the U.S. His latest and most embarrassing comments have accused the U.S. government of drugging the boy and brain washing him. Remember, folks, this is real stuff reported on by the Associated Press. He is on the record as saying, "They've already found tranquilizer drugs with the doctors. I think you can reasonably assume that on May 11 the little kid is going to come say, 'I want to go back to Cuba.' Yesterday when asked if he really believed that Elian was being drugged, Smith said to a reporter, "I did not suggest it. If that's the conclusion you draw, that's incorrect." By the way, he also said the place where Elian was staying is a "concentration camp." Thanks, Tubby. Have another doughnut.

Brian Lohnes

Next up is the United States military and their brilliant crash investigators. Their report about an aviation crash, which killed 19 Marines last month, concluded that the crash was caused because of a, "loss of aerodynamic lift". Well I am glad we pay these guys to do this stuff. I could have asked my girlfriend's three-year-old sister why the damn thing crashed and got a better answer than that.

In layman's terms they concluded that the vehicle crashed because it stopped going up and then came down really hard. Whew! That is some exhaustive research!

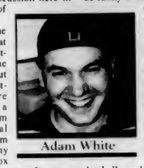
And for Japan, the land of Mt. Fuji, indoor driving ranges, and apparently the world's most gullible people. A cult leader in Japan was arrested after swindling people into believing that he could heal them by looking at their feet. These people are one of the most technologically advanced societies on the planet, yet they are fooled by a 55-year-old man who looks at their feet? The cult leader, Guru Fukunaga, convinced many people that they would get cancer and become ill if he didn't get a chance to inspect their dogs. Strangely, there was no photo accompanying the story.

"Now that Hillary is out of the White House, one would expect Slick Willy's bed to be like a scale at Weight Watchers: someone's always going to be on it."

Now that Hillary is out of the White House, one would expect Slick Willy's bed to be like a scale at Weight Watchers: someone's always going to be on it. Well, in the most disturbing report since the one about Chelsea having a boyfriend, Bill Clinton told reporters that he now sleeps with his dog. That's right, folks, Buddy the White House dog sleeps in the president's bed with him at night. Apparently they have a bit of a strange relationship, as the AP reported, "Buddy, his ears flopping, bounded out to meet his master at the presidential helicopter." Master? Hmmm... come to mention it the dog has been walking funny lately.

Chernobyl, the 1976 Pinto of nuclear power plants is still making news. Even after melting down and causing the worst nuclear disaster in recorded history, the freakin' place is still open! That's correct, those tough people in the Ukraine are still operating the plant and by most accounts it is still puking nuclear particles into the atmosphere. The best part of this whole story is that we (the US) are going to have to foot a major chunk of the 1.5 billion dollars to build them two new plants! Two words for the Ukrainians: duct tape.

Finally, by the time you are reading this I will have hopefully scooped up the 325 million dollar Big Game Jackpot. If I do I will make a personal guarantee that you will never have to feast your eyes on my beautiful photo again. Hell, I may buy the damn paper.



On a personal note, did anyone see, "Jack-Ass festival 2000" at the student union last Friday? Those Republican Club guys get pretty frisky when people start yelling at them. All they needed were a couple white robes and pointy hats and they would have had the full effect. I do have to commend the Republican Club for one thing though, their high level of paranoia makes the crazy dread-lock guy seem logical. Unfortunately, it is too late in the semester to get a "jeer" in the Minuteman... thankfully there's always next year.

Ladies and gents, I hope you liked it. To all the seniors graduating this year, give em' hell, kick ass and take names, and of course, don't eat yellow snow. To the returning masses, I hope you love this place as much as I do and I will see you when the future gets here. As for me, I have to run, as Elian Gonsalez's uncle said, "I think someone's at the door."

SEX!!! (nuff said)

Nothing improves a person's mood more than good sex. When you notice a random person walking around campus sporting a cheesy ear-to-ear grin, you can be fairly certain that person has had the recent fortune of getting laid. And while sex is undoubtedly one of the oldest and most popular of college activities, it receives a considerably small amount of discussion here in the Ed/Op section of the Collegian.

Adam White

It's not as if no one working down here at this newspaper is getting any action. The wild tales coming out of the sports department alone are enough to comprise a feature-length film about gross sexual misconduct. But I'm not about to use my journalistic soapbox to bore you all with stories of my own personal conquests between the sheets.

Instead, I'm going to tell you all what you're doing wrong.

The throngs of students who venture uptown every weekend in search of Intercourse, decked out in their Abercrombie and reeking of Fahrenheit, actually have the right idea. Sex is largely about image. Anyone of the female persuasion who is secretly craving a casual fling isn't interested in how smart you are, how articulate you are or how many entertaining stories you have. How you look is going to be the single biggest factor in getting you through the proverbial door and on your way to the Promised Land.

So by all means, take the time to get yourself looking sharp.

But at the same time, think about this: every other guy uptown is thinking exactly the same thing. There will be no less than 30 other dudes wearing the same American Eagle cargo pants and the same stupid Nike visor. And if you think that gaudy Hawaiian shirt is going to set you off from the crowd, think again. These days, loud obnoxious shirts are a dime a dozen at Barsie's and McMurphy's.

If you want to really attract attention, and you can pull it off, rock the classic wife beater uptown. Show the ladies exactly what they're getting from you in the deal. That way, you won't have to be self conscious about unveiling your pipes once the moment of truth is finally upon you.

And for God's sake, wear underwear. Bill Murray was only trying to be funny in Stripes when he said that chicks dig guys who don't.

Once you've picked out that perfect outfit, you're only halfway there. The single biggest pitfall that threatens the potential sex machine still looms ahead: alcohol.

It goes without saying that booze has always, and will always, be the single largest motivator for the socially challenged. A guy who is normally dreadfully shy can down a few beers and think he's suddenly Jim Carrey. And at the risk of offending a few thousand students of a certain gender, it is no secret that any girl who normally turns her nose up at your very mention will typically be a lot more receptive if she's had a few drinks.

No, I am not condoning the practice of getting girls drunk in order to lessen their defenses. But I have more than a few female friends who will admit that random hook-ups are much more bearable with a liberal dose of alcohol thrown into the mix.

I'd like to contend, however, that just as alcohol can give you that initial "push" toward success in the hunt for sex, it can also be the force that drives you off the cliff of carnal conquest. Show me a guy with a booze-fueled success story involving the mating game, and I'll show you 100 guys who fell flat on their faces trying to combine drinking and sex.

It is a well-documented fact that alcohol dulls your reflexes during activities such as driving and operating heavy equipment. Well, those effects are doubled when it comes to your social reflexes. Whereas a smooth and sober stud can give a snappy comeback to any sort of social sparring, the drunk guy typically responds to wit with a blank stare and a thin sliver of drool stretching from his gaping mouth to the bar in front of him. And in the game of sex, every line truly counts.

Even if the hammered would-be Romeo can manage to stumble successfully through his initial conversation with his prospect, any semblance of composure goes right out the window once he has to stand up or, God forbid, dance. A smart girl knows that how a guy dances is typically a good indication of his style in the sack, at least in terms of rhythm, confidence and style. The inebriated idiot stumbling around the dance floor is the same guy who flails around sloppily (if at all) in the heat of the moment.

Which brings us to the hands-down biggest detriment of boozing and banging: the effects of liquor on certain portions of the male anatomy. Fellas, you know exactly what I mean by this. Ladies, if you've been bitten by this one, you know there's nothing more disheartening than getting into the gate and finding out your racehorse simply won't gallop. The cool guy will try his best to downplay the severity of the situation, but the fact remains: who go through all the effort of getting into bed if you can't make it a worthwhile time for either party involved?

And if you think girls are apt to kiss and tell about great sex, imagine how liberally they'll share a tale of a guy too drunk to close the deal. Then think of the wonders such a story will work for your future sexual endeavors.

No, the key is simple moderation. One or two drinks, especially early in the evening, will put a twinkle in your eye without causing you to turn into "Shooter" from Hoosiers. And you'll still dance like John Travolta and swing a stiller bat than Mark McGwire.

Just remember that the next day, you're going to need an excuse for your perma-grin.

I'm off to Africa

Some time ago I wrote a little piece on being a senior here at UMass and what the future holds for the senior contingent. I know that, for the most part, most of my senior friends have a "plan" for the future. Most of my senior friends are working in Boston in various consulting firms and investment firms, and some of my friends, if not all of them, have a "five-year plan."

The future is a great wide-open plain that we all have to attack at some point, and it starts when we graduate from this fine academic institution/toilet bowl. My plan for the future is, decidedly, not going to Boston. I am not a person that has the need to be trapped by a desk and dress in a suit everyday like a freaking robot. My future is not actually going to take me anywhere near here-my plan for the immediate future will take me to the deepest and darkest regions of the Dark Continent: Africa. I am in the Peace Corps, and I will be serving my tenure as a Peace Corps Volunteer in Guinea.

Wes Wrightson

This country lies in the Western region of Africa where the lingua franca is French, and I will not be speaking English for my entire stay in West Africa. This region of Africa is the poorest part of the world. Indigenous peoples of West Africa make their living through farming or subsistence living. They live their lives there on a day-to-day basis, and really have no concept of the future. I kind of know what this type of living is like. When I was in South Africa, the people there lived life thinking only about the day at hand and what they needed to do to get by in terms of that day. There was no regard to saving things merely for the future. It was all about today and not tomorrow.

I will be teaching English as a secondary language to village children, as well as assisting in Community Development. Basically I will be creating jobs for people in order to instill a sense of incentive. I will have to create jobs for people like making sure that I get my weekly supply of water and preparation of my food. The living conditions are going to be unique to say the least. I know that I will probably be living in a shack or even a small hut among the villagers. I will most likely encounter unfamiliar insects and animals, and I'm going to have to know how to take care of myself if I get sick, which will happen at one point or another. I can't wait for this experience because I know it will lead to a cool job within the government at some point in my life.

Living in Africa (again) is a dream of mine and I know that it will be rewarding because I'll know I will be giving back to the world what I have put into it. "Every man should give back to the world what he/she has put into it" is a quote by Einstein that I think symbolizes some of my beliefs. It has afforded to me many opportunities in life that most people in the world could only dream about, and I think that being a Peace Corps Volunteer is something that I can give back and be really proud of. There is, virtually, no monetary gain, and I'm cool with that because I'll be living all alone and independent of anybody. I will be living a life free of electricity, Internet, TV, running water, or comfortable living conditions and I couldn't be happier. I am a simple man and I don't need much to keep me happy; so this job suits me to a "T."

Wherever I go in life, I am always going to cherish the friends I have made here at school and the experiences I have encountered (going abroad to South Africa really helped to shape a unique world view). Not many people can say that they have managed to have a major, a minor, and a certificate (Five-College Certificate of African Studies), play a varsity sport for four years, learn four languages, and maintain a social life that revolves around "hanging out" here at UMass. The Peace Corps is an institution that prides its self on living in a far off place. Plus, you would be helping out people who have not been afforded the opportunities that you have had, and that is a great feeling – to know that you have given something of yourself and have made a difference in someone else's life.

To all the graduating seniors out there who haven't found a job: don't give up hope, there is a job with your name on it out there. It might take awhile, but eventually it will present itself. To all of the seniors out there who have a job lined up: I told ya' "the sun has got to shine on a dog's ass some day."

Take care, you all. I'm outta here and on to Guinea for awhile.

Spring Concert brings variety of sounds to Mullins

By Michael Delano Ryan
Benharris & David Katzoff
Collegian Staff

You know Method Man and Redman love you when they play a hit song not once, but twice consecutively. At the tail end of their performance, after one of the duo's onstage cohorts who frequently addressed the crowd asked the audience to say "blackout" on the count of three, the lights went down and the infamous bass noise that signals the beginning of "Da Rockweiler" filled the Mullins Center. Everybody bounced accordingly and at the end of that spirited rendition the crowd was asked if they wanted to hear it again, which of course they did, and the siren returned.

Meth and Red tore through the short track again with just as much energy as the first time, although for the second round they jumped onto the guard rails at the far right and left of the stage, surrounded by ecstatic fans. Unfortunately, the spotlight, for the duration of the track, couldn't find either rapper, and all but the most eagle-eyed audience members were left in a blackout of their own.

Method Man and Redman opened their fifty-minute set by addressing the baffled crowd as they often do over the microphone from backstage, although things didn't really get moving until they burst on the stage with "Time 4 Sum Aksion." The two then kept their promise of keeping it old school by running through solid versions of Meth's incredible "Bring the Pain," Red's "Pick It Up," and the weed anthem "How High."

It wasn't until after a short freestyling session from members of Detroit's Outsidaz that the duo broke into any material from their recent release Blackout!, "Y.O.U." has some wacky synchronized dance moves, and "Tear It Off" was dedicated to all the wrestling fans in the house and was given a Michael Buffer-style intro. Both then busted out their solo hits, Meth with "Judgement Day" and "Dangerous Grounds," and Red with "I'll Be Dat," marking, after Beenie Man's energetic set, the one millionth time Umass was asked "who got the keys to my beamer?" An extended pause during the second half of the set so a girl could come on stage and pull her shirt up proved a little tiresome, but overall the show was a great time with bouncing performances and a few cool surprises.

Some things are just worth waiting for. There is no question that LBC was represented on Sunday night.

Even though they were very adamant about not being advertised as Sublime, The Long Beach Dub All Stars were not shy about shelling out some old material that was produced before Sublime lead singer Bradley Nowell died of a Heroine overdose in 1996.

They were very selective about the Sublime songs that were chosen for a set. They played the titled track from 40 Ounces to Freedom after a fan was able to find them some contraband beer that they could not buy because it was a Sunday night. From Sublime's triple-platinum self-titled album they played "The Ballad of Johnny Butt," "April 24, 1992," The only Sublime single that the Long Beach Dub All Stars played was "Summer Time," which they ended their set with.

Though there was quite a bit of Sublime material represented, Long Beach Dub All Stars also brought their own unique sound to the Mullins Center. They were obviously there trying to remove the ever-present monkey off of their backs. The band tried hard to promote their solo albums, and they did a very good job. Though one reporter noted that they looked quite tired before the show, they came out with high energy and optimism.

The band included a saxophone player that brought a very nice touch to their new material. The brunt of the vocals performed were covered by a new lead singer.

Whether or not the Long Beach Dub All Stars were there to represent Sublime, it is certain that they did a good job representing themselves. They were a very diverse sound that mixed very well with the different types of music included during the night.

This March I (Dave) ventured to the parish of Westmoreland, Jamaica seeking musical refuge and cultural enlightenment. During the infamous journey from Montego Bay to Negril, I noticed that tacked to virtually every tree alongside the rocky highway, were hand-painted signs of up coming music venues. The one concert that particularly caught my eye was the Redman/Method Man/ Beenie Man show, which, much to my chagrin, had taken place the previous night. Upon my arrival at the beach, I asked a native if he had gone to see The Doctor? He replied something like, "ya man. Beenie is da wickedest of dem all because he is fah di ladies and da baadmen." I figured this was the ultimate symbol of versatility and respectability for a Jamaican DJ/Singer.

When I discovered that this same bill would headline our very own UMass Spring Concert, I was naturally elated. Since the days of his youth, Beenie Man a.k.a. Moses Davis has been a formidable entertainer and well-respected Selector. As a lyricist, he has consistently churned out some of the hottest tracks on innumerable riddims. From basement tunes like "Old Dog," "Silent Violence," "Tell Me" and "Buda Bada" to political/spiritual songs such as "Steve Biko," "Murderers," "Long Road" and "Farmer Man" to classic pop radio numbers like "Who Am I?" and "Love Me Now," his repertoire is virtually endless.

As he entered the mainstage of the Mullins Center Sunday night, it was evident that this skeletal, charismatic man was indeed The Doctor. Backed by a live band, he proceeded to "educate" his audience about dancehall and how "it is done" in the Caribbean. With musically opulent technique and humorous fervor, he demonstrated his candid ability to win over an audience who had barely heard of him. He sang a wide range of tunes, such as Bob Marley's "No Woman No Cry," a dedication to his mother coupled by his own verse in Patois, a ridiculous rendition of "Billy Jean," and the overdone "Turn Your Lights Down Low" reprise.

While his performance was by no means astounding (as he was when I saw him headline the colossal Reggae Festival in Vermont last summer), his stage time was one of the more memorable events of the evening.

Melissa Ferrick returns to Horse

By David Siegel
Collegian Staff

On Monday night, singer/songwriter Melissa Ferrick made a return trip to the Iron Horse Music Hall for two sold-out capacity shows. Ferrick, who has recently released her fifth studio album "Freedom," has received strong support from the Five College Area, especially from the women of Smith College. Melissa Ferrick's strength most certainly is her live performance, which was quite evident during her first performance beginning at 7 p.m. Opening up was the live piece, female band Antigone Rising who put on a solid and exciting live song set. This band, remaining in the area after their performance at the UMass Spring Concert on Sunday night is led by the spiritual vocals of lead singer Cassidy. They have an incredibly unique sound that will certainly take them places.

Melissa Ferrick came to the stage at about 7:45 p.m. to the delight of the mostly female audience. Unlike her studio albums, Ferrick's live performances are solo, making for a particularly intimate experience. From the start, she showed her enthusiastic playing on "Freedom," the title track from her new CD. Although her solid guitar playing holds her music together, her strong, intense vocals make her performances so special. Her music is most commonly classified as folk, however her sound would be better categorized as "power folk."

At no time throughout the performance did I feel that the music was boring or that maybe Ferrick had hit a lull in her songs/ritting. She was extremely intense, very often drowning out her own guitar playing with her emotional lyrics.

COURTESY WHAT ARE RECORDS?

Melissa Ferrick brought soft sounds to the Iron Horse this past week.

She traveled through her set with great speed, making her short hour and fifteen minute set feel like much longer. She played solid versions of "It's Alright" and "Win 'em Over," both off her new CD release. The highlight of the show occurred during her mainstream radio single, "Everything I Need," where she broke out into Train's hit single "Meet Virginia" with teases to Sheryl Crow's "Leaving Las Vegas" and Melissa Etheridge's hit "Come to My Window." She went on to play a bunch of songs from all of her albums, including "Don't Say Goodbye," "North Carolina" and finally ending the set with the steamy "Drive" with its provocative, sultry lyrics and style.

I went into this show not fully sure of what to expect, but I was pleasantly surprised with Melissa Ferrick's intense music and gutsy performance. She seemed to fit it all on the line, making me wonder how she was going to play another complete set for the crowd lined up along Center Street as we exited.

My way of a visionary Democracy; prolific arts writer bids final goodbye

By David Katzoff
Collegian Staff

As this being the curtain call for my indecisively illustrious career as a music journalist, I am using this final installment as an opportunity to forthwrite some lingering thoughts I am having about America before I plunge into its belly. Admittedly, I savor this life we live in these United States not because I am proud of our heritage or because I equate patriotism with divinity, but simply because I am incessantly fascinated with society. I am obsessively engrossed in popular culture. I maintain a distinctive hunger for analyzing music, media and politics. But foremost, I am interested in promoting the awareness, progression and succession of our population.

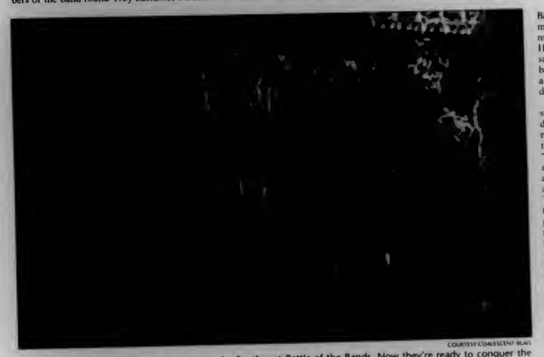
Collectively we resemble the patterns of a colorfully thicknet tapestry, threaded by the yarns of oppression, imperialism and suffering and sewn together with the beautiful cloths of diversity and multiculturalism. Stated in the prophetic pop song "people make the world go 'round," the backlash of injustice and discrimination has, in many facets, been as influential in revolving America's identity as our Constitution. Ironically, the same atrocities that have historically tainted this land have inspired our most brilliant leaders and prominent movements. Conquering the assumption that depression is the ultimate means of expression, the dialect of deprivation has become one of our most incandescent languages. Hip-hop culture alone is a palpable example of this backlash.

Since the horrific conquest and establishment of America, our nation has been tortidly boiling with contentation and unrest. Although change is never forked over to those who solicit it, but rather won over by those who use their forks to stir society and demand it; slightly beneath the binding concepts of our union, there is a struggle to challenge the current of "normality." Change is a war waged on the ethereal battlefields of ideology and Americans are the assimilated constituents of combat. As citizens of the world's most dominant country, we are the obligatory soldiers of freedom, the torchbearer's of righteousness and the agenda-setters morality. However, American citizenship and its meaning, is overwhelmingly held hostage by to the ideological interests of our hegemony. Consequently, America's most omnipresent conflict, our most adversarial enemy, subsists within the fabric of our own society. In propagating and saturating a unanimous understanding (or misunderstanding) of democracy, the population is putty in the hands of the powerful and affluent. Since information is the vindicator connecting awareness and complicity between people and popular government, the democratic system, which has been the bread and butter of the American character, is persistently stifled by a tyrannical power that controls the flow of information. In the hyper-stimulated media age of today, it is become increasingly difficult to operate politically and socially as democratic citizens.

Because the media industry, which supplies us with our news, entertainment, advertisements and public relations, is a big business conglomerate, we are primarily provided with the monotone voice of corporate speech. Domestically, this affects our social and political policies directly; and while the mega-mergers and inner-linc eager continue to coagulate at the top of our economic hierarchy, the gap between the elite and the "have nots" expands, further depriving the underclass of its justifiable "piece of the pie."

Yet through concrete solution and honest effort, we can balance these ghastly discrepancies. We are a democracy, "a government by the people, of the people, and for the people." We must unite and rectify the playing together for a bit, and then Rehberg introduced him to Leo Blais.

Though it became shear coincidence that Hunt and Leo Blais met up, the idea of putting together a band was not far off of anyone's mind. "Me and Tim had been trying to put together a band for a while," Leo Blais said. "I spotted Tim bringing an upright to his car, and asked if he wanted to jam. We all found each other through other people and word of mouth."



It was only just a little over a month ago that Coelescent Blais was truly established. The first four members of the band found Troy LaRusso, a freshman resident of the Dickinson residence hall to be the drummer that they had been looking for. From the time that the band found LaRusso to the time that they played Battle of the Bands, they only able to practice together approximately ten times.

Though the band is just beginning to work together, they know where their inspirations have come from. Leo Blais has grown up listening to Radiohead, Sting and the Gypsy Kings. Blais said that one of the people who inspired him most was his friend who is a classical guitarist. Hunt proclaims himself as a "metal head who likes jam bands." Rehberg "has a certain respect for music, especially jazz." LaRusso truly loves jam bands, especially Phish. LaRusso said, "I'm known as the Phish head on my floor. People get really surprised if they hear me listening to anything else." The band describes itself as coming from a "mixed bag of inspiration."

Coelescent Blais certainly credits a lot of their quickly produced fan following to their friends and family. Hunt said, "We've had a lot of great response from people who have been really supportive." LaRusso added, "We really want to thank our friends and fans."

As for what the band hopes to become, they clearly are looking towards the future. Though they jokingly said that there is not enough time in the day to do everything that they want, they would like to focus on an album this summer, and will continue to practice together, and play various shows. This Thursday, the band is playing a Southwest cookout near Moore and Pierpont.

Brian Hunt describes his band best when he says, "We're all extremely talented in our own different ways." After the Southwest Battle of the Bands, it seems that the difference of talent may be the driving force behind Coelescent Blais' opportunity at wonderful success.

Southwest Battle of Bands' Runners Up Coalescent Blais look to establish a name

By Ryan Benharris
Collegian Staff

At last Friday's Southwest Battle of the Bands, five acts competed for the chance to kick off Sunday's Spring Concert. For those of you who were at the Mullins Center on Sunday, you know that Traveling Matt walked away with the honor. The other bands that were represented included Joint Custody, One Entertainment, Optimus Prime, and runner-up, Coelscent Blais. The last band mentioned miraculously was able to get on the bill after only playing together for a month. Whatever they did in that short month was enough to place them among UMass' elite local bands.

Coalescent Blais, a name derived from the diverse amount of musical influences that the band members share, and the last name of brothers Nathan and Leo Blais, consists of the two brothers and UMass students Brian Hunt, Tim Rehberg, and newly acquired drummer Troy LaRusso. The band began playing together when Rehberg and Hunt began jamming together sometime last year in the Moore residence hall. As Hunt recalls, they

Oakley shades burning holes in pockets

By Tony Kornheiser
Washington Post

Let young readers be warned: I'm about to get geezoid. The other day my 14-year-old son told me he wanted a pair of those dopey wraparound Oakley sunglasses David Duval wears – the ones that make the wearer look like a total yabbo.

My son had looked them up in an online catalogue, and he could get them for $120.

That seemed a bit pricey for sunglasses – considering when I was his age I could buy a good used car for $120. I asked him what he wanted them for, and he said for golf and baseball.

I said for that kind of cash, he ought to keep them on for 24 hours a day and use them for everything, including his homework.

He said he'd never use Oakleys for homework – he needed other sunglasses for that.

Whoa! Come with me, parents. We've entered a dimension not only of sight and sound, but of poverty. There's the signpost up ahead: We've reached – the Equipment Zone.

My son owns battling gloves, sliding gloves, golf gloves, rollerblading gloves, ice hockey gloves, baseball gloves and skiing gloves. There are also special gloves you buy for cycling, lifting weights, water skiing, being a soccer goalie and catching a football. If your child plays sports, there are probably so many pairs of gloves in your house you feel you could be an Isotoner franchisee.

When I was young there were no such things. Nobody put on a particular glove to go ride a bicycle, or lift a barbell or slide into second base. There was no "middle infielder" glove. There was no "closer" glove.

We had what was quaintly called "a baseball glove." It came in three varieties: 1) a first baseman's mitt; 2) a catcher's mitt and 3) everything else.

Special gloves for racquetball? There was no racquetball.

Kids were advised to toughen up their hands for sports. They could work on a farm for the summer, maybe milk cows.

Sliding shorts? Oh, please. Get a raspberry like the rest of us. (Oops, what I meant was: a "strawberry." It's been a long time since I played.)

It's the same with shoes. There are specialty shoes for everything now. You don't just buy running shoes, but shoes for running different distances. And not just for running different distances, but for running different terrains.

There aren't just special shoes for bowling anymore; there are special shoes for softball, special shoes for volleyball, special shoes for deep sea fishing! There's 15 kinds of Tae-bo shoes, and Tae-bo was just invented last Friday. There's even an "aqua shoe" I had to buy my son for swimming. Silly me, I thought you took off your shoes to go swimming.

What kind of a world do we live in when there's a specific shoe for volleyball? In olden days we had one kind of shoe: sneakers.

One pair for all sports; canvas, $14.99. You want them in a bag, or are you gonna wear 'em out of here?

Yankee announcer spans generations

By Shaun Powell
Newsday

NEW YORK – His home address in Baldwin, N.Y. remains unchanged after more than 50 years. The woman he married 58 years ago is still by his side. He has been a faithful member of the same church for nearly 60 years and, before he retired, had a teaching career at St. John's that stretched seven decades.

Those are the most important constants in Bob Sheppard's life, yet none define him quite like the Ruthian one now being heard in the South Bronx for the 50th straight summer. It begins: "Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen, and welcome to Yankee Stadium. Here are the lineups." The voice, clear and droll, still drips from the loudspeakers. The style, refreshingly unaffected by time and the sports culture, continues to play it straight. The total package is mimicked by many and lampooned by Billy Crystal. It is "the voice of God," according to Reggie Jackson, and remains as much a part of the Yankee Stadium experience as Monument Park. "Until you hear Bob Sheppard's voice at Yankee Stadium," Derek Jeter said, "you're not really at Yankee Stadium."

In at least one respect, Saturday was like any other since 1951, the year the Yankees introduced two rookies who would become immortal: Mickey Mantle and Sheppard. Each player Saturday was introduced, starting with his position, then his uniform number, then his name and after a short pause, his uniform number again.

Sheppard hasn't strayed from that simple formula, not once. He called Joe DiMaggio the same as he now does Ricky Ledee.

Tradition is what sets Yankee Stadium apart from the prissy new retro stadiums that rise in cities faster than the cost of living. Nostalgia serves as an acceptable replacement for modern amenities. You can have a million different choices on the menu at Coors Field in Denver, but Lou Gehrig never played there.

This is why the Yankees will honor Sheppard before Sunday afternoon's game against the Orioles. It's their way of staying true to their philosophy of keeping the Yankees family as intact as possible. For the most storied franchise in sports, traditional figures count for plenty, even if they never played the game.

"It has been pleasant, enjoyable and, at times, thrilling," said Sheppard, who has a policy of not revealing his age.

He announced a charity football game in Freeport in the late 1940s and was recommended to Branch Rickey to announce the football Dodgers' games. After the team folded, he was offered the Yankees job and has been a Stadium fixture since. His first game was April 17, 1951, Yankees vs. Red Sox. His first Yankees batter was left fielder Jackie Jensen, whose number was repeated twice because, Sheppard explains, there were no electronic scoreboards to list the lineups.

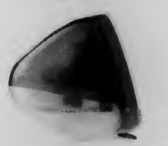
"People weren't always sure who the players were," he said, "so I'd repeat it. If they missed it the first time, they could catch it again in repetition." Modern technology has allowed Sheppard to save his breath, but he figures, why change? He has done more than 4,000 games and 84 postseason games. If he ever mispronounced a name, he won't admit it.

He doesn't trust the phonetic spelling in the team guides. Instead, Sheppard will hustle to either clubhouse and ask the player personally.

An hour before the Yankees beat the Orioles, 7-1, Saturday, Sheppard was in the visitors' clubhouse, searching for an Orioles' relief pitcher.

"Is it Trom-blee or Trumb-lay?" he asked Mike Trombley, who supplied him with the right pronunciation.

"And thanks for asking," Trombley said.



"My mom and dad will appreciate it."

Sheppard never felt any urge or pressure to get fancy. George Steinbrenner has never suggested he change, making Sheppard more untouchable than the manager. Sheppard probably couldn't change even if he wanted. Sundays announcers, especially those who bring a pro wrestling atmosphere to NBA games, make him cringe.

Multiple choice made easy.

Indiana streaking just in Knick of time

The NBA Playoffs have hit year six and while the playoffs are hitting the prime stretch, the Indiana Pacers have hit their stride and just in the nick of time.

The Pacers escape from the Milwaukee Bucks in the first round was just what the doctor ordered for Larry Bird's crew. They were inconsistent, were outplayed and could have easily lost every game in that series.

However, with the series and the future of the Pacers as we know them on the line, their was only one man to turn to, Reggie Miller.

His performance in Game 5 on Thursday night was one of the most memorable in NBA history. He came out with the Superman t-shirt on before the game and shot like him during the fourth quarter. He scored 41 points, including 18 in the final stanza. The Pacers needed every single one of those points, as they held their breath at the end of the game, before horrific clock management and a missed desperation three by Ray Allen finally did the Bucks in.

And what were the Bucks thinking in the last six seconds of the game. Earvin Johnson hits one out of two free throws and cuts the lead to a single point. Then a move which boggles the mind, the Pacers inbound the ball to Miller and the Bucks wait, and wait, and wait, and wait, and wait. Do you see where this is going? They wait four and a half seconds before they foul. I do not care if Miller is shooting 150 percent from the free throw line you foul him.

To make matters worse, the Bucks had a foul to give. Although Jalen Rose missed two from the charity stripe, the Bucks were left with one and one-tenth seconds to shoot instead of four or five. That is when Allen missed the heave and the gun.

That clock management is the coach's fault. George Karl did a pathetic job of getting his team to realize that you have to foul anybody at that point in the game. That is something the former Sonics' coach will have to live with all summer.

However, while the Bucks are out playing golf, the Pacers are having their way with the Philadelphia 76ers in the second round. The first two games have shown which of the two teams is most mature.

The Pacers lead the series two games to nothing after a 103-97 win in game two on Monday night. While Miller has continued his hot shooting, it has been the emergence of Rose that has been the big reason for the Pacer resurgence.

Criticized by Bird for not doing a good job in the first round and keeping up his end of the bargain, Rose has been the man in the first two games.

He, along with Miller scored 40 points apiece in game one and Rose scored 30 points in game two taking advantage of the 76ers Toni Kukoc, whose defense movement is looking more and more like a trash can's. And unless the 76ers can find a way to stop Rose, their season will be going into the same place.

Another key for the 76ers will be finding someone to compliment Allen Iverson. Although Iverson seems to have more injuries than Patrick Ewing, or at least more real ones, he has scored 28 points in each of the first two games.

However, he has been easily frustrated by the Pacers and that anger over his team's ineptitude led to a fourth quarter ejection in game one and a nine for 25 shooting performance in game two.

Philadelphia has not been in this series as of yet and maybe home cooking will turn the trick. But, the 76ers will now be without the services of starting point guard Eric Snow with a fractured ankle. As the 76ers go home for games three and four, the pressure of second fiddle to Iverson now falls squarely on the shoulders of Snow's replacement, Aaron McKie.

McKie had 25 points and 11 assists in a game four win against Charlotte in the first round. Now for the 76ers to push the Pacers in this series they will have to push the pace and it starts with McKie's ability to handle the ball. The Pacers swept the 76ers out of the playoffs last season. The 76ers were in a position of vulnerability once their confidence was shot after being easily handled in the first two games at Conseco Fieldhouse. That spells trouble for Philly, especially against a team coached by a master of the "foot on the throat" mentality.

Bird will have his team ready to deliver the knockout punch for this series. He had that mentality as a player for the Celtics. Now in his last run as head coach of the Pacers, he does not want to take anything for granted. He knows how close the Pacers were from a long and questionable off-season in round one. He will relay that message to his team and the Pacers will realize the urgency of putting teams away in the playoffs. I see Philly winning game three, but Indiana will take the last games and win the series in five. The Pacers will need all the rest they can get, because an arch nemesis of playoff's past might be just around the corner.

Penny and Shaq not the duo they were supposed to be with Orlando

By Mark Heisler
Los Angeles Times

LOS ANGELES – Whatever happened to the puppet?

So much has happened, it's difficult to remember that by 23, Anfernee "Penny" Hardaway was a monster, that he and Shaquille O'Neal, also 23, had already been to the NBA finals and were expected to live there in a future that plainly belonged to them.

Nike tailored a new concept for the soft-spoken Hardaway, inventing a wisecracking alter ego named Little Penny to appear with him in a series of commercials. (In what could have been seen as a sign of trouble, Shaq knocked a chirping puppet off his couch in one of his Reebok spots.)

Big Penny – in those days, you stipulated which Penny was which – even out-gunned Michael Jordan, himself, in a memorable TV game and Indiana Pacer President Donnie Walsh noted, "This kid is going to be a great player. He's the next Michael, Magic (Johnson), (Larry) Bird."

It's funny how things work out, even if no one laughs.

Five years after the young Magic made the finals, nary a starter is left in Orlando. Shaq is a joker, expected to win his first MVP and, perhaps, his first title.

There's only one Penny these days and he's a Phoenix Sun. You don't have to stipulate between Big and Little now because Nike retired Little one to the big woodpile in the sky. Hardaway didn't become the next Mike, Magic or Bird. You could get a lot of opinions on exactly what he did become – and if it's worth $9 million – but even those closest to Hardaway concede he's not what he once was.

"Oh, that's true," Hardaway says. "That's true.

"I mean, everybody knows that Penny Hardaway, when he came to this league, was jumping like Shawn Marion. But after two knee surgeries, I have to admit I don't have the same leaping ability. It comes and goes."

Beset by injuries, Hardaway missed 23, 53 and 10 games, respectively, in the three seasons after Shaq left. Hardaway's scoring average fell from 20.5 to 16.4 to 15.8.

He was personable, ambitious and hard-working but he was also insecure and arch-sensitive, ill-fitted to be a franchise player, especially in Orlando, where fans had been so spoiled. He had problems with coaches Brian Hill and Chuck Daly, the team's medical staff, complained the front office didn't back him up and the press was out to get him.

Last summer, he opted out of a contract that would have paid him $9.4 million, persuading the Magic, which was already shopping him, to take whatever it could get.

His preferred option was the Lakers. He called to pitch himself to O'Neal, who passed the message on, but Jerry West didn't like Hardaway's price tag. Hardaway wound up going to Phoenix for two reserves and two draft picks.

Thus started the comeback... slowly.

Through March 22, when Jason Kidd went down, Hardaway had missed 22 games and was averaging 16.5 points, light for the player the Suns had hoped would put them over the top, even if he did everything – defend, rebound, give them a second point guard on the floor.

Since, it has been like old times, especially his last game playoff against the San Antonio Spurs, when he attacked the basket like the old Hardaway, and his first against the Lakers when he was the lone Sun ray, scoring 25 points.

"Now everybody's jumping on the Penny bandwagon," Kidd says. "He gets to go back home and have the last laugh."

Not that it's over but Hardaway can allow himself a smile, at least, and it has been a long time coming. They should have been the next dynasty.

When the Magic made the '95 NBA finals, O'Neal and Hardaway were 23, Dennis Scott was 26, Nick Anderson 27, and Horace Grant, the elder statesman of the starters, 29.

In the second round, they eliminated the Bulls and Jordan, returning from his baseball career, winning two games in Chicago.

In Game 1 of the finals, they had a 20-point lead over Houston before halftime... before Anderson missed four late free throws... and lightly regarded Kenny Smith sidestepped Hardaway with 1.6 seconds left in regulation to make a game-tying three-point shot... and the Rockets won, 120-118, on Hakeem Olajuwon's rebound basket at the end of overtime.

After that, the Magic, finally showing its youth, crumbled and was swept from the finals, never, it thing should fall into place, but there's no guarantees."

As of now, UMass lurks in the second place spot of the A-10 East and its entry into the tournament is anything but carved into stone. Its fate will be sealed this weekend, when it welcomes conference rival St. Joseph's (19-31, 4th place A-10 East) to town.

This week also marks the last Lorden appearance for five of the Minuteman seniors, all of whom leave their coach and Amherst with lasting impressions.

Stone made the following comments about the departing five:

Shaun Skeffington - "Shaun's a real good kid. He's a scrapper. He hasn't had the type of year he really wanted but he's hung in there for us and has been a good leader."

Travis Veracka – "He's the guy who we can count on... everyday – he's just a dominating pitcher."

Todd Samolewicz – "He's pitched quality innings for us, and great innings in the Beanpot. He's had a good senior year."

Kevin O'Connell – "He's had a real good year. He hung in the first two years, got a pretty substantial chance to play, and then he solidified himself as a starter. It's a nice thing to see."

Steve Asadoorian – "He's kind of struggled this year but towards the end he's been a positive ingredient to our ball club and he's made a lot of positive contributions."

The senior series-finale begins on Saturday with a doubleheader starting at noon. The third game, on Sunday, will begin at the same time.

There's no doubt at all: Shaq's modern-day Wilt

By Steve Jacobson
Newsday

In the great time machine, imagine Shaq back-to-chest, chest-to-back sweat-to-sweat with Wilt. No last names necessary across the backs of their jerseys, just the thunder of their footsteps.

Marvel at their sheer strength as they shuck off defenders as if Lilliputians. And giggle at the clank of the ball off the rim when either shoots a free throw. Each is listed as 7-1 and opponents would swear they 7-3 or 7-4. They have so much in common. Remember the title of Wilt's first book was "Nobody roots for Goliath."

The line of evolution runs from Wilt to Shaq. The cutting shr Shaq hears, "won everywhere he played except college and the pros," could have been said about Wilt.

Now consider that Chamberlain, the greatest scoring machine in history, won the first of his two championships in his eighth season. Shaq, potentially the most devastating force of his time, is playing his eighth season.

"Certainly, Shaq is the 2000 version of Wilt," said Bob Cousy, who raced around Chamberlain's knees as a player and watches O'Neal as a broadcaster. In the great Celtics dynasty, Cousy's interest was against Wilt; now he finds himself rooting against Shaq.

The upset of the Lakers surviving their first round with the Kings was that the Kings won two games. Shaq scored 32 in the finale; he made two of seven free throws, a dreary 43 percent in the series. So what else is new?

"You hear the same complaints from Shaq as from Wilt: they're calling one out of five, beating me up because of my size, and I'm not sure it's not justified," Cousy said. Before Chamberlain, really big men were, as Cousy put it, "more in the line of Frankenstein monsters." Then came Bill Russell and Kareem Abdul-Jabbar and on to O'Neal, who is remarkably will coordinated.

"Wilt as the first great seven-footer had greater challenges," said Willis Reed, who with the Knicks banged against Wilt on the court and as a Nets executive sees Shaq. "He made it easier for Shaq to be accepted for his size."

Both presented essentially docile giants. Chamberlain played before the great marketing era. His original sin was that at Kansas he lost to North Carolina in the NCAA championship. Shaq's image was created with rap music, video games and mindless films.

Chamberlain was a good quarter-miler in college, a great volleyball player and nobody laughed when he talked about fighting All. Shaq is deceptively agile and runs the court.

Wilt's scoring and rebounding records are of another world. In each of his first seven seasons he averaged 33 or more points. In '61-62 he averaged 50.4. "I always called him 'Mr. Chamberlain,'" said Reed, who was a smaller dog at 6-10. "If he was angry, he'd destroy your team. If he made free throws, it would have been 60." His career free throw-shooting was 51 percent.

Shaq's overall average has been 27.1, this year 29.7. He shoots 53 percent from the line.

"Even before this year, Shaq was more integrated with the other four on the court," Cousy said. "He has become a rounded player. Wilt had his singular mentality that he had to score. Everybody waited for Wilt." Except for the season he was angry with the writers and decided to lead the league in assists. "He wasn't difficult in terms of what we call a difficult person today," Cousy said, "but to me, he never completely got it."

trio

"She always comes in and does the job for us," she said. "She's a good team player."

Minaker calls Gorski "one of the quickest on the team", as well as very unpredictable.

"No one knows what she's going to do, or which way she's going to go. She's a very smart player, she always knows where to shoot."

According to Kain, Gorski works hard on the field, despite problems with her knees.

"I give her so much credit, she comes out here every day and works her butt off. She's a great player, always hustles, she never gives up," Kain said. "I lookup to her so much because of everything she's been through, she's an awesome player."

Katie Carey, from Abington High School in Abington, Penn. was a walk-on freshman and won a spot on the team. She played in all 13 games that season, scoring three goals.

After tearing her ACL, Carey did not play during her sophomore year; she came back as a junior, though, to play in nine games. This year, more medical problems haunted Carey's season, having knee surgery early in the season.

Barnes describes Carey as a hard worker.

"She works really hard in practice. She's an emotional leader for our team, without her the team would look really different."

Carey described her four years with UMass as "a real family".

"It's cool because there's so many of us [seniors] that the team changes a lot [through her four years] but it never really changes at all. I love lacrosse, I loved school," she said.

Her fondest memory of her time with the Minutewomen was the A-10 Championship.

"Beating them [Temple] twice," Carey said was also a memory she'd like to keep.

Carey will go into the work force after graduation, working for the Arthur Anderson accounting firm in Boston.

Minaker describes Carey as "Probably one of the hardest working people I know, both on and off the field."

"She has a very strong drive, she's very competitive."

Kain called Carey "awesome."

"She comes out and gives 110 percent, every time. When she's not out on the field she's on the sidelines cheering the team on. She loves the team and it's always good to have her around," she said.

Ambrose calls Carey "one of the strongest people I know" in terms of sheer perseverance.

"She never gives up her encouragement," she said.

Offensive trio leaves atop A-10

While each offered the championship team different attributes, Pavlick, Gorski, and Carey were cherished

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team was known this season for its almost impenetrable defense. Ranked third in the country, there aren't many teams that can put the sphere into the UMass net. However, without an offense that can rattle the cage, that third ranked defense would be useless.

Seniors Stephanie Pavlick, Noelle Gorski, and Katie Carey lead the Minutewomen offense. The three seniors leave the team riding high on their recent defeat of Temple to capture the Atlantic 10 Conference Championship.

"They all have different styles of play," senior co-captain Rebecca Minaker said of the three senior offensive players, "but they all compliment each other. I'm going to miss playing with them."

Stephanie Pavlick, from Blue Bell, Penn. has led the team this year in goals (35), total points (41), and ground-balls (40).

JANET BARR / COLLEGIAN

Stephanie Pavlick has emerged as the top offensive threat for the women's lacrosse team, scoring 41 points this year.

In her four-year career at UMass, Pavlick has recorded 71 goals and 21 assists for a total of 92 points.

Majoring in communication disorders, she plans to coach college-level lacrosse for a couple of years, before moving onto graduate school where she hopes to study special education.

Pavlick has the distinction of being on both the A-10 All-Conference Team and the A-10 All-Championship Team. She tallied five times in the A-10 Championship series, including the game-winning goal against Temple.

Sophomore midfielder Christie Ambrose describes Pavlick as "awesome."

"You always know something good is going to happen when she goes in," Ambrose said.

Coach Phil Barnes said that Pavlick "really came on strong the second half of the season, and became one of our better scorers."

Pavlick defines her fondest UMass lacrosse memory as the Minutewomen's win over Temple in the regular season, in which she tallied once.

Minaker describes Pavlick a "talented".

"She's so quiet but when she speaks, everyone listens. She's always contributing, and she knows the game very well."

Minaker went on to describe Pavlick's ability to communicate with her teammates without talking.

"It's weird, everyone knows what she's going to do," she said.

Freshman midfielder Lori Kain said Pavlick is "our best attacker."

"Stephanie Pavlick is a great person, awesome player."

Noelle Gorski, of Cicero, New York, originally, came back from a mid-year knee injury to prove to be a valuable asset to the team.

Also a communication disorders major, Gorski plans to study speech pathology in grad school.

Gorski was able to contribute 11 points to the Maroon and White this season, in the form of nine goals and two assists. Gorski tallied once in the A-10 Championship series, against Virginia Tech. She also won the draw 13 times this season, behind Fay Naber and Rachel Ingraffea, who had 24 and 19 respectably.

Gorski gave a stellar performance her junior year, finishing 20 goals and six assists. She was also honored as a member of the A-10 All-Conference Team.

Ambrose described Gorski as "the unsung hero" of the team.

Streaking Minutewomen hit wall against UConn

Perey shines with two hits while errors factor in one-run loss to rival

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

Although little was on the line as far as conference standings were concerned, yesterday's 3-2 loss to host Connecticut was certainly not what the Massachusetts softball team needed.

Although UMass (32-21) clinched the Atlantic 10 regular-season title last weekend by sweeping conference foe Rhode Island, the team was hoping to use the game against the Huskies (37-17) as a measuring stick for its chances in the upcoming post-season.

UCONN	3
UMASS	2

The defeat, it seems, brings the Minutewomen back down to earth after floating from their first-place finish.

UMass scored the game's first run in the top of the third inning as the result of a UConn error. Freshman right fielder Anna Perey (two hits) doubled to left field with one out. The next batter, freshman shortstop Emily Robustelli, singled to center, moving Perey to third base. An error by Huskie catcher Amy Blessoff allowed Perey to score. But the lead would not last long.

UConn did all of its damage in the bottom of the same frame, scoring three runs on three hits. The initial Connecticut run was plated when first baseman Abby Link singled to left field, driving in outfielder Nicole Dubovik.

Unfortunately for UMass pitcher Carrie Jeffries (7-8), who was tagged with the loss, only one of the three runs was earned. The other two that followed were allowed as the result of an error by sophomore second baseman Ashley Bakken. Along with sophomore hurler Jen Hadley, Jeffries had been riding a hot-streak after two strong performances against Boston College and Rhode Island, respectively. Against the Rams, Jeffries pitched five scoreless innings to earn her seventh win of the season.

DAN SANTELLA / COLLEGIAN

Sophomore pitcher Jen Hadley (No. 7) and the rest of the Massachusetts softball team will need to regroup for this week's Atlantic 10 Tournament, which will be played at UMass.

Trying to dig themselves out of the two-run hole, the Minutewomen staged a rally in the final at bat in the top of the seventh inning. Sophomore third baseman Scooter Wheeler led off the frame with a double to left-center field. Senior catcher Nikki Faessler, who homered in her final home at bat last Saturday, followed Wheeler with a single, advancing her to third.

With runners on first and third, UMass coached Elaine Sortino usually gives her runner on first the steal sign. The objective is to draw a throw to second base and allot the runner on third enough time to sneak home.

Although Faessler tried to steal second – which did allow Wheeler to score – the senior captain was thrown out on her way to second base. Although UConn conceded the run for an out, the Huskies were in good shape with one out and no runners on base. The rest, as they say, was gravy. Bakken did reach base on an error, but the next two batters made the final outs of the inning.

UMass suffered this momentum-killing defeat as it prepares for the A-10 Tournament, which begins tomorrow and lasts until Friday in Amherst at the new UMass softball complex.

As a result of the regular-season title, the Minutewomen earned the first seat in the play-off bracket, which features only the top four teams in the conference. UMass will look to repeat as tournament champions. Behind the strong arm of current Olympian Danielle Henderson, the team beat host Virginia Tech for the title last year in Blacksburg, Va.

See-saw 2000 season nears end for senior class of five

By Eric Soderstrom
Collegian Staff

There once was a time when nobody knew anything. And that time has passed.

Well...

"Who knows? It's just one of those years."

As the Massachusetts baseball team gets ready for its 43rd game of the 2000 campaign, it does so in the final stretch of a stirring, roller-coaster season, with a head coach (Mike Stone) making statements like the aforementioned quote.

This isn't to say that the first spring term of the millennium hasn't been a successful one for the Minutemen... because their 22 accomplishments thus far, haven't come without a price tag.

It's been a flirtatious year with the .500 mark for the Beanpot Champions and it's due to the lack of consistency from both aspects of the UMass attack. When the offense comes to play, the pitching falters, or vice versa. And it's been the familiar story this year for the Maroon and White.

But the Minutemen won't let inconsistency become their novelist. Every so often things come together. And not necessarily before they fall apart (for example, the Beanpot, where strong pitching was complimented with powerful and timely hitting). It's just been the fact that sometimes it's going to be tough.

"We've had opportunities in games all year," Stone said. "We just haven't always done the certain things we needed to do to win."

Today, when the University of Maine (21-24-0) makes its way down to Amherst for a 3 o'clock battle, it does so coming off two losses to Hofstra, both defeats concluding with a one-run deficit. With the Black Bears' apparent restlessness – and a UMass squad looking at every last game with greater consequence because of the approaching A-10 championships – Earl Lorden Field ought to witness an intense contest.

Jesse Santos (2-5, 4.87 ERA) will get the start on the mound today for the Minutemen in hopes of halting a Maine offense led by Joe Drapeau, who is hitting .353 with 13 homeruns and 46 RBI. Drapeau and his counterpart, Mike Ross, are the only Black Bears who have played in every game thus far. Ross is batting .309 with ten round-trippers.

"We're just looking to play a good game, play solid and manufacturer some runs," Stone said. "We're not in [the A-10's] yet. If we play well this week then every-

Water polo deserves school's support

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind. -Following its stunning upset of the fifth-ranked Spartans of San Jose State in Friday's National Championship opening round, the Massachusetts women's water polo team expected Coach Dan McOsker to say any number of things.

He told the players how proud he was of what they had already accomplished. He told them how their triumph over the Spartans was only the beginning of the waves they would make at Nationals. He told them how he had never coached a better group of athletes.

And then he told them that he was giving it all up. On the verge of the program's greatest Nationals finish ever, McOsker was preparing to coach the Minutewomen for the last time.

"I love this team and I love coaching, but I love my family more," McOsker said. "I can't afford to keep doing this without holding the position of a full-time coach."

While many on the team were no douht shocked by McOsker's announcement, those close to the coach knew that the burden of responsibility had been steadily outweighing the support he received from the University. Despite the seemingly endless commitment McOsker had made to the program, he was still only paid as a part-time coach. He was given a shallow-end pool in which to practice, effectively eliminating any chance of the team hosting tournaments at home. And in terms of monetary support, the Minutewomen were endowed with a single, lonely scholarship to divide among their roster.

All of which seems especially incredible when considering the success level the Minutewomen have achieved.

> Adam White

"The top four programs in the country each have eight full scholarships at their disposal," McOsker said. "Most of the teams that finished below us have them, too. We have one. That's why what we did today, finishing fifth in the country, is the equivalent of the men's basketball team going to the Final Four, or even winning the National Championship."

The conventional wisdom is, of course, that water polo is too obscure a sport to necessitate funding at the same level as major revenue programs like basketball and football. Despite being the oldest Olympic sport in existence, water polo doesn't have the fan base to justify sinking serious capital into the program.

But with the recent nose-dive experienced by many of UMass' higher profile sports programs, shouldn't the water polo team's unprecedented success warrant a rethinking of this "conventional wisdom?" After all, wouldn't the ability to host matches at home and an increase in recruiting power be just what water polo needs to achieve a wider level of recognition?

The Minutewomen were absolutely the talk of the national tournament. Throughout the stands, fans from countless other schools across the country were taking up chants of "U-U-U-MA-S-S-S-S" whenever the Maroon and White took to the pool. And yet the team's coach is being forced to walk away at the height of his success because of lack of support from his own university.

"If we had facilities and scholarships, we could very easily challenge for the National Championship," McOsker said. "With the people we've got coming back and the recruiting class we've got coming in, the team is still moving upward. But how far can we go without support from the school?"

So while the UMass Athletic Department continues entertain the ridiculous concept of a Division I football program, and as the big budget men's basketball team slides ever further into the abyss of mediocrity, the school's most successful Division I sports program is forced to absorb the loss of its coach. Despite being the true power and class of UMass, the women's water polo team continues to be treated like an unwanted stepchild.

"This is the most enjoyable group I've ever coached, so of course it's hard for me to leave," McOsker said. "But I just really hope the school considers making this a full time position. The girls deserve a full time coach."

SLSO to litigate Mis-repair case

By Daniel Ruotsinik
Collegian Staff

Filip Muszynski, a doctorate student at the University of Massachusetts, is suing Kevin's Auto in Hadley with the help of the UMass Student Legal Services Offices (SLSO) for damages of over $10,000 dollars, because of what he claims were faulty repairs made by shop owner Kevin Michelson and his employees to his vehicle.

Muszynski brought his 1988 Acura Legend on March 23, 1998 to Kevin's for transmission and axle repairs, and to replace the timing belt, repairs that he said were suppose to cost $1800 and estimated to take one or two days. Two weeks later, after repeated delays, Muszynski discovered that the engine of his car, while being test driven by an employee of Kevin's, had seized.

Kevin's is fighting the suit, claiming that Muszynski was aware of an oil problem before he brought the car in and says, "We have done nothing inappropriate or wrong." Michelson claims that the repairs done by his shop could not have had any effect on the lack of oil pressure, which led to the engine seizure, and is trying to receive payment for the repairs and compensation for storage of Muszynski's vehicle.

According to Muszynski, after a series of delays, lasting from March 23 to April 6, he became aggravated about the length of time the supposedly simple repairs were taking, and went down to the shop to investigate why the repairs were being delayed. Upon his arrival, he claims he was told his car had "developed" additional problems. The engine on his car had seized during a test drive. Muszynski says he then went to look at his car and found the engine disassembled and the camshaft removed.

Muszynski and his lawyers are claiming that during the test drive, the oil pressure warning light had come on and the employee of Kevin's, who was driving the car, continued to operate the vehicle even though the warning light had indicated there was a problem.

Michelson says that all of the delays were authorized by Muszynski and they were all legitimate delays, because of shipping problems. He says, "Mr. Muszynski was called on every occasion." He also says that during the test-drive "the car was towed back here the minute the oil light came on."

Michelson said he had the car towed to three other shops and all of them inspected the vehicle and verified that the damages to the vehicle could not have been the result of the repairs made by Kevin's.

Michelson also says that Muszynski had experienced previous problems with the oil system in his car. According to a receipt from Gateway Motors in Northampton, Muszynski had the oil pan gasket and the oil drain plug replaced on his car five months earlier, bus when the engine seized and Michelson asked him if he ever had oil problems in the past, Muszynski allegedly said no.

Muszynski said "I always take good care of my cars. As soon as I saw something wrong with it I took care of it." He says there was "no problem after repair."

According to a letter from Performance Motoring Inc., one of the repair shops that inspected the vehicle, "the damage that is visible on the camshaft journal is from lack of oil pressure to the camshaft. From what we are able to see at this time, there is no indication that this damage could have been a result of just changing the timing belt." The letter does not mention the repairs done to the transmission or axle.

According to a letter from Michelson's attorney, Daniel J, O'Connell, the vehicle was also brought to Northampton Honda, and they "determined the vehicle to have 'oil starvation' to which work on the transmission and timing belt would not create this problem."

The letter also stated that previously, when Mr. Muszynski brought his vehicle to Gateway Motors in Northampton for repairs, he "became outraged, [and] threatened to sue Gateway Motors for unauthorized repairs," when they changed a "faulty sensor light" without his permission.

According to Michele Leaf, one of the Senior Staff Attorneys at SLSO, "this office does not litigate many cases; mostly what we do is provide advice." Leaf said, "I think it's the kind of case we would like students to be aware of." Because Kevin's actively pursues students as customers by extensively leafleting the campus and offering a student discount, the office felt this was a case that was important to pursue.

Leaf said that the SLSO had previously dealt with complaints against Kevin's. Leaf said, "We've had a number of clients bring cases to small claims courts. A number of clients of this office were people who have filed affidavits against Kevin's Auto." These affidavits were used by the District Attorney's Consumer Protection Division to bring a case to the Attorney General against Kevin's Auto.

Eltringham wins tight election

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

Amidst talk of distrust, the Student Government Association (SGA) voted in its new speaker and associate speaker seats last night, with Senators Jim Eltringham and Michael J. McCarthy winning the two vacant positions in a three-ballot election.

The election was held in three segments, with a nominee eliminated after each round. Eltringham defeated Senator Aaron Saunders 24-19 in the final round of voting.

McCarthy beat out former associate speaker Jen Teixeira 21-19, in the final vote for the seat.

Before the presentations of the nominees, the executive board made its announcements. Seth Avakian, Senate trustee, expressed his discontent with the job Teixeira did this past year. He mentioned spending an entire year sharing the office with Teixeira, and discussed the many problems they had over the year.

"I do not feel that I can trust her," he said.

Senator Mike Redman next endorsed Chair Jen Worcester.

Senator Ken Campbell made his speech next, and in the process addressed Avakian's statement about Teixeira.

"Seth, I don't exactly trust you," Campbell said, "but you're our trustee and I accept that."

Senators were then nominated for the position of Senate Speaker. Senators Eltringham, Saunders, Michael Whitehouse, and chair Worcester were all nominated and subsequently accepted their nominations.

Saunders, who lost in the final vote for speaker to Eltringham, said, "I think Jim will be great for the Senate."

McCarthy and Senator Andrew Bail, as well as former Associate Speaker Teixeira, and Asian Latino African Native American (ALANA) Caucus representative Patrick Callahan were all nominated for the position of associate speaker.

Eltringham, running with Teixeira, presented first, and stressed the importance of having an orientation session for new senators to help them get used to procedure.

"These meetings drag on because people don't know the procedure," he said.

He also commented on the lack of publicity on the open seats in the Senate, and talked of his ideas to fill those seats.

"Every vacant seat is 250 people who are not represented," he said.

Saunders presented his platform next, focusing mainly his past accomplishments.

"When looking for someone to lead a body, you're looking for a leader," Saunders began.

One of his main issues was the possibility of an out-door Spring Concert, and when asked if he knew how often that idea is brought before the administration and subsequently shot down, Saunders commented that he'd "like to know what I can do about it."

Whitehouse, eliminated in the first round of voting, started his speech by stating how much power the speaker holds, meaning that the Senate, as opposed to the president who is voted on by the students, elects the speaker.

Whitehouse commented on the power the SGA used to have, when the students were behind it.

"Now the students think the SGA is only looking out for its own interests," Whitehouse said. "I think it's high time that we at the SGA make a stand to regain the respect that we've lost."

Worcester, who was knocked out in the second round of voting, also spoke on the need to train new senators.

"New senators need to be trained immediately," she said. She then spoke on the lack of motions proposed by senators this year.

"Jeff and Seth have done a lot this year, they've had a lot of good motions, but that's our job," she said.

McCarthy, running for associate speaker, expanded on the notions of senator training by including current senators as well as new senators.

"I plan on going to every senator, not just the new senators," he said.

Continuing on to the idea of unity within the executive board, McCarthy said: "I differ on a lot of issues [with the other executive board members] but I can work with them."

He commented that the differing political beliefs in the executive board would give the SGA an "ability to bring two different views to the students and still be able to work together."

Teixeira spoke next, beginning with her past in the SGA, and continuing on to her ideas to bring more motions from the senators, as well as commenting on increasing the quality of the motions.

When asked why she was running for associate speaker and not the speaker seat, Teixeira said "I already know what the role entails. I like the role."

Callahan, who was knocked out in the second vote, said he would work with the Public Policy and Relations board and the New Students Program to increase recruitment.

When asked what his most important quality was, Callahan replied, "I like humans," and his ability to interact with his constituents.

Bail began his presentation by unofficially dropping out of the race.

"I'm not the right man for the job," he said.

When asked if he was serious, Bail replied, "If you don't want the other three nominees, I'm the dark horse."

The meeting lost quorum immediately after the ballots were totaled and the winners announced.

Administration drills dental clinic

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts administration has decided to go forth with its decision to close the Health Services (UHS) Dental Clinic effective July 1 due to a drop in funding.

The decision to close the clinic was announced in January when Health Services was notified by the administration that the health care fee would be cut over the next three years by 33 percent.

A proposal was later submitted by the SEIU, Local 509, to keep the clinic operating. However, Javier Cevallos, interim vice chancellor for student affairs, said the University administration had spent several weeks reviewing the proposal, but said, "ultimately, financial considerations make the closing mandatory."

According to Cevallos, the clinic has not been able to cover its costs for several years and the University recorded a loss of $260,000 dollars last year. The Union's proposal projected a surplus of about $14,000 dollars, but the administration agreed that it would not be enough to sustain the clinic if there were to be any unexpected absence or resignation of a practitioner.

Bev Mayor, manager of UHS Dental Clinic disagrees with these allegations and said the administration failed to give the clinic an opportunity to "prove themselves self-sustainable."

"When they [administration] were told about the cuts, we were already half-way through the year and they needed to find something to eliminate as soon as possible," Mayor said. "Because Dental Services was running in the red, it was a knee-jerk response to cut us without considering what they were going to be taking away from the students."

According to Mayor, the administration failed to take into consideration how the Amherst dental community would be able to accommodate the students into their schedules.

"I don't think they'll be able to find this type of service in the Amherst community," Mayor said. "I have personally talked to three of the area dentists who told me they're not going to be able to see all of our patients."

In addition, Mayor says the types of service incentives offered by the clinic cannot compare to those being offered by dental health providers in the area. She stated that they offer two, two-hour emergency sessions each day focused on caring for students with immediate dental needs. She said other dentists don't even offer emergency dental care with such ease and accessibility, and will sometimes leave their patients waiting hours before being tended to.

Dental Services also has the lowest fee rate among local dental clinics, Mayor says. They offer a 10 percent discount on preventative services such as dental cleaning, X-rays and dental exams. Another 10 percent discount is offered if students pay the same day of service. According to Mayor, a dental cleaning would cost a student $53 dollars, but with the 20 percent maximum discount the student would only have to pay a compensatory price of $42 dollars.

Mayor said the Dental Clinic has had difficulties in the past with maintaining dental staff to operate the office. Currently, she said there are three dentists who operate the clinic on a weekly basis. Cevallos stated that the clinic has had difficulties attracting and retaining dentists.

According to Mayor, they made a proposal that the dental employees would be paid based on productivity, thus the amount of patients that came through the clinic.

However, Mayor said Cevallos didn't like this model and said to her, "Your dentists don't like this proposal and they're not going to stay and that means you're going to have to recruit new dentists and we don't feel you can do that fast enough to make it work."

Cevallos said such a model without benefits that is based solely on commissions would not meet the University's standards.

"The application of this private-setting model to UHS is an interesting concept, but we are skeptical of our ability to attract and retain such dentists, and are not convinced that the model matches our setting," Cevallos said. "Maintaining full staffing has been a long-standing problem and we do not see any data to convince us that this difficulty has been overcome."

According to a statement, Cevallos said that another area of concern weighing on the decision was the uneven utilization of the clinic between the first and second halves of the fiscal year. Cevallos explained that this phenomena has a direct impact on the clinic's productivity and thus on the dental employees wages.

"Although we understand that increased revenue projections are based on increased productivity, not on artificially inflating utilization for the second half of the year, we are concerned about the long-term fiscal stability when usage varies so dramatically," Cevallos stated.

The Union presented their proposal to sustain the Dental Clinic on April 12, and received a letter from the administration on May 1 stating they had considered it, "but because dentists were not on-board and were not willing to stay with the proposal because the proposal wasn't attractive to them."

However, Mayor said there hasn't been any present indication leading her to believe that there was "a lack of care" due to the number of staffing at the clinic. In fact, she said most students had responded and continue to respond positively to the clinic's fast and reliable service.

It's a service that, she says, proved its point when UHS performed a campus-wide survey on the kinds of services students would like to have. According to Mayor, the students had overwhelmingly favored the dental clinic among the list of services.

"They had dental in the list, but it's too late to save dental clinic now," Mayor said. "This should have been asked before any decisions were made to make the cuts."

Ottoman Empire comes alive

NAKKAS OSMAN/TOPKAPI PALACE MUSEUM

"A portrait of Ottoman ruler Mehmet II on display at Washington's Corcoran Gallery of Art."

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

Art History Professor Walter Denny regularly spoke about the "Palace of Gold and Light: Treasures from the Topkapi, Istanbul," an exhibit at the Corcoran Gallery of Art, in his Orientalism in Western Art class. Denny, as Senior Advisor to the display, had spent months dividing his time between his teaching in Massachusetts and overseeing the displays in Washington. He regretted, though, that his students would be unable to see the actual exhibit.

What Denny had not expected was that Kenan Sahin, one of the show's backers, would set aside funds for college students studying Turkey and the Middle East to travel to, and view, the exhibit. Thanks to Sahin, on May 5, students from Denny's class, as well as History Department Chair Mary Wilson's Middle East History II class, flew from Bradley International Airport to Connecticut to view the relics first-hand.

"In all of the years I've been teaching, it was the first time I'd ever been able to take my students on a first-class field trip," Denny said.

The exhibit includes roughly 300 works of art, almost all of them taken from the Topkapi Palace in Istanbul, Turkey. Much of the work dates back to the 15th Century, when Ottoman ruler Mehmed II overthrew Constantinople and renamed it Istanbul.

According to Denny, the gallery is divided into five sections, each demonstrating different points.

The first, titled, "The conqueror and his court," deals with the artifacts of Mehmed, and details Mehmet's lavish possessions, and the types of art favored by his court. The second is titled "Mysteries of kingship," and, according to Denny, shows the way that "the king was made to look not human, but divine." The third, "Running a bureaucratic state," examines the lives of those who worked with the sultan. The fourth, "Hidden palace," details the life of the sultan in the harem, and the fifth, "The production of magnificence," is a tribute to the many different types of artists of the Ottoman court.

Paintings and sculptures generally come to mind when one thinks of an art exhibit, yet "Palaces of Gold and Light" features mostly artifacts like carpets, candle holders, mirrors and clothing.

"Things like textiles, armor, jewels and regalia really are art history," says Denny, "but it's not the kind of art we think of in the Western tradition. That just goes to show how narrow we are.

"This exhibit," he continues, "can broaden your horizons about what art is."

President Clinton, in a statement to the Corcoran Gallery, praised the Republic of Turkey for its "generous loan" of the materials on display.

"The royal treasures of the Sultans reflect the rich and diverse culture of the Ottoman Empire," said Clinton.

"The exhibit was incredible," said Simon Pengratz and Shideh Shafie, two of Professor Wilson's students. "We were overwhelmed by the realization that the Sultan had, at one time, used some of the objects displayed. The rooms were filled with artifacts that reflected the absolute power and wealth of the Ottoman Empire at its height."

According to court documents, The Attorney General brought a civil action against Kevin's Auto in 1997 to "restrain the defendant... from committing unfair or deceptive acts or practices in violation of" certain consumer protection laws and the Attorney General's Motor Vehicle Regulations. The Attorney General accused Kevin's of "making or authorizing to be made statements which it knows to be, or in the exercise of reasonable care should be known to be untrue or misleading. Specifically, that repairs have been done on a vehicle when such is not the case; charging customers for repairs which have not actually been performed; charging customers for repairs without having first obtained the customer's written authorization for specific repairs and their costs; and proceeding with repairs when costs exceed authorized price by more than $10 without obtaining further authorization of customer."

Michelson said the previous case was "a paperwork issue" and he was not found guilty of the charges.

Michelson denied the material allegations of the complaint, but agreed to an out of court settlement that required him to abide by certain rules concerning his conduct and the conduct of his employees, and to pay a $5,000 settlement.

Michelson said, "[SLSO] knows that this case is frivolous in nature. The very fact they tried to involve the Collegian is an attempt to malign my character. I find that the UMass Legal Services utilizing a university newspaper to malign my character concerning a case that has nothing to do with my repairs, is a direct attempt by the office to harm my business and cost me revenue."

Leaf said, "What Filip wanted was for Kevin to take responsibility and fix the engine. What Kevin wanted was for Filip to pay for the engine to be repaired, but without an engine there was no way to verify that the transmission had been repaired. After being unable to reach a resolution Filip had to purchase another car."

Tom Coish, another Senior Staff Attorney with UMass Legal Services said, "At that point he offered to sell Kevin the car."

Muszynski says he originally offered to sell Michelson the vehicle at the cost of $5500, the original price he paid for it.

Muszynski's said his reason for suing for damages is because of the inconvenience Kevin's caused him. "It was winter, I had to live for a month without a car. I had to take my laundry across town for an hour. My brother was visiting from Poland. It was tremendous aggravation. Daily I would call [Kevin's]. Delays affected me for a month. I was nerve racked. I was powerless against this. I could either take the car, which was in pieces for a piece of junk. My brother had to take a bus to school. My wife had to take a bus to school. I remember several days standing in the freezing rain."

Muszynski says the $10,000 he is suing for includes the cost of purchasing another vehicle at a total expense of $8008.88, several various fees and expenses and $240 per week for each of the six weeks that he was without a car.

Student injured on Everest

By Cristopher Rees
The Daily Universe (Brigham Young U.)

(U-WIRE) PROVO, UT – A Brigham Young University student remains injured on Mt. Everest after attempting to guide the oldest recorded climber to the top. Stacy Taniguchi, a 47-year-old doctoral student from Hawaii, injured his knee while coming through the Khumbu Ice Falls, a moving river of ice under a makeshift bridge of fastened ladders, on April 25.

"They were holding their breath the whole time," said Luann Taniguchi, Stacy Taniguchi's wife.

"The river was shifting under them and Stacy had a rough time coming down the ladders, and had to do it on his butt," Luann said.

The decent from the Ice Falls took Stacy over two hours through the snow and ice, she said.

Stacy was seen by two doctors on the mountain. He was diagnosed as having torn his medial collateral ligament and damaging his anterior cruciate ligament in the knee, Luann said.

Stacy has been immobilized at base camp since the injury, and plans to remain on the mountain while his team finishes its journey, she said.

"If it was my knee I would get back and have it checked with an MRI and a good orthopedist," said George Curtis, head athletic trainer at BYU.

The severity of a knee injury can be complicated by swelling and can include such injuries as fractures and torn cartilage that can only be determined with an MRI, Curtis said.

Stacy received a similar injury to his opposite knee on Mt. McKinley, where he also refused rescue and descended from 16,000 feet to receive surgery.

Stacy, who was a guide on Mt. McKinley for 15 years, has also guided and taught high adventure in Alaska and was the president of the American Alpine Associations, Luann said.

Stacy is one of three guides on a six-person team that set out on April 1 from Katmandu, Nepal.

The team includes Al Hanna, 69, who is aspiring to be the oldest climber to reach the summit of Mt. Everest.

Hanna has taken Stacy on climbs to Mt. Kilimanjaro and Mt. Aconcagua after first using him as a guide on Mt. McKinley, Luann said.

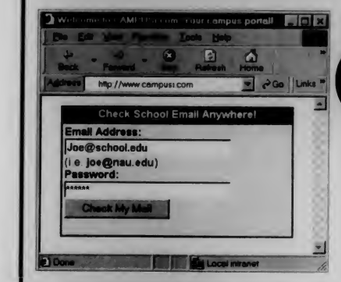
Hanna and the team are one of 18 teams on the mountain. Due to the traffic and deep snow, they have had to postpone their expected summit date eight days until May 20, she said.

Stacy was able to accompany the team to Camp 2 before the accident, Luann said.

The trek to the summit passes four campsites before reaching the top of the mountain.

"The fourth camp requires that the team be on oxygen, so the guys have to make trips up and down the mountain to carry gear and acclimatize," she said.

Yaks and 30 sherpa, or native climbers, help the team carry nearly six tons of equipment, including computers and solar panels to communicate, she said.



Stacy has ascended four of the seven highest peaks in the world. This was planned to be his fifth before he was hurt, Luann said.

Stacy has been accepted into a BYU doctoral program for this summer, and plans to set up a safety program that analyzes other people's accidents and teaches safer outdoor standards, said Scott Ferrin, a BYU professor in the Department of Educational Leadership and Foundations.

"The fact that we hear about so many near accidents with church youth groups and Boy Scouts highlights the need for safety and outdoor education," Ferrin said.

Stacy is expected to return to his wife and four children May 24, and will be attending BYU in the summer.

Editorial/Opinion

The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian.

To you, my friends

I am graduating in ten days, and there are many things about this school I will never forget. Sure, I'll never forget the long lines at Whitmore and the plethora of protests and complaints on this campus, but most importantly, I'll never forget my friends.

To many people, friends just come and go, but throughout my time at UMass, I have met a number of great people who I hold very dearly, and who will remain a part of me forever. These people have helped me in more ways than they could possibly comprehend, and I can honestly say that I wouldn't be here if it weren't for them. So after two years of writing for The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, I dedicate my 90th and final publication to you, my friends.

In order to illustrate how important you all are to me, my big secret must be told. You see, most of you know that I applied to medical school last summer and have been painfully waiting this entire school year for final decisions from the 16 places I was interested in. Some of you have asked me what I would do if I didn't get in anywhere, and I have given you all wishy-washy answers that were essentially lies. The honest truth is that if I didn't get into medical school, I was going to commit suicide.

Gary Mendese

I have always had very little respect for my own life, with thoughts of suicide entering my head here and there. But this year was different – I was very serious about my decision and even knew exactly how I was going to get the job done. I had been planning the unspeakable since last summer, but about two months ago, something happened to me and I changed my mind.

Some of you may be thinking, "You can always apply again. Not getting into medical school isn't the end of the world." But coming from my fairly broken home and with my over-reactive mind with narrow tunnel vision, my goals were the only things I had, and medical school was the only place for me. Without it, I was nothing. But like I said before, something happened to me and I changed my mind.

About two months ago, I remembered some of the things that my best friend told me about life, and then it hit me. He made me realize that my suicide would cause so many people to be hurt. These people were my friends and family, and I would sooner lose an arm than see any of them even get a scratch. "How could I do this to my mother? What will my little brother do to what kind of a role model would I be then? How could I do this to the friends that have confided in me over the last three years, and have trusted me with their utmost secrets? And most importantly, how could I do this to myself? I'll be cutting myself short; I've got many goals that I have yet to reach and I'm only 22: my life is just beginning." Those were the thoughts that entered my head the day I talked with Mike, and it was that conversation with him that made me realize my decision was wrong after all.

So Mike and the rest of you have played a crucial role in saving my life, and although I have very limited space, I want to thank as many of you as I possibly can…

Clayton, I want to thank you for always being someone I could talk to, and I still carry that note you gave me in my wallet. Sean, thanks for being just as sarcastic as I am – you always make me smile. Megan Rennick, thanks for convincing me not to be an RA; living with Mike was the best decision I have ever made. Chad, thanks for always laughing at my jokes, no matter how stupid they are. "Jen Gendron," I'll never forget yelling your name when you enter a room, and I'll never forget you whipping my ass at Egyptian War. Tiffany, thanks for listening to the "old school" songs with me – you made me laugh (something I don't do as often as I should).

Jobi and Mary, thanks for all the support you've given me, and thank you for making that "good luck" collage before the MCAT. Matt, I'll always remember your "Rocko" attitude: damn, we're similar in a lot of ways! Benny, thanks for giving me the nickname "G-Spot." Now I get all the ladies (well…). Alexis, thank you for always being there for me, and taking on more responsibility at the Collegian when I was stressed out. Sarah and Aimee, I thank you for always greeting me with a smile and trying to cheer me up, even when you risked getting yelled at.

Kristen, one of my first friends in college, thanks for always making me laugh, and thanks for always being your "raunch" self. Brett, thanks for talking jive to me and keeping me up to snuff on my Friday lines. Ben K., you were an awesome roommate and you're a great person to lean on. Ben L., thanks for making me laugh like no other person can, and thanks for being someone I could trust.

Thank you, Andy for being someone I could always get a laugh from, and thanks for always trusting me with your concerns. J.L., thanks for being one of the best friends I've ever had. You always make me feel better after we talk, and I know we'll never lose touch. Bryan, I'll never forget your little dance and Harris' class. And I'll always remember you listening to me when I almost lost it earlier in the semester. Eric, I tease you a lot about being slow, but I envy you in many ways. I'll never forget how sincere and honest you are, and I know that we'll always be friends.

And Mike, my best friend, idol and confidant, you've saved my life many times throughout the short time I've known you. I can honestly say that I would never have survived my first year if it weren't for you. And as hard as it is going to be for me to leave here next year, I'll always know I've got you to talk to, and I know you'll only be a phone call away if I need a quick laugh.

So there you have it: just some of the many people that have played crucial roles in saving my life. When I look back, I can't believe I was going to kill myself. But right now, I'm wait-listed at UMass-Worcester and although I'm not 100 percent certain as to what I'm going to be doing next year, suicide is now definitely out of the picture.

So to Ethan, Orrin, Justin, Jeff, Brian, John, Chris, Kyla, Katie, Mike K., Snapper, Mandy, Kelly H., Kelly S., Meg, Melanie, everyone at the Collegian, the people I've already mentioned, and the people I have accidentally forgotten… I love you all very much. You all mean more to me than you could possibly comprehend. I'm sorry for almost doing the unspeakable, and I thank you for saving my life. I'll always try to keep in touch, and I'll never forget any of you. From the bottom of my heart, I love you.

Dan's last stand

The moment ends though I feel winds blowing differently than ever before and they're pushing me further from shore" – Phish

What these guys are trying to say is that when the moment is over, no matter what, you are changed. We can do our best to put things behind us or move on, but the events of our life have a lasting effect on us. Each and every event pushes us further from shore. One of the very few things I can say for sure about my life as I head for graduation is that the winds from these last four years have blown me places I never would have imagined and I know that I will be feeling them for years to come.

During these four years I have crashed my car, tried desperately to make my family proud after I disappointed them terribly, thrown a brownie into a swimming pool and told all the patrons to go home because it was feces, partied with more hilarious kids than I can even think of, woken up at ungodly hours to get hammered before various sporting events, met the love of my life and made more sick mother jokes with my friends than I thought humanly possible.

Dan Viens

If our paths crossed during these last four years I would like to thank you. Each person I have come in contact with, which I remember, has truly made me wiser and given me a better understanding on life. Even the kids I don't like have given me a good understanding of what I don't want my kids to be like. Then there are those people I was just simply shocked to find out even existed. This is the category my first four roommates fall into. Not writing about them was one of the hardest things ever. They supplied me with endless material. I won't go into any detail; all I will say is medieval weapons, women's lingerie and a kid with a half-shaven face. These kids have given me a better understanding of the world and the type of people who roam around it.

To be expected there are also a lot of people here I have never met. All I can say to you is that if you've ever read my column I would like to thank you. I started writing as a joke, but then I found that a lot of people actually enjoyed my foolish ramblings. This silly column was a weekly escape from the doldrums and monotony that often occur in life. As a result of this column I met a lot of people I never would have. Whether it was kids at parties who read my columns or my three very kind editors; that was the real reward. Thank you very much for taking five minutes of your Thursdays to rest your brain and have a little fun.

These people have all made college an enlightening experience, but more importantly there are others who have made my life truly a remarkable and an amazing thing to wake up to. The first one is the guy who cracks eggs at the coffee shop across from the campus store. Man, he is awesome. For real, though, there is a bunch of people who somehow put up with all my s*@t and I am so appreciative of this. Sometimes I am a thoughtless jerk who can be downright mean. Other times I am reckless and don't really think about the consequences of things. These are characteristics that I am trying to put behind me in honor of the people who have done so much for me in my life.

The first two people are my mom and dad. When I came here four years ago I hadn't talked to my dad for like two years. It was a void in my life that I didn't know how to fix. Finally he picked up the phone and since then it's like we never skipped a beat. He is one of the greatest guys around and a man I can only hope to be like when I get older. My mother is another story. For a long time it was just me and her living in this little apartment in Agawam. Then as I got older we stopped seeing eye-to-eye like most kids do with their parents. However, I raised the ante and got into some trouble. For a long time I made my mom very unhappy. Finally things are good between us and it is wonderful to finally be seeing eye-to-eye again. Except it has been so long that she Is the one looking up.

My mom has eight brothers and sisters. These people have been like older siblings to me. They have helped me live a very comfortable and hilarious life. Somehow back in the day someone decided to bless a very undeserving person with a lot of protective guardians and to this day I am thankful, especially for my Uncle Billy. Anyone who knows me well knows that without him I would be up a creek without paddles, a boat or arms and legs to swim with. He has gotten me out of more jams and helped me more than anyone in the world.

Next are my friends. What can I say? When I'm at home I'm laughing and when I'm at school I'm laughing. The people that I have somehow managed to surround myself with are a hilarious bunch of kids who I will know for a great long while. Most importantly in this bunch are my two roommates, John is easily the kindest kid I know. The girl he ends up with is in store for a very nice life. He's taken though, ladies. Although he gets fed up with my ridiculous antics he has always been a great friend and someone I could count on. Then there's Jay. The day I found out he was coming to UMass I jumped for joy. I knew that the time we spent together at this school would be ridiculous. I have never seen more eye-to-eye with another person than I do with Jay. There were a few times when we punched each other in the face, but that was just to show how tight we were. When I started thinking about leaving here I realized that it's all tied to my friendship with Jay and that makes me sad. Half the reason I want to make it in life is so I can be the Silent Bob to his Jay and then he will never have to worry about Biology again. I'm going to miss you and our crazy ass.

Lastly and most importantly is my girl. Sue is the most wonderful person I have ever met. She is kind, understanding, beautiful and more fun than any other girl. She is the best judge of character around. She is my favorite person in the world. She looks at me and sees a good person then I know that there Is at least a little truth in that. I love her with all my heart and I want to live the rest of my life showing that I deserve her love.

Now that that's over I will leave you with some parting advice. Don't read the Collegian, it gets ink all over your hands. Just kidding, all I can say is it's always a good idea have a nice organized notebook; that way when the pizza comes you'll have the tip all set.

Dan Viens was a Collegian columnist.

Looking back… a fond farewell to UMass

"If I had one wish, I'd wish for one more day."

"I can't believe we're graduating… again!" Nikki, I totally agree. It feels like yesterday when we were teasing RI for saying, "a moment of silence for our senior year."

Hem, you really are the best and I am so thankful for meeting you at recess – 1st grade forever! I don't think a Hallmark card could sum up how much you mean to me, but I'll keep sending them anyway. I am so excited for this summer, and the big move to Boston. You complete me, too. Like I'm not busy?

Ralls – You're going to get mad at me but… you really are the best writer at the Collegian. My favorite memories of UMass have been with you… from freshmen year when we both started working at the Collegian and I would do the unthinkable and hang out with the writers when I just didn't feel like calling the Ski Club for ads… on Allison's 19th birthday, when we were yelling out of her JA window, "Hey, pimple butt" among other nonsense. It was the stupidest, yet funniest thing especially when Joel recognized my voice… Intramurals from the Inmates to the Golden Girls, thanks for having me on the squad even though we both know that I'm all heart… for whatever reason we started "pretend ice-skating." I'm glad we did…

SPIY2K! Roger, our hotel rival, dance thumper anyone? Molly Sherman – the one woman show, thanks for being hilarious.

Yes, Joyce and I get the message. The Sheehans can ALMOST fill a whole pew and we're working on it. But either way is fine with me, sister dear.

To my buddy Stephen, you continue to make me proud.

NFL, Captain of the Irish Team, Swan, I-train… can't we just call you Lauren? I have a quick question, what does the Sheehan family crest look like? What is the longest river in Ireland? Ah ha, stumped, aren't you!

Seeking roommate: Must test all snacks, meals and drinks (including pretending to forget what a slice of Antonio's tastes like), perform concerts to the music of Madonna, Janet Jackson, Celine Dion, ABBA and the BackStreet Boys. Must not mind when I fall asleep during late night talks. Must be able to find lost items such as wallets, keys, flip-flops… quoting the South Park Movie is preferred but not mandatory. Must make me laugh and be able to commute from Cali. Good luck, Smiane…

The best day of my life was on May 6, 2000 approximately at 9:15 p.m. when my sister Anne Marie and the best guy in the world (besides Dad and Superman), Greg got engaged. Remember, a vote for Deb as bridesmaid is a vote for fun. Don't think I forgot about parachuting wasted… I love you guys and I am so unbelievable happy for you!

To Marc, my favorite instigator and neighbor. Times like these I wish I had the Book of Lies as a reference; why did you throw that away, anyway? I'm glad first impressions don't count or we would never have been so close. Thanks for all the great times and I know there will be many more Kid's Weekend's at York…

I don't want to forget anyone or anything, that's what the scrapbook is for.

Deb Sheehan

Kristen and Nicole, we have some great memories… sorry for all the times that I forced you to dance when I was wasted. I know you hate it. And one more thing, why were there constantly dirty dishes last year?

Allison, oh lordy. You are "trouble" and a great friend always. It's okay that "I know your social security number and you don't know my middle name." It's Lynne by the way, and if it's not broke there is no need to fix it. By the way, what do I do with this knowledge?

Wass, Billy, Wurtzel, Jeff and Dave Lee…"Hi", you guys have been so fun and great to be friends with. Good luck with everything.

Daryl, you are going to have withdrawals soon… you are so Sally, I'm Harry but cuter. You are a great friend and I know that you would do anything for me, and that means more than you think. Ron Karren is life, the rest is just details.

Danny, it was fate that you were wearing a Superman tee-shirt the first night we met, yes Joyce I told him.

Thank you family for everything. I love you. I'm not drunk but I am getting teary-eyed… Mom and Dad, I know what you're thinking… DONE! But it's only the beginning. Clean up the guest room, I'm heading home. Thank you for all the confidence and love you have given me.

Marty and Maureen, thank you for being such caring people. I will always remember talking with you about so many things. You give great advice about everything from where to get my haircut to when to break up with boys. I promise to keep in touch, I will miss you!

Good luck to Sam Wilkinson, Eric Faber, Shawn Ilinitch, Kate Beith, Megan Clarke and "Dan the Man," you guys will be running the show – make me proud! Lisa Metcalf – where is my five dollars? Good luck to my Sports boys, Bryan, Aaron and Kobo!

The Collegian has been one of my favorite UMass experiences; thank you to everyone in Graphics for your hard work and for putting up with us in Advertising. Lisa, Sage and Sue – you are amazing at what you do, good luck with everything. Thank you writers, for giving people a reason to pick up the paper everyday, especially to Sam for finally making some waves around here. Some advice: keep working together and remember that Business, Graphics and Writers depend on each other. One last thing: Have you hugged an Ad Rep, today?

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is financially independent from the University of Massachusetts, operating solely on revenues generated by advertising sales. The paper was founded in 1890 as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and then the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. The Collegian has been published daily since 1967, and has been a broadsheet publication since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call (413) 545-3500 weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Kathleen Ralls: her last good-byes

My deepest apologies to Stevie "Dukes," who was a superstar during the half-time shootout this past winter at a men's basketball game. The Collegian accepts full responsibility if your last chance at a career in college basketball went down the tubes because we failed to cover the event…

And the same to Molly Sherman, my redheaded friend who coined the phrase "captain of the Irish team." Sherm, as Marc likes to call her, knows a good laugh when she hears one.

With that over with, it's time to get down to business. UMass began four years ago for me, when I lived in the "Virgin Vault," James, in Southwest. What a crew we had that year; Three Long versus, Three Short fights and snowball wars with Emerson. I'll admit it, we didn't stand a chance. None of us will forget a certain ex-boyfriend who wanted us to dyke out, as he put it, or Jamie's burst, "Can't we all just get along?" Those all-female dorms should be outlawed.

My favorite memories, however, are of the days of Lauren O'Malley and the friendship we have struck up despite being complete opposites. Oh, the Melrose crew! And of Dan "Manero" Praport and his friends too.

Deb, remember white-sneakered Aaron and our first weekend up at UMass at Brandywine? We walked home in the pouring rain with Nick because someone didn't want to give him a ride home. Where's the return favor?

This was also the year we met the boys across the hall, Marc Menschel, Dave Wasserman, Dave Wuertzel and Billy Giampa. Hey, who has that binder of "true stories" anyway? I'll see you under the tent!

I finally moved up to the big time, Cance, a coed dorm in my second year. Cruising Deb Sheehan's "Love Boat" (and getting pulled over to get accused of harassing people at the Haigis Mall), I spent more time in Mackimmie than the occupants who lived there. The riots at 2 a.m. that prevented me from going home were unforgettable, but so was dancing with Superman and hanging out with a boy named Luke.

That road trip to Ithaca was the most amazing trip I have ever taken. Singing for over three hours and then finding Nikki by shouting out her name in the middle of campus was a stroke of luck. I only wish our BMOC (I.e. Dave Wasserman) was as cool as theirs.

Kathleen Ralls

Intramural softball (this one's for Marc) ended in a bad way and it was all (you're welcome, I-booty) fault. Not that all of us aren't bitter. But that picture is my favorite one with a sprained ankle, a runny nose and many disappointed faces holding runners-up t-shirts.

How many people can say they lived across the street from a waterfall? Diane Elgart and I did for one semester. Our pink friend was fun and so was the pheasant loveseat. WHAT A FIND!

I also have a long-distance shout out to the squad at the University of South Carolina. Lisa Manhart, Tarah Davis and Faith Kopecky – hey, at least the weather was nice!

Notice anything yet? No references to the Collegian. So here we go. The sports staff (Aaron Saykin, Brett Mauser, Bryan Smith, Dave Rose, Adam DeYoung (Chelmsford represent!) and everybody else), yep, Kobo, my buddy and free lunch date, have fun next year and keep it clean. Hey guys, next time we go to Puerto Rico, why don't we all just fly down together. Seth Koenig, you're a real character in a good way though you have terrible taste in clothes and in Metal… I mean, music. You be good to my sister. Lisa, Lisa (Metcalf), Why don't you try not being a slut because I'm just tired of the stories I hear. No respectable girl… just kidding! And Sam Wilkinson, who knew your bank shot was so nasty. I hope you raise the Collegian back to its old glory.

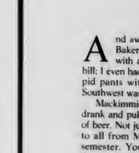
To the girl who makes life fun and easier for me – Amy Apicerno. You come up with the most creative and interesting solutions to some trying situations. Did I ever mention how graceful you are on ice? And don't forget, we are still beating Scotty and Dave by a TD in touch football. Any takers?

Some of my favorite moments took place on a high school field hockey field at Amherst High when my Hurricanes reigned over the Valley. Go get 'em next year, girls!

My last props to the Collegian for its end-of-the-semester parties, where I first met Luke Meredith and haven't gotten enough of him since.

And still there are more. To two very fun and nice girls, Kristen Lindberg and Nichole Trahan, and Christine Connare, who was the best Women's Issues editor ever.

Allison Govoni, one of Chelmsford's finest and the best storyteller who ever lived, I'm sure I will be seeing you at The Brewery this summer. I can never get enough of that place (Yeah). What's up Daryl and Proulx, my best buddy uptown? And Vanessa Donnelly, my distant relative, have a blast the next three years here!



Here's a tip for anyone who would like to avoid having finals ever again – become a journalism major.

Gloucester advice
Molly tells it like it is

And away we go. I started my college career living in Baker. It was quite an introduction to college life, with all the hippies and drugs. I enjoyed life on the hill; I even had my buddy Missy make me a pair of those stupid pants with the Velcro down the side. Then I realized Southwest was the place for me.

Mackimmie was where I lived with 30 crazy lunatics. We drank and puked and drank some more. They snuck in kegs of beer; I got just once but every single week. Congratulations to all from Mackimmie 3 Long who are graduating this semester. Your accomplishment is truly miraculous. For those of you who will be staying on at the University for a bit longer, I quote the favorite song of Kyle Moore, "I get knocked down, but I get up again."

Molly Sherman

While living in Southwest I took a job as student security, checking IDs at the door. I thought this would be an easy way to make some beer money. It was, until it turned ugly. My best friend Jess took the same job and one night some son of a bitch didn't want to be signed in so badly that he picked up a huge trash can and chucked it at her. Luckily for Jess, she has quick reflexes, but I had learned my lesson. Life is tough in the concrete jungle.

So I needed a new job. My friend Deb hooked me up at the Collegian. Well, I had to win them over but she did the legwork. Working in the Business department of the Collegian has been pretty sweet. I am an Advertising Account Executive, a job that looks good on the SOM student's resume. I spent my time down here having fun, getting drunk and acting like an ass at the parties and trying to avoid those weirdo writers. Well, they're not that weird, but if there was a throw down between departments, Business vs. Writers, I'd know where to put my money.

Speaking of brawls, has anyone seen the Women's Ice Hockey Team play? They are a bunch of tough athletes who don't take any s*@t from anybody. Especially this one girl named Gina who had more penalty minutes last season than the rest of the team combined. Impressive. I don't know how the team will do without the Ice-Man and the Shark, but I have a feeling things are going to be just fine. "Yes, I have mental problems!"

I am in the School of Management. I like almost everything about it: the teachers, the classes, the job offers. Everything except the computer labs. If I had some money to donate, and I don't, no nobody ask me, I'd buy a few decent computers for the place. I'd also make the Men's Crew Team and the Women's Ice Hockey Team varsity, but that's just me.

It seems like almost anybody can get a cartoon in the Collegian lately. These whacked out guys from the Townhouses decided to write about the Skunks of Puffton, starring the skunk named Beep. What a horrifying piece of crap. Not on my shift, fellas; not on my shift.

I have done the whole "Uptown" thing. Charlie's and McMurphy's were the most fun. A bit of confession: I was the girl who puked in Barsie's a few weeks ago. I apologize to anyone who had to experience the aftermath.

However, the puke in Barsie's didn't even get on anyone. When I was in Cancun on spring break I did an ice luge of Kahlua and then disaster struck. I dumped my wheels all over a total stranger. Thanks to the size of the crowd I was able to avoid a nasty confrontation.

To anyone thinking about going to South Padre Island for Spring break, don't do it. The place is like Hampton beach with worse weather. For Spring break destinations, Cancun, the Bahamas and Florida are all more preferred by the author. The highlight of South Padre was seeing Vanilla Ice. The highlight.

I haven't bought a textbook since first semester freshman year. Selling college textbooks is the biggest scam going. What a waste of money. Ask your teacher to put them on reserve. I only read before exams anyway.

I am graduating. I have no job. I am going to Europe with my pal Church. I hope we make it back alive. The two of us together seem to have poor decision-making skills and an even worse ability to say no to a drink. For the summer I'll be back at the greatest place on Earth, Gloucester, MA.

For anyone who doubts my claim, please stop by during the last week of June. It's called the Fiesta and it will rock your world. To all the Gloucester people out there, and there are many of us, take care of this school for me. Try not to miss me too bad either.

To all my pals who helped make my time here an experience, I thank you. We had fun, both the drunk and sober kind. I think my career here should end the way it started, from Baker. I guarantee that if you walk around Central you'll hear these poignant words: "I've been waiting for the time when I could finally say, that this has all been wonderful, but now I'm on my way".

Great memories

My definition of a great memory: someone, sometime, someplace or something that has happened that can always make me smile no matter where I am. The past four years have supplied me with countless great memories and I'd like to take this chance to thank all of you who have ever made me smile.

I'd like to start with Francellis, you sexy mama you. Thanks for being such a truly wonderful person. I can't imagine living without you. "sweet tits."

Everyone at 12 Sunset… you're the best. Little Kimmy… what would I have done without you (and your biscuits and cheese)? Good luck in all that you do; I'll miss you. Vinnle (a.k.a. the sex machine)… a word to the wise: take the mascot head off before you go to bed. Countless thanks to Iut for putting up with me this semester. Admit it, you're going to miss my phone calls and "Spill the Wine". Last but not least, O-dog. You're a pain in the butt to live with, but I love you just the same.

Allison Govoni

I thought that when I left for college, I left Chelmsford behind, but I was wrong. I just can't seem to get enough of Nick, Lucky and Charlie. Nick, although you are a closet freshman stud, I love you anyways. Lucky, you'll always be my favorite. I think it's the hands. Charlie… keep your clothes on, stay away from fans and good luck with all that you do. Thanks boys for being there!

The two finest ladies at the Collegian are definitely Marty and Maureen. Maureen, even though you thought my name was Liz for a year and a half… I love ya anyways. Marty, Marty, Marty… you're the cutest thing that I ever did see! You've been like a mom away from home to me and I can't thank you enough. May we never be locals!

Kelly, Lesia, Natalie, Katie and girls, I'll never forget the first time that I met you… you were all in bed! Betty says thanks for the laughs.

Finnie… maybe when that thing on your ass clears up we can spoon again. Strippers, plural! I'll miss you.

Marc, you need to get over the whole French maid's outfit thing. Just joking… Friday at 8 o'clock sound good?

O'Mally, put the Guinness down and put up your dukes. Get ready for the hook!

Ralls… we'll always have "big fun". Fandangles, you suck.

Justin… where's Ruth? Tyson… I carried you! Nice keg stand, you stud. Rob… I found your other earring… in my bed, I mean at my house.

Deb… you've always been my partner in crime ever since Mission Hill. Here's to No. 3 and 4, I mean 5 and 6. Honestly, you're an amazing person and I can't imagine working with anyone as great as you.

Lara… I always hoped that someday I could be as cool as you and find a ring with my name on it, but I'll have to settle with a chain. Relax, I'm kidding. Thanks for all of the laughs (Tory, Ant and all the others), you're the best. Love you.

Mageek, you're not here anymore, but I'll forever picture you standing at the window with fat girl pants on waiting for Lou. Wish you were here.

Thank you everyone for everything. I'll miss you all.

Allison Govoni was a Collegian staff member.

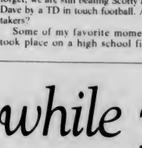
Thanks to everyone who read the Ed/Op page this year.
We do it for you!
See you in the fall!



Live it while you can

In high school, I had near-perfect attendance. Granted, there's the expulsion bit following you with every skippage, but I was there, jotting notes down diligently, going bell to bell in doing so. That got me here.

But good things don't always last.

Sometimes they turn into great things.

Freshman year, I found out what mattered. The truth is, some people never do. They robotically scamper from building to building, losing themselves in crowds of 500-plus. They write those notes, being sure to stay within the confines of the first section of their trusty green UMass notebook. Meanwhile, the best four years of their lives are begging for their attention, but they were simply too busy being a good scholar.

Brett Mauser

Not me. Call It pathetic, because believe me, I don't care. Bs God, that's one hell of an attitude to take in building the foundation for the rest of your life, right? Well, so be it. I've lived life when it needed to be lived.

Have you?

College is your last opportunity to have fun in its purest form, your last opportunity to stick your head out the window of a car whizzing down a rural road at eighty miles an hour. Here, you build relationships and write stories that last a lifetime, ones that you tell your grandchildren about. And years down the road, I'm sure you nor Mom and Dad will remember that failing grade in History 151 (heh, mine don't).

It's true. What doesn't kill you makes you stronger. I've taken far too much for granted up until this point, and perhaps that will burn me down the road, but here's what I do know. I'll leave the Pioneer Valley with the only knowledge that I really give a crud about. I know how to live. If you aren't living, then you're dying, and I'm not ready to die. There are too many trails that have gone unexplored, ones that offer even more enlightenment.

"Sit out in the sun with some friends and sip a cold Busch Light without a worry in the world, knowing it'll all work out one way or the other."

Here, I made the best of friends. I drank crappy beer, sipping it through a straw on the Orchard Hill balconies with my sunglasses on and my feet reaching for the rail. I made the liquor store by 11 p.m. probably more often than Philosophy at 11 a.m. They have become my life and my shoulder to lean on. They have seen me at my best and my worst, and for being that crutch. I thank them. I dare you to find a better crew.

Here, I found love. I ironically met her in class and have missed plenty others to keep her smile right there where it belongs, where it continues to buckle my knees.

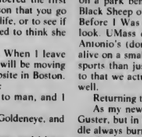
And most importantly, at this fine establishment, I found peace. I know, it sounds crunchy. Y'know, chuck the frisbee once more, buddy. But whatever, I walk around as carefree as can be, with a grin dying to come out. It's comfortable, actually. I wear my baggy khakis and green pullover hooded sweatshirt and just stroll, breathing in nature and observing those that wander around in it. I never wear a walkman. I'd much prefer to overhear people's conversations, for perhaps a piece of advice or amusement.

I am truly relaxed, and let me tell you, it's the best feeling in the world. Rather than run around without a clue, slow your life down. Watch television for an end because you feel like it, not thinking of that exam that lurks only days away. Play wiffle ball with the kids outside your door – let them win, let them blitz you, and watch them run home and tell Mom that they just hammered "this big kid." Sit out in the sun with some friends and sip a cold Busch Light without a worry in the world, knowing it'll all work out one way or the other.

No, no, no, I'm not saying miss class altogether and wear your 'D' average with pride. No. All I'm saying is that there's more to life than the book in front of you.

There's more to life than money, than fame, than a house on the lake. Maybe I've made some bad decisions in some aspects of life, but I wouldn't trade the experiences I've had for the world. Most may not condone taking that route to success, but I do, because I know I love myself more for steering my boat in that direction.

Life plateaus. Be as optimistic as you want, but stop kidding yourself. For those that still have the opportunity – live it. Live college life. I may not be the best student, but I'll take my 2.6 GPA and walk down that aisle next Sunday with my head held high, realizing that what I've accomplished here at the University is astounding. It may not show in my transcript, but when you see me, you can bet I'll be wearing the most genuine of smiles. I'm happy and that's all I really care about.



To everyone I know and don't know, I wish you the best of luck in the pursuit of happiness. If you haven't yet gone at it with all you've got, my advice to you is to start now. That's all.

Brett Mauser was a Collegian columnist.

Bye, bye, bye…

I remember it as if it was yesterday. My best friend Schroeder and I had decided to take a road trip at midnight from Bellingham to this place called Orchard Hill to see, well, just to see. After getting lost and asking for directions at some motor lodge in god knows where, we found our way up to Dickinson. It wasn't that impressive, in fact it was downright ugly. But it was going to be my home and I guess I was going to have to get used to it. It is so bizarre to me that that trip was over four years ago.

I'm not going to bore you with any more trips down "Ken's memory lane," but I am going to continue to be nostalgic, because when you look back on your life, what else do you have besides memories? Well, maybe a drinking problem, but I leave that one out for now.

Ken McDonald

I have found myself getting all weepy going into places such as Black Sheep, Amherst Brewing Company and Delta Chi. Seriously, these places will never be the same for me after May 21. Once I walk out of that stadium, pack up my things and drive out of the cozy confines of the Pioneer Valley, those places change forever. No longer will they be my hangouts, but rather places that I visit in order to relive days that I might not have remembered the first time around. It's true; it is the same reason that you go back to your high school, to relive a past life, or to see if your gym teacher is still as hot as you used to think she was.

I am one of the lucky ones though. When I leave Coolidge (yes, I still live in the dorms) I will be moving home to start work as an editor for a website in Boston. The reasons that I am lucky are as follows:

I have the worst work ethic known to man, and I have a job.

My major for the first two years was Goldeneye, and I have a job.

My major for the last two has been sleep, and I have a job.

My major (for real) is Journalism, and I have a job.

What I, as many Collegian folks have come to realize, is that grades do not matter anymore. Well, ever since the day that I got a "B" in handwriting in fourth grade, I knew that the school thing was not my gig. I was born to rock. When I realized that I didn't do that either, I took up journalism and the road has been peaches and cream ever since. A quick note to everyone: no matter what your major is, employers and grad. schools want to see what you have done, not just how well you have kissed the ass of every Gen. Ed. Professor. I mean, some of them are hairy y'know?

Think about it, so, you've overachieved in high school, you're over achieving here, someday you'll over achieve at your job. You'll wake up, realize that you are 50, retired with a nice family and a car and you'll have had no fun. The reason that so many adults, which I am not until May 21, are so grumpy is that they are resentful of you because you are dancing naked on the bench at Antonio's and they are driving by in their Volvo wagons on their way home from an art exhibit. College is a time to be happy; don't wait until you're old and gray to have a midlife crisis. If you have one now, it does not mean that you are going to die at 38, it just means that you are enjoying yourself and the people around you.

However, there are things to do uptown that do not involve nudity, vomiting or fake ID's. They may not be as glamorous as doing the "Roger Rabbit" on a park bench, but they are fun nonetheless. Go to Black Sheep or ABC, walk through the cemetery behind Before I Was a Tree, go to Amherst College and just look. UMass does not just consist of frat parties and Antonio's (don't get me wrong, Antonio's has kept me alive on a small budget for a long time). There are other sports than just… well, there are sporting events to go to that we actually win in, and they are free to go to as well.

Returning to the nostalgia…

As my new favorite band, Chasing Gray (they're no Guster, but in reality, who really is) sings, "And the candle always burns, just as the world will always turn, and we all move on."

As I move on, all I will take with me is a diploma and memories. Right now, I can tell you which one means more to me. Hopefully you don't make the mistake of trading in your life for a piece of paper.

I know I haven't.

Arts & Living

Your Guide to all that's going on in the Pioneer Valley

Letter from the Editor:

This is the final issue of the Collegian as we make the transition from the 1999-2000 academic year into summer break. The Arts & Living department has been internally revamped several times over the past nine months. However, the one constant element that every newspaper strives on is the faithful readers that take time to explore carefully everything that we have to offer. On behalf of myself and the three dedicated associates of film, music and fine arts – David Troupes, Michael Delano and Kristi Ceccarossi respectively – we sincerely thank you for reading the Arts & Living section this year. We look forward to keeping you informed in the world of entertainment in 2000-2001.

Ryan Benharris
Arts & Living Editor

Dharva's digs gold; TV films suck. What else did we learn this year?

Tube Notes with Nicholas Pizzolato

First off I would like to thank all of you who took a little time out of their Thursday schedule to read my column. If you had it over lunch in Franklin (that's right – I see you) or turned to the graphic of the TV/VCR combo while I ate my lunch, or if you tuned out your professor and his unfulfilled lecture called "Spores, Molds and Funguses, the stuff you wish you didn't have". I appreciate it. Now I mean business. My friends, we have seen a lot in the last semester and although I was only Tube Notes author for the last half, it doesn't mean that nothing happened. So, in the spirit of "The Daily Show" I give you, "What did we learn?" Keep an eye out for the subliminal messages.

Can't Buy Me Love

Patrick Dempsey learned this in the movie by the same name, but some people just can't learn the lessons that 80s movies gave us. Case in point, Rick Rockwell and D.O.N. for the ludicrous idea of "Who Wants to Marry a Millionaire". Where are Jerry Falwell and his "Moral Majority" when you need them? Even if you didn't see it (those who saw it will tell you that they lost two hours of their life which they will never get back) you know what happened. Some unknown tech loser (no, not Bill Gates, he's actually married) supposedly couldn't find a lady so he went from mall to mall and found himself either college girls or beauty queens brought fifty of them to Las Vegas (after all it is the wedding capital of the world) and was going to get married that night. The millionaire in question turned out to be Rick Rockwell a very unfunny comic (motivational speaker) who just made his millions through real estate deals, the same type of deals that is promised to you by the spastic guy with the bad toupee with the commercial that is on at two in the morning.

Yeah the show was funny, especially since he picked the ultimate trophy wife, but the real entertaining part was everything else. The day after they got married we all started hearing the stories about their chaperoned honeymoon and we learned the awful truth. We learned that not only did Rockwell have a restraining order against him from an old girlfriend, but that he also wasn't really a millionaire.

Not long after did we hear Dharva's story (his equally dysfunctional spouse) on how she couldn't believe she did it (money) and how upset she was when he fell asleep on the plane ride to his yacht (she wasn't as hot as she thought she was). She has since annulled their marriage and stated that she wants to be left alone. After that, she announced that she would be posing for Playboy. My god people, can't we just leave her alone?

TV Movies Truly Suck

I would like to submit as evidence exhibits A through L: "Jesus," "Mary: Mother of Jesus," "The John Denver Story," "Arabian Nights," "Fail Safe," "The Jesse Ventura Story," "Jason and the Argonauts," "The 70s" and "The Tenth Kingdom." I rest my case.

If Your Ratings Suck, Pay for Protection

Now this category can be applied in two different subcategories. First, with dwindling ratings for "Must See TV" Thursday, NBC agreed to give in to the demands of the "Friends" cast (greedy yuppies) and increasing their salaries to a disgusting amount, just to keep them happy and performing. Also, due to the disappearing cast, NBC has agreed to give "ER's Anthony Edwards an obscene amount of money through 2004, making it the mostly costly show NBC has.

The WWF is also making a killing, figuratively, with its show and selling it to whoever needs the ratings. A week after announcing that CBS was looking into buying RAW from USA, USA filed a lawsuit under the breach of contract against the WWF and the two have been in court ever since, fighting on the future of the show. The WWF holds the highest rated show on USA, "Raw is War," and USA feels that they should have dibs on the show. Also feeling the breath of fresh air that is wrestling popularity, NBC received its highest ratings for the late night show "Saturday Night Live" when The Rock hosted earlier this season. After seeing the numbers, NBC Sports announced that they would go in fifty/fifty with Vince McMahon and his plans for the Extreme Football League. With the hope that those same people who have given UPN an absurd amount of popularity, NBC gets exclusive XFL coverage and is hoping that Stone Cold fans will be addicted to the XFL.

When in Doubt, "Borrow" the Ideas of Popular Shows

Time and again, year after year, we see it. One show blossoms with popularity and two months later another network snatches the ideas and changes the names to seem original. This year CBS gave us "Falcone" and a network version of HBO's popular "Sopranos." And although it doesn't revolve around a pill poppin' piasano, it still takes an in depth look at mob life. Sounds a little too familiar to me. CBS also created "City of Angels," a hospital drama which they hope will give CPR to "Chicago Hope," both of which are "ER" rip-offs. You know CBS is desperate when they start ripping off their own shows. Not only with the previously mentioned shows, but also "Family Law," an attempt to ride the coattails of the popular show "Judging Amy." CBS, however, isn't the only one. ABC recently tanked Kyra Sedgwick's "Talk to Me" (thank god), about a woman and her radio talk show, sounds a little to much like "Fraiser" to me.

Well, that's it. I've run out of things to rant about for this semester. But I can guarantee all of you faithful readers that next semester, Tube Notes will be back, and once again you will something to read during lunch and through the numerous lectures on "Napoleon's Secret: He was English". Thanks for reading, and in the words of Forrest Gump, "That's all I got to say about that."

Mission: Buy the soundtrack

Music from and inspired by MISSION: IMPOSSIBLE 2
Various Artists
Hollywood

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Your mission, should you choose to accept it, is to listen to a movie soundtrack that begins with Limp Bizkit and Metallica and ends with Tori Amos and Hans Zimmer, and identify the elusive common thread. That mission is impossible, of course, since for some time now soundtracks have simply been showcases for the latest musical trends, and the Mission: Impossible 2 compilation is no different. It chronicles the current heavy music comeback that mainstream has temporarily embraced, following in the footsteps of the stellar Strangeland soundtrack and more recently films like End of Days. Thankfully, M:I-2 is a well-comprised and consistently enjoyable soundtrack that never gives you quite what you expect from the high-profile artists showcased.

First of all, lets all send Hollywood Records a big thank-you letter for not leading off the soundtrack with the much-hyped first Metallica soundtrack contribution, "I Disappear." It should come as no surprise to anyone who has listened to the last three or four Metallica releases that this song truly sucks, and I can't even imagine the must hard-core of Yallica fans standing behind it. It has no glaring faults; it's just the bland, boring and uninspired crap you would expect from Godsmack or Creed, not Metallica, the supposed flag-bearers of heavy metal. Instead, the soundtrack kicks off with Limp Bizkit's MI-theme sampling "Take a Look Around (Theme from M:I-2)." And while I certainly wouldn't chose LB to bet my musical chips on, at least they have fun with the track with some great build-release craziness and Fred Durst's typically silly lyrics ("does anybody really know the secret, or the combination to this life and where they keep it?").

Rob Zombie, whose work is always more enjoyable in small increments, has a grinding metal blast called "Scum of the Earth," which clocks in at under three minutes. Butthole Surfers and The Pimps both contribute some above-average cuts, and the Foo Fighters/Brian May cover of Pink Floyd's "Have a Cigar" is interesting but pretty standard. Chris Cornell gets in on the Mission theme also with "Mission 2000" which sounds more Soundgarden than anything from Euphoria Morning.

Godsmack manages to make Metallica look good with their awful song "Going Down." By my radar this Beantown band is running on the fumes of their blandly accessible hey-hey metal, but their second consecutive main-stage Ozzfest slot proves that the fans definitely feel differently. "What You Lookin' At?," the Kid Rock-produced Uncle Kracker track is underwhelming, but things pick up with Apartment 26's "Backwards." Apartment 26's second stage Ozzfest performance last year left me with low expectations, but the catchy chorus and inventive Pitchshifter-inspired breakbeats were a welcome surprise. Diffuser, who will be coming to the Boston area May 19 and 20, have one of the album's standout tracks, "Karma," a pop song with a rough edge, great drumming, and some cool lyrics about Elvis and Jim Morrison.

The remainder of the album won't blow you away, but unlike many soundtracks, it won't inspire you to take the disc out in disgust. Buckcherry gets lit up with a solid but predictable rocker, and Tinfed and Powderfinger are both interesting while playing, but quickly fade from memory. Amos and Zimmer featuring Heitor Pereira finish off the album with some nice low-key arrangements, and Pereira's Latin-tinged guitar sound is a soothing finale. B+

Static-X comes to the Webster Theater Pitchshifter speaks out on boy bands

STATIC-X/PITCHSHIFTER with ULTRASPANK
Webster Theatre

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Guitarist Jim Davies and bassist Mark Clayden from the endlessly friendly UK group Pitchshifter, whose upcoming album Deviant was awarded a much-deserved A+ from the Collegian last week, took time out to talk to the Collegian for the second time during the May 6 Hartford stop of their tour. We talked about everything from video games to musical mind control, and both seemed to be excited by how the Static-X tour was going so far. They also agreed that bringing the two bands together was a good match.

"They're sort of doing the techno/rock thing from a very American angle as in more metal, more chuggy Pantera-style, while we do it from a more British-influenced punk style," Davies said.

Fans seem to be embracing both styles, however, as Pitchshifter says that fan responses have been good, even though they are playing a large number of new tunes which aren't yet familiar to U.S. fans.

"It's been really weird since we've been playing so many new tunes. We're playing virtually all new tunes apart from three, so we sort of gauge every night how good we went down by the order of songs," Davies added, noting that older tracks like "Triad" are on the list to please the old fans.

Films and food are two of the band's favorite things about being in the U.S., and hopefully this current tour as well as their Ozzfest 2000 appearances (note to Ozzfest booking committee, PSI is first stage material) will allow the band to spend even more time in the U.S., possibly for a headlining tour. "It has to be getting to that point soon," Davies hopes.

The two also had a lot to say about their upcoming album Deviant, the album that, if any, would propel Pitchshifter to their deserved status in the U.S. A lean 12-song blast of innumerable elements brought together by undeniable hooks and edgy punk sounds, Deviant is more the product of vocalist/programmer I.S. Clayden working together with guitarist Davies rather than the recently departed Johnny Carter.

"The last album was written mostly by John and Johnny, and Johnny's thing is insane programming... guitar-wise it was pretty basic. This album was more of a song-type thing. A lot of the songs on the last album were written around loops – guitars were secondary. This time around we could play the whole album without [electronic aid]."

Davies also added that songs they loved on the last album, www.pitchshifter.com, like "Dispusable," had so many electronic elements that he could see the crowd getting confused.

In 1900 it was transformed into a national society by the Presidents of the University of Maine, the University of Tennessee, and Pennsylvania State University. The next chapter to join was the University of Massachusetts Amherst, which remains the fourth-oldest chapter in the United States. The society was renamed Phi Kappa Phi in 1900, from the initial letters of the Greek words forming its adopted motto: Philosopia Drateito Photon, "Let the Love of Learning Rule Mankind."

To be eligible for membership, Juniors must have a GPA of 3.75 and Seniors a GPA of 3.80. Only two Graduate students per program are nominated by their Graduate Directors.

Deviant still has its share of samples and such, along with a host of other surprises, like the track "As Seen On T.V." which features legendary Dead Kennedy's lead singer Jello Biafra. Both describe working with Jello as a lot of fun, as was a hidden track which features a beer-induced Davies rendition of "Let Freedom Ring" behind a group of children (friends of J.S.) saying, "We love you Pitchshifter."

One thing Pitchshifter does not love is boybands, subtly indicated by the shirt Mark is wearing that states "F all boybands." Couldn't have said it better myself. Although if Deviant did sell enough copies to give the band the wealth and fame of such "jail bait girls" as Britney Spears or Christina Aguilera, they would use the means to promote "more evil" and annoy as many people as possible."

Annoying is hardly the adjective I would use to describe Pitchshifter's live show on Saturday night; "mind-blowing" would be more apt. Even better than their performance with the Deftones in Worcester in 1998, this 35-minute set was high-octane from beginning to end. "Wafer Thin" got things off to a blistering start, and would only be the first of many tracks from Deviant to be introduced that night. Although much of the crowd was unfamiliar with the material, they still went crazy for "Hidden Agenda," "Keep It Clean," and "Chump Change." "Triad," although awesome, still sounds weird the new way J.S. sings it, but www tracks like "Microwaved" and "Genius" threw the crowd into a frenzy, and the Collegian's own beloved Rob Schulze was among the crazed fans J.S. pointed to during the "dysfunction is my function" portion of "Genius." When the set ended with the excellent "Scene This," J.S. added that this was the best crowd the band had seen all tour. Static-X had big-ass shoes to fill.

And they filled them well enough. It should be noted that the Hartford crowd was among the wildest I have ever seen, and they gave 100 percent for every act, including the mediocre but well-received openers Ultraspank. Static-X had a cool set-up with a huge illuminated sign bearing their moniker as well as a disco ball, or should I say, evil disco ball. Their set consisted of, expectedly, nearly every selection from their 1999 debut Wisconsin Death Trip, including regular opener "Bled for Days" and closer "Push It." Other exciting performances were the pounding "I'm With Stupid" and "Fix," which was cut short when a huge trash can, which previously slammed into my face, was hurled towards the stage. This prompted vocalist/guitarist Wayne Static to immediately stop the concert, but thankfully it continued without incident. The highlights of the show were the three non-album tracks: "Down," a b-side from the "Push It" single, "Burning Inside," a Ministry cover, and "This is Not," a song so new that Wayne had to read the lyrics from a sheet hanging in front of him. The last song was great, and hopefully it will be among the set for their main stage appearance at this year's Ozzfest.

Overall, it was a great night, but it can safely be said that Pitchshifter has stolen yet another show, and a longer set from them would certainly be appreciated. That brings to mind something Iim remarked about the band's appearance on the Test Drive 5 video game soundtrack, for which they contribute two tracks with a host of other bands.

"There are so many bands on that soundtrack, but every time I go to play it's like (mimics "Microwaved" riff) and I'm like 'nooooo!,' the next level is like (mimics "Genius" riff). Can't they just play someone else?"

Pitchshifter over and over again? If only we were so lucky.

Africa simply a nightmare

I Dreamed of Africa
Staring Kim Basinger and Vincent Perez
Directed by Hugh Hudson
Playing at Showcase Cinemas West Springfield

By Wes Wrightson
Collegian Staff

From a director who brought the cinematic Chariots of Fire, I Dreamed of Africa doesn't live up to any standards in the realm of celluloid. This is a film that would be better suited as a mini-series on television. The compatibility between the husband and wife team here is likened to scratching your nails on a blackboard. Vincent Perez plays his character like he is striving to be Antonio Banderas. Kim Basinger plays her role like a woman trying to escape from the reality that she inhabits.

Seeing as how I am off to Africa in July for two and a half years as a Peace Corps Volunteer in the Western African country of Guinea, and having already been to South Africa on a study-abroad program, I was appalled at how the picture presents this glorious continent. The scenes of the wildlife, I have to admit, were stunning, but that was interspersed with dialogue between the main characters that made my blood boil. Kim Basinger plays the real-life Italian animal activist Kuki Gallman, who chooses to take her family to Kenya to try to stop the poaching of indigenous animals. The scenes with the slain rhinos and elephants really hit home. To see these beautiful beasts slain for money is wholly disenchanting.

The film basically plays like Out of Africa without Meryl Streep and Robert Redford. Although that film was a stunning piece of cinematic work, it stumbles on all levels. The chemistry between the mother and son is laughable, and the chemistry between Perez and Basinger is more of the same. Although the scene where Kuki's son is bitten by a poisonous snake was of respectable merit, this film falls on all levels with the exception of the cinematic portrayal of the Kenyan landscape, its only redeeming element. Kim Basinger should have chosen a wiser role for her follow-up role to LA Confidential, which won her an Academy Award.

I Dreamed of Africa is much too long, much too narrow in terms of character development, and overly dramatic in most scenes between the main characters. I only recommend this film to those that wish to visit Kenya and see all that it has to offer in terms of landscape. I am off to Guinea, and thank God that a movie theater is nowhere near where I will be. As a matter of fact, I believe that movies are few and far in between where I am about to go. I am certainly dreaming of Guinea, and not of this film, which should have been entitled I Had A Nightmare of Africa. D

Massachusetts ska legends return; Bosstones ask for your Attention

By William Darcy
The Diamondback (U. Maryland)

(U-WIRE) The plaid boys of Boston have jumped leaps and bounds since their inception in 1986. Over the past decade and a half the Mighty Mighty Bosstones have starred in a Converse sneaker commercial, had a cameo in the flick Clueless, performed a song for Sesame Street, headlined the Vans Warped tour and won over legions of fans with their unique brand of ska-punk-rock. Plus, these guys have been doing 300 shows per year for the majority of their careers.

The Bosstones' work ethic is extremely admirable and can be felt on the majority of their albums.

Their 1997 release Let's Face It was their most commercially successful album due in large part to their radio hit "The Impression That I Get." However, long-time fans will agree that it was probably their weakest effort to date. The aggression and edginess that is a Bosstone trademark was lacking on that album.

Their new album, Pay Attention, finds the band packing a punch that hasn't been heard since their 1994 release Question the Answers. Frontman Dicky Barrett is backing to his old gravelly, glass-chewing vocal antics and pop songwriting sensibility.

Their current single "So Sad to Say" is a great straight-ahead rock song that shows the band maturing while still retaining their intensity (guitarist Nate Albert even inserts a riff from their older song "Don't Know How to Party"). Another great track is the equally rocking "The Skeleton Song" which should quiet the non-believers.

Of course what would a Bosstones album be without the obligatory ska tracks? The track "All things Considered" is probably the most traditional ska song that the guys have ever written. The opening track "Let Me Be" is a great example of the ska-core sound that was prevalent on their debut album Devil's Night Out.

"I Know More" is another danceable track that is more new wave than ska due in part to the synthesizers. The ska-rock song "Where You Come From" has a great sing-along chorus that shows the band in their finest form.

The Bosstones explore new territory on the pub-rock-laden/ Pogues-inspired folk-punk song "Riot on Broad Street." Boston pub rockers the Big Bad Bollocks provide backup vocals on the track, which lets listeners know that the Bosstones' hometown allegiance is still strong. Barrett continues his foray into barroom blues songs with "The Day He Didn't Die," which is a direction that the band has always been successful at taking.

Unfortunately, there are a few throwaway tracks on Pay Attention like "High School Dance" and the calypso-tinged "She Just Happened."

Equally unfortunate is that a Bosstones record can never capture the essence of their live shows. These mistakes can be forgiven though, as fans will rejoice at the fact that Pay Attention shows that the Mighty Mighty Bosstones still have some fight left in them.

DSO pays their respect to the Dead

By Caroline Fullmer
Collegian Staff

On January 10, 1978 the Grateful Dead performed their infamous magic at the Los Angeles Coliseum before a sold out crowd. On April 29, 2000 The Dark Star Orchestra performed that same magic to a sold out crowd at the Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton.

The Dark Star Orchestra (DSO) is a six, occasionally seven member Grateful Dead cover band. They do not play anything else, they do not improvise, they do not funk it out, they do not pick and choose. The Dark Star Orchestra plays the Grateful Dead, word for word, note for note, and song list song. DSO is no basic cover band, started back in 1997 with the intention of "recreating" Grateful Dead shows. These members have chosen to play the Dead how it was meant to be played: one concert at a time, every song, every note, every jam. Therefore, on Saturday night April 29 an unsuspecting audience heard exactly what an unsuspecting audience experienced back in 1978. Though the faces may be different, the music was still the same.

As a music critic I have had the opportunity to see many bands come through this area, many of those bands have covered Dead songs, and some even call themselves Grateful Dead cover bands. However after experiencing last Saturday, night I feel I am being honest when I say there is only one true Grateful Dead cover band out there, one band that not only sounds the same, but even looks the same. The Dark Star Orchestra is that one band, they know how to do it and they do it right, period. I feel confident in saying this only because I have seen The Grateful Dead. Six times I saw that band, each time was memorable, and each show I consider to be one of the best concert experiences I have ever had. However, I can tell you this: the best Grateful Dead show I have ever seen live was at the Pearl Street Nightclub last Saturday night in Northampton, MA.

The Grateful Dead created an era, they made music into a lifestyle, and they left an incredible legacy. Now five years after the last concert was played, their legacy is being continued, continued by the people that still listen to their music, and by the people that still play their music. The six sometimes seven (when Donna Jean Godchaux is needed) members of Dark Star Orchestra know this, and that is why they don't mess with a good thing. Some kid asked in some movie once, what those tingles are that run up and down your spine. Well sorry kid, they aren't ghosts. Those tingles are your body telling you that you are experiencing some really good music, making those tingles are a result of mind and body enjoyment. Those tingles are your body remembering how good The Grateful Dead's music can be and how good The Dark Star Orchestra can play it.

During a DSO show go ahead and sing along, there's no need to feel self conscious about belting out every single word however single song because there you are, you and your neighbor dancing to the beats that you all love equally that you all know so well. There you are with 200 or so other people, young and old, hippie and hippie singing along smiling at each other, dancing with each other. That is what the Dead's music did 30 years ago, and this is what The Dark Star Orchestra does now.

The concert set list is exactly that of 1/10/78. The filler is result of a band that did not want to leave the stage, and an audience that wanted more. Through the entirety of this night not one song or word was changed. However, during "I Know You Rider" DSO felt it only right to personalize the night with shining their light through the [illegible] Massachusetts rain."

Getting involved makes us misty-eyed

Bryan Smith - Manager (Co-Sports Editor)

Collegian, Collegian. Uptown. Collegian... that is pretty much how this year went for me. I spread myself far too thin, but in the end the experience was like no other.

Oh the places I went and the things that happened... let me allow you in on a few things that would not fit in game stories or side bars. We'll call them the adventures of Smitty.

Notre Dame, what a place, what a weekend. There is something about chairs in South Bend, IN. The courtside La-Z-Boys in the Joyce Center as well as Kobo falling out of the chair in the press box. Kobo, even though you snuck inside the prestigious Notre Dame Stadium, I still wish that you got caught just so I could say, "I told you so." Oh well, good job by you Markus Helanen trying to hit a "home run" in the first of the two games, the man in the liquor store who thought that it was strange that I was from Massachusetts and the having to buy dress socks because I forgot them at home. All in all it was fun, too bad that Kobo got to write the story on the win, while I had to write the loss.

The weekend of the series with Boston College. After the first game BC head coach Jerry York started the press conference by asking Kobo, "why do you have two brushes?" Then the most exciting day of the year for me was the next when we traveled to the Conte Forum for the back-end of the home-and-home series. It was a 5-1 upset of the eventually national runner-up. A complete domination in which Kobo and I exchanged a high-five in the press box when Luke Duplessis scored a goal. Good job by us.

Then there was the most eventful trip of the year, Penn State. The details are far too graphic, but all I can say is that 'lacrosse players' can drink anyone under the table. Isn't that right Mauser? But by far the best thing was the ham sandwich in the pocket. That may go down in history as the most random thing in Collegian history. "What was your name again?" Kobo another good job by you sleeping on the floor allowing for involvement. I also had quite possibly the best nap ever. It was the one that I took while Kobo and Mauser were setting up for the WMUA broadcast. Thank goodness for Alivil. Sorry Rose, but priorities take precedence, if you know what I mean.

Then there was my final trip of the year. An Easter weekend excursion to Washington, D.C. My BC hockey moment was almost trumped when the lacrosse team fell just short of an upset at No. 4 Georgetown. Guys, it was the best lacrosse game I've ever seen, thanks for the memories, Rudd, where should we park to get to G'Town? Oh, 17th and T Streets. Wrong, try 21 blocks up and 11 over, kid.

Well, that is all that I'm going to let you in on. For the rest of the information you must come down to the Collegian and write next semester. It may be tiresome sometimes, but there is nothing better on this campus.

To all my friends down here that will be off in the real world, I wish you the very best.

Ralls, I appreciate you sticking it out for four years. It takes courage to be a female in this field and you do it with grace and talent.

Mauser, you're just too random of a guy to write about. You have it all, the brains, the dedication and the boyish good looks.

My business people, you make the paper run.

Deb and Marc you'll do fine. Wait, you're going to be the best. Your smiles will be missed.

Lisa, you're my savior. Thanks for all your help. If you don't get credit for all your extra work, here it is. It will pay off. This place is going to miss your expertise.

To anyone else that I might have forgotten, I'll see you in the fall for one final hurrah.

Brett Mauser – Third Base Coach (Co-Sports Editor)

Man, I need loot.

I'm bouncin' from this place. I retire with only a single loss in Nerf knockout down here at the paper. I'm sick at knockout, despite my poor showing at Haigh. I remember at Robert Parish/Dee Brown hoop camp back in like sixth grade, there were these massive lines, like, the length of the court, and I choked this really good player out in the first run through and he wanted to fight me.

Special thanks to Charlie's for their weekday binges. My parents rock and all, but c'mon now, they've got mad honeys up in that place. Gimme a tall Bud Light, a cue stick, some wings and a few Chiclets and I'm a happy, happy man. The watermelon bubble gum thing didn't work the other night. I was frickin' pissed...

Again... you want D. 1-A football? Administration, let there be beer. You want students to be at the games? Let there be beer. Who cares why they're there, they're there, okay?

My fantasy baseball squad should be wrecking these other goons, but Albert Belle and Mike Mussina are dumpas this year.

You learn a few things on vacation. For all those at Penn State... under the table, suckas. They cut Smitty and I off after two shots... UMass drinks you 'til you yuke. At Baltimore, I learned I am not immortal in air hockey. I got wrecked 7-2 in the championship round. In Puerto Rico, I learned I love Latin women... no, no, no, that was already known.

Seriously, the experience wouldn't be traded for a night with Jennifer Lopez. Well... er... Honestly, though, it's been the best four years of my life and the deepest gratitude, both personally and professionally, goes out to everyone who got this rag out everyday.

It's been a great run. Thank you all.

Aaron Saykin – First Base Coach (Associate Editor)

Sorry I got my ass kicked at the Collegian party... and nearly arrested for it too. Not sure exactly why, though. I only know that's its been a long year...

Anyway, I've come up with "most-likely" distinctions for all the seniors.

Thank you Tuesday night graphics staff. I know I'm a pain in the ass, but we put out the best looking paper of the week. (Most likely to make me an offer I can't refuse)

Mauser, don't get married too young. You're too damn funny and talented to settle down. (Most likely to have a wet dream at 64 and say that it was clutch)

Smitty, you're not graduating yet. (Most likely to stay a fifth year)

Ken, stay out of trouble, kiddo. Enjoy the website and remember who opened you up to the world of Collegian Frisbee. (Most likely to strive for the random hook-up)

Ralls, I'll miss ya. Take care of yourself and that luxury car. Keep coaching: you've found your calling. (Most likely to win a keg-stand contest and then burp in your face for effect, taunting you with just two words: "step off")

Deb, I'll wear a hood next time I see you uptown. Don't lose that wild edge of yours. (Most likely to bust out singing "Papa Don't Preach" during church)

Diane, any friend of Ralls is a friend of mine. Take care of Jack. (Most likely to name her kids after Care Bears)

Gary... hah, hah. Long hair. Peabody. Ha. Don't kick anyone's ass. (Most likely to mobilize a Sicilian militia)

Alexis, you're damn cute. Had to tell you. Probably already knew, though. Go to law school... you're too smart not to. Miss ya. (Most likely to smash Bart's stereo at 3 a.m.)

Lisa, please stop yelling at me. (Most likely to change a hair color and give the people's elbow)

Alison, Don't know you too well, but you seem like a nice girl. Good luck to you. (Most likely to dream about Eric)

Molly, you're a tough girl. (Most likely to get five minutes for a major misconduct)

Christine, Take care of my boy Andrew and make him write. Best of luck. (Most likey to embezzle mad money)

Take care seniors. Peace.

Eric Soderstrom – Bench Coach (Associate Editor)

Although only three people will understand this opening comment, I have to say it: White is two columns of 19.5 and Smitty is one column of 11.5 boxed with no headline (If graphics can even pull that off).

Okay, so with that said, I guess I'll get involved.

If any of you have ever seen our little fillers in the ending pages of the Collegian, for example, "Collegian Sports: We bunt with two strikes," then, well you've seen them.

So I am going to use this space for the fillers that failed to make the final cuts of the Collegian sports pages (If you don't understand them all, whatever):

Collegian Sports: ...

It's a little like wrestling a gorilla. You don't stop reading when you're tired — you stop reading when the gorilla is tired.

We should be on the front page.

We're paying off the Editor-in-Chief.

This box takes up five picas.

It's not the size of the story you have to write, but it's how fast you write it so you can get to "Club Sidewalk."

Besides pride, loyalty, discipline, heart and mind, Greenspan is the key to all the locks.

We're prettier than you.

The correct pronunciation of Despres is Dess-Press.

If you can believe it, the Collegian sports staff can achieve it.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian sports staff comes before New York Times sports staff in the dictionary.

It's too bad that more people don't come down and say hello or nice job. Oh well, we have lots of buffalo wings.

If you chase McElroy or McKendry, both will escape.

Uhm, Mauser's pulling out of the competition? (Don't ask)

I really didn't know what to say so I picked those out of the trash. But seriously, I don't know what's worse with eating ice cream on a couch?

I just want to thank Mauser, Smitty, White and Saykin for teaching me "the way" as a freshman. You guys are right, I've caught that infamous Collegian plague, or whatever you call it. Thanks for taking me in and bossing me around and yelling at me and not letting me play Nerf ball when I am bad. I'll never forget it. You guys rock.

Foster... I'm sorry. She was just too intimidating.

So Despres, I guess we're legit? We must be. Who else gets to sit in the Español press box of Fenway Park?

And don't forget the ordering of Yankees tickets from the pay phone right outside the ticket office at Fenway. Sorry McElroy...

It's been a fun year... Greenspan, we're failing out next semester.

Oh yeah, "I'M LEFTY."

Seth Koenig – Bullpen Coach

I'll do my very best at making this quick, and as little like a high school yearbook entry as humanly possible.

If I'm going to get misty-eyed, it's going to have to involve the Collegian as a whole, and my three-quarters of a year as Editor-in-Chief. There was a lot of stuff that I dealt with in that time that taught me a lot; such as the time-honored lessons like "People suck" and "Everyone hates me". It's great for the morale. Here's to Ken McDonald and Sam Wilkinson, my very different managing editors during that time, and to grafx goddess and my lovely roommate, Lisa Metcalf.

Anyway, how can I forget my three years on the sports staff? I might as well have gotten an apartment in Philadelphia for all the times I've had to travel there, but I can't say that I didn't like it. I love road trips, almost regardless of where they're to.

My football compatriots, Brett Mauser and Matt Vautour, were always amusing, and, for Matt, I'll always appreciate his dead-on BankBoston impression. In an inside joke that nobody outside of Mauser

Minutewomen soccer team prepares for fall season with an intense spring

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Despite the fact that the Massachusetts women's soccer team lost nine players from last year's club, the returning players have shown promise for a successful 2000 fall campaign by virtue of a solid spring.

Since March, the Minutewomen have tested their skills against a variety of clubs from New England and New York in both indoor and outdoor contests.

Outdoors, UMass went 1-0-1 against female competition during the spring. UMass played to a scoreless deadlock against the Springfield Sirens on April 30, but rallied back to crush John Abbott College of Montreal last Saturday by a 7-0 score. The Canadian school was a Canadian Collegiate Athletic Association semi-finalist a year ago, but were dominated by the Maroon and White.

The Minutewomen also played in the UMass/All Sport Invitational on March 4, finishing the indoor tournament with a 2-2-1 record. UMass managed to make it to the finals, but lost to Syracuse by a 2-1 score.

"I thought that we did very well [in the tournament] considering that we were about two weeks behind every team in it [practice-wise]," UMass women's soccer coach Jim Rudy said. "We outplayed Syracuse in the final and outshot them by a lot. I was plased even in defet because I thought that our fitness really came through."

UMass also had a game with Vermont and a tournament at UConn cancelled because of rain. Another scheduled game with the Long Island Rough Riders was also cancelled because of time constraints.

"It's too bad that we didn't get all of our games in on schedule," Rudy said. "It would have been a nice reward for the team for all of the hard work that they put in."

Rudy also credited the dedication of both his players and the training staff during off-season workouts.

"Between Dan's [Magner, the UMass assistant coach] great job improving our fitness and Anthony Catterton and Bob Otrando creating a power program, the kids really bought into both lock, stock and barrel," Rudy said. "The benefits have been obvious so far. We are more skillful and more confident.

"The key thing is that we made great progress last spring, like this we did this year, and now it's a matter of what the kids do over the summer," added Rudy. "I expect [the returnees] to show up ready in the fall because we have some very good new players coming in and it's going to be very competitive."

Out with the old, in with the new

The newcomers to the 2000 edition of the Minutewomen include early letter of intent signees Erin Lilly, Janelle Khouri, Amy Mink and Michelle Luttati. In addition, Rudy also garnered a commitment from Kelly Nigh, a goalkeeper from Seattle, in the past month.

"Kelly is a very athletic, hard-working player who has been in the Region IV ODP pool. Dan saw her down at the Miami Cup, and she stopped three penalty kicks in the final," Rudy said. "She also gives us some size that we haven't had in years' past.

"She worked with Amy Allmann, a former goalkeeper of mine at Central Florida, so I feel very good about her recommendation," added Rudy. "I think that she has the potential to become a big-time goalkeeper here at UMass."

In addition, it also seems likely that current Clemson University goalkeeper Julie Podhrasky will transfer to UMass in the fall. Although Rudy could not comment on the status of the Dallas native because of NCAA regulations, Podhrasky seems ready to become a Minutewoman in the fall.

"I liked the area and the opportunity that the college provides. I'm from Dallas, and I went to school in the South [at Clemson], so I think that UMass will be a nice contrast," Podhrasky said. "As far as the team, it's a good program and it's one that I wouldn't mind investing in."

Should Podhrasky matriculate in Amherst next year, she will bring extensive experience from Clemson, including knowledge of playing in the NCAA tournament. That should ben-

Cahoon 'toots' the horn

New hockey returns to home and welcomes challenge

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

New Massachusetts hockey coach Don "Toot" Cahoon was formally introduced to the public yesterday afternoon at the weekly sports luncheon.

Cahoon, a Bay State native who had coached at Princeton for the past nine years, will take over a Minutemen team that lost only four players from last year's club. Now it will be Cahoon's task to mold the returning talent into a competitive club that can ascend into the upper echelon of the Hockey East conference.

"I'm looking forward to the challenge. I've come back home to Massachusetts, a place where I was born and raised," Cahoon said. "I've been entrenched and steeped in the tradition of Massachusetts hockey, so this is a real thrill for me."

During his 15-minute introduction, Cahoon talked about his previous coaching stops, coaching philosophy and the vision he has in mind for the Minutemen program.

"We've got to be able to compete with Boston College, Boston University, New Hampshire and Maine on a regular basis," Cahoon said. "Those are four of the top 10 teams in the country, and I think that we can achieve parity with them. But it's going to take a commitment by the players to buy into our system."

Cahoon also stressed his hope to work on recruiting within the state of Massachusetts. In fact, he already has two New England products committed for the 2000-01 season – Scott Horvath and Mike Warner.

Horvath comes to UMass from Avon Old Farms in Avon, CT. A rugged 6-foot-3, 230 pound forward, he will be looking to jump into action for UMass next season. Warner attended Arlington Catholic, but hails from Waltham who will also be vying for time in 2000-01.

"Scott was about ready to commit [before former coach Joe Mallen found out his contract would not be renewed], but then when there was a change, he wanted to wait and see before securing a spot. He's a kid with great puck skills and shouting ability," Cahoon said. "Mike is a kid who has real good speed and is a great kid across the board. We think that he'll function well as a defensive forward for us."

As far as the coaching staff, Cahoon inherited assistant coaches Dale Dunbar and Bill Gilligan from last year's club. Dunbar has since left to pursue other opportunities in the sport, while Gilligan's status is still uncertain.

However, former UMass volunteer assistant Brian Dennehy is back in the Pioneer Valley. Since Dennehy's departure, he has since been an assistant with Cahoon at Princeton, and was most recently the head coach at Fairfield University.

"When I came in, I inherited Bill and Dale, who I have both known for many years. After talking with Dale, he decided to move in a different direction," Cahoon said. "Bill is still with us, but we're still trying to find out if he's a good fit for the system. It's not about competence, because I know that he can do the job very well. It's about whether or not he's a good fit."

"We brought back Mark, who is a very hard-working, talented and enthusiastic guy. He coached with me at Princeton and was a part of the three most successful teams that I had there," added Cahoon. "He's been here before, so he knows the lay of the land. I'm very enthusiastic to have him."

Another change for next season will be UMass' style of play. It will also be a bit different under Cahoon. In recent years, the Minutemen have employed the neutral zone trap to confuse their opponents. However, Cahoon wants to keep the team open to many different options.

"With a big rink, there are times when using the trap is appropriate. I'm a coach who wants to use a variety of systems depending on the flow of the game, what we're doing, and what the other team is doing," he said. "We're going to be a multiple-look team."

Cahoon also mentioned that he has talked with each returning player, as well as the collective group, since arriving in Amherst.

"I'm really pleased with the kids. They seem to be very receptive and open to a new system," he said. "I think that we're all looking forward to getting started. In fact, I wish it was September right now so we could get going."

Although the schedule is not officially set, Cahoon mentioned the possibility of facing a handful of opponents from each of the other three big conferences. The Hockey East schedule will once again consist of 24 games.

will understand. I have to say, "Marcel Shipp finds a hole – whoop, whoop, whoop – he cuts into the open field, he's got one man to – damn, damn, damn – beat... Touchdown!!!"

Not that I'm going anywhere physically, but I'd like to throw in that my life wouldn't be possible in general without the support of Torrey Fuller and Boo Downs... and now that she's been thoroughly indoctrinated into the circle, Janine Tangney, who will never live down being a freshman... until next year, when she'll never live down being a sophomore.

Okay, so this is like a high school yearbook entry. So what. You're ugly.

Ben Alamed, welcome to the fold – so glad you're staying the summer ("meow, meow, meow, meow"). Kathleen Ralls? Thanks for keeping me alive for a year or two.

Okay, I'm tired of this now. My time on the sports staff here officially ends with today's feature on Lynne Young and Rebecca Minaker of the women's lacrosse team, so read it and enjoy it... or I'll slash your tires.

I haven't completely ruled out a return in the fall to the Ed/Op page though.

Matt Despres' – Pitcher

I'd like to be sentimental off the top and thank the entire sports staff for letting me back in the loop this semester and handing me a sweet writing gig. It's been fun, and if nothing else I've used this beat to step up and get involved. Nerf basketball helps, too.

Soderstrom, you're legit kid. You've been a hell of a beat partner; hopefully we get to do it again. Saykin, my neighbor and fellow sportswriter, thanks for all the words of wisdom. Enjoy the Apple. Brett, Smitty, Adam and the rest of the sports staff, good job by us. Just take a look around, and there's no doubt as to why we're the best department here. Mendese, it's been fun. Our cross-country coverage set a standard last year that people will forever be trying to match. Despite the Saugus jokes (let me get my boys Ted and Mike D., and we'll meet at the Palace to see what's up), I'll miss you man. Good luck. Koenig, all the best to you as a "real writer." Kobo, thanks for the theme song (I think). And Foster... never gonna happen.

So that's it. I'm jumping ship for a bit, writing elsewhere in the Fall and trying new things. No matter where I am, though, I'm always a Collegian sportswriter. Thanks to you all. I'll see you next year.

Adam White – Catcher (Editor-in-Chief)

First and foremost, any UMass student who aspires to be a sports-writer and doesn't write for the Collegian ought to be beaten with a bat. Not only does this newspaper provide the greatest practical education possible in regards to the field, but the experience of being a part of this staff is valuable beyond words. I truly love each and every member of the sports department, and I know that regardless of where I end up in life, I will always be able to look back on these times as the finest. So thanks, everyone.

Now that I've gotten the mushy stuff out of the way, here's to the seniors. Brett, for a lightweight from New Hampshire, you never cease to amaze me. You're just one of those guys who everyone likes, and for good reason. And if you can still pull chicks with a hairdo like that, God knows you've got it where it counts. Good luck, buddy.

Ralls, please try to forget my ignorance from earlier this semester. Your stock couldn't possibly get any higher; you're already the best. Drinks are eternally on me.

Smitty, you're not really leaving, so you get no love. Just kidding, brother: good job by you to step up and get involved this year.

To the rest of sports, keep it up and know that you're by far the best and most cohesive section of this paper (sorry to all the other departments, but you've gotta stay true to your roots). Soderstrom, I have seen the future of Collegian sports and though you won't get any prettier, you are doing one Hell of a job moving up. Despres, I guess you're hailing on us for a while, but you've done a great job this semester and you'd better come back. Greenspan, I get back, I'll miss you guys. Later.

Gary Mendese – Second Base

So this is where I get all sentimental, right? Fuhgedabahtdit... I don't do "sentimental." Nah, I'm just kidding. Even though I've only been working at the Collegian for two years, the time I have spent here has influenced me both as a writer as well as a person.

Despite what some of my critics say, my writing has drastically improved since I started working down here, and being around so many journalism majors has forced me to improve as well. Am I saying the Collegian has made me perfect? Hardly. Every once in a while I do in fact make mistakes (11 so far this semester), but overall, I think I'm doing all right.

I'd like to give a shout out to Seth Koenig for getting me involved, and Matt Despres, my first beat partner, for putting up with my inexperience. I'd like to thank my co-editor Alexis Pushkar and all of the columnists for working with me this semester. I'd like to thank Adam White, Bryan Smith, Brett Mauser and the rest of the sports staff for printing my sometimes "long winded" articles. And I'd like to give props to Roy Johnston and the rest of the men's gymnastics team for all their support and for bringing me along with them to Iowa.

Speaking of Iowa, the only good things about that state were the hot girls (get over it, feminists) and huge bars. The rest of the state is bunk: plain and simple.

So, this is the last Collegian of my college life. Thanks to all my readers (whether you like me or hated me) and maybe I'll see you again someday. Get involved at this fine newspaper and good luck with your lives. Peace out!

Matt Foster – Third Base

I definitely did enough of that this semester. News, women's lacrosse (you ladies are the best), SGA, what next?

A great big thanks goes out to big Sam Wilkinson, mainly for getting me paid... and for teaming me the waiting teeth of death... I mean the weekly SGA meetings. Adam White thanks for drinking me up, mentoring me, showing me the ways of the "Shadow".

Koenig, good job by you for getting that high paying job at the Recorder and passing on to me the untold riches one finds while covering women's lacrosse.

Mauser and Smitty... thanks for helping me learn the ways of sports writing... God knows I never would've been able to do it myself. Oh and thanks for the beer... and rides.

Matt Despres... good effort by you for conveniently "forgetting" everything you said you'd do for me involving a certain female athlete... this also goes to you Soderstrom.

Thanks women's lacrosse team... you had an awesome season, and I got to cover it... I can't wait to do it again.

Regan McKendry – Shortstop

Why there do I begin? Probably with the fact that I was the least likely person to end up writing for the Collegian Sports. I showed up at a meeting for the Collegian to pick someone up and within five minutes Mauser was asking me what beat I wanted to write. Now one month later I have made it. I am officially a big drum roll: Collegian Staff.

Speaking of Mauser, man I'm gonna miss you next year. I've only know you for two years, but I've never met a person who better knows how to have fun. Say hi to Jennie the Ho for me. You won't be forgotten, although finally someone else can do a football broadcast.

Saykin, master of all eighties music: It's been a great year getting to know you. Thanks for the kind words during the MUA elections and just forget about the whole scandal. Keep stopping by my show next year with those requests and funny anecdotes and have a good time with Dateline NBC. No I will not play Don't Stop Believing again.

Ken, Lydia will be mine someday. Enough said.

And finally Smitty. Even though you're leaving soon, it seems like you'll always be here. You've only got one more semester to help me get involved. Do the same for yourself. Special Bonus points to you for being able to go shopping for clothes with another man, but by more than orange.

The first month was fun. The next few years will be awesome. C-ya.

I've only been writing at the Collegian for a few months now, but it's quickly become my second home. We had some really fun times, from the ten-person game of knock-out to the ridiculous softball games. It proves to me that I should stick to writing about sports instead of playing them.

Despres and Foster, need I say more than, "Gimme a quarter! Gimme a quarter!!! Good times, my friends."

"Big Daddy" and White Shadow, thanks for teaching me about life and about how to have a good time.

Kobo and Saykin, I met both of you through WMUA, but really got to know you through the paper. One of you has been a good mentor and the other has tried to corrupt me beyond belief. Thanks, guys.

Rose, Rudd and the rest of the station crowd, you guys got me started down in the CC basement, and I can't thank you enough for it.

Kenny Mac, you are the man and nothing can change that. You tell great stories when under the influence. Always be the leader you are, now.

Smitty, you have been the biggest influence on me professionally, and the second biggest socially. Every time I say "gettin' involved" this summer and my friends at home give me a weird look, I'll think of you.

Finally, Mauser, you have showed me how to have a good time, and what the true meaning of college is. Anytime I'm mackin' it with the ladies or someone says to me, "Brady, drink," I'll think of you. There's no doubt that you'll be successful, both socially and professionally.

I'll see you all come September.

Adam DeYoung – Center Field

Where would I be without the Collegian? Well, I would probably be at WMUA, chillin out, maxin, relaxin, all cool and all. Instead, I am here looking back on the year that was. If my eighth grade English teacher could see me now!!!

I guess I will begin with Bryan Smith, a.k.a. Schwilly B. Smitty you freestyle like no other and you have the voice of a songbird. If only you weren't mackin (and scoring) all the Saykin you rule. My mentor, my friend, my colleague. I guess I am overshooting your strates a bit. You are of course my friend always, and you are the one that showed me how to write... oh and if I ever catch you mackin on "D" I will have your head.

White Shadow you inspire me to be a better... person? No wait, you inspire me to be a better drinker!!

Kenny Mac... wassuuuup. Whenever I think of you, I will be watchin the game and drinkin' a Bud. Oh and if you ever want to get naked again, you know the number... 545-3691!!

Finally, Mr. Mauser... I have but one word for you...CHILLIN!! You are such a great friend and your skills will be sorely missed at MUA and the Collegian. More importantly, though, I will miss your friendship. You better keep in touch...

For now, to all y'all suckas that don't know, check it out.

Sean McElroy – Right Field

Wow, it took me nearly five months, but I finally got involved. yeah Smitty, with this so-called news rag, Collegian (just kidding) and it was adventurous. Here are my best sport stories of the year that never made headlines (huh huh)!

First up was the Rhode Island basketball game where Kobo and myself had to broadcast a men's basketball game over a telephone as old as George Washington.

Then there was the men's lacrosse game against Navy down in New Brunswick, NJ where I learned a new trade as telephone technician in 10-degree w[illegible] Are you all right Feato, I bet you that guy with the paper airplane in is head isn't?).

Up next was a trip to Butler and a stroll though Canada and I mean a stroll. And what happens, we become friends with a Mountie (Not really, those damn Canadian laws, I thought radar was for ground position)! But the best story of the year happened after UMass' crushing defeat to Siena in the NIT. How does the song Shut your f@*kin' mouth, sound (Thanks Regan for the memorable moment)!

Let's be serious though for a moment, had it not been for my buddy Mr. Saykin, I would have never gotten involved. Then there is Mr. "clutch" Mauser who helped me realize what college life is really all about, partying and having fun (Rose it's dark in here). To the rest of the staff: thanks for the guidance.

Michael Kobylanski – Set-up Man

It has been a fun year to say that least. Although there are not quite as many adventures as there were last year, it's been a fun ride nevertheless.

I was able to add a few more tacks on the map this year. Some of the more memorable road trips included Notre Dame, Penn State and the trip to Philadephia with Zu during women's soccer season.

I'll start off with Philly because that was the first big trip of the year. Zu slept for about the whole ride, then we got stuck in the huge traffic jam on the way to Temple. Oh well, the Minutewomen swept two games and I got to see two baseball games in the process. Sitting about 10 rows behind the Orioles dugout at Camden Yards wasn't bad either, especially when the Red Sox hit four bombs that night.

Hockey season got underway when I decided to tough it out and drive to Colgate. A little advice to all of you – don't make that trip at night, because the roads are atrocious and there are no lights. Oh well, it was another tack on the map.

Notre Dame – what else can I say. The place is everything that you hear about and more. Quality effort by the Minutemen to give me the winning story. The off-ice antics were just as fun, though.

To Mike McComiskey, thanks for not laughing at me when I fell off the chair, which is more than I can say for Brock, Ted and Smitty. The ND Media Relations girl would have been an 'absolutely' if she had known what time the packies were open until. Poor effort by her.

Markus, keep going for those home runs this year. I'm sure you will get one sooner or later.

It was also a good job by me in finding the recliners at the Joyce Center and sneaking into ND Stadium. If you don't believe me, I've got the pictures to prove it.

Smitty had to be a squirrel and choose that weekend to be his designated "I'm going sober for good weekend. Oh well, I got hammered anyway and had a good time talking about the glory days of high school baseball.

Another unforgettable moment took place at UNH a few months later. The Minutemen proved the critics wrong and upset Boston College [high-fives all around] and then tied the Wildcats to get into the playoffs. Getting annihilated with Mauser's friends was pretty cool too, but nothing beat late night Antonio's before I passed out in my car. The Nutrageous bar and the half a bottle of Pepsi were pretty good too. Smitty, I guess that makes up for missing out on the drinking at ND.

As far as Penn State, it sucked a bit because I got sick on the way there and couldn't go uptown in State College with Smitty and Mauser. You two should thank me forever because I slept on the floor and let you two get involved. By the way Smitty, "what's your name, again?"

Like I said, it's been a great year. Before I go, I just want to give my regards to the seniors. Ralls, I'll never forget all the laughs we had at Forden Field. Mauser, you are a thirsty kid – stay at it. Gars, you did a hell of a job on men's gym. Good luck to all of you.

To the rest of you, see you in the fall. I'm ready to add more tacks.

David Rose – Closer

I believe this is the first time I am going by my real name all year down at the Collegian.

I started writing with the Collegian this past year and grew to like writing for the paper as much as I like doing sports broadcasts on WMUA.

First, to the entire Collegian staff for putting up with a smartass like me this entire year. You guys do a fantastic job. Sometimes your work goes unnoticed and I would just like to give you mad props for this year.

To Ralls for putting up with me, Mauser and Rudd in Puerto Rico, especially one incident that will remain anonymous.

To Saykin, who through all his complaining about everything from hotel rooms to whether a foot-long hot dog is really a foot-long, I am forever grateful. He is the man that put the, "What u talkin 'bout Willis" quote to its death in the Collegian.

To Adam "Tighty Whitey" for being a great colleague, and as it turns out a great broadcaster as well. Also, thanks for fixing the closet door in Philly, cause I wasn't doing it. One more run up the Rocky steps next year because I need to get to the top step and then not be looking for a seat to hold myself up. Don't shave your head ever again.

To Rudd for playing Gary Coleman at WMUA all year long. On road trips next season, I get the bed because I am now your boss.

To Smitty for providing us with a WMUA first at Penn State. Good job by you. But most of all for keeping it real as well as being a colleague all year. You have one more semester and it is gonna be off the hook.

Finally, to Mauser, "Killa." "WHOA!" What more can I say, the way I am on air is because I saw from you that you can be professional while having a phat time. The Villanova call will go down in history as the "Oxygen Mask Call of the Century." I will always laugh at your freestyle on the Pre-Pre game show before the Temple game. Good luck in whatever you do, and hear is a toast from me to you, and you know what I am toasting to.

I leave everyone with one thought: Live in the now, don't think about the past, don't think about the future, live for now and live for today. 'Til Fall 2000, peace, BGGA.

It's A-10 tourney time at New Softball Complex

DAN GANTZ/DAILY COLLEGIAN

The Massachusetts softball team will look for solid pitching to compliment their timely hitting as they host the A-10 tournament this weekend at the New Softball Complex

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

Temple could try and comfort itself by saying that the Massachusetts softball team is young. It could say that UMass is inexperienced. It could even say that it is in good position for a win because it has already lost to UMass twice this year, and everyone knows that it is tough to beat a team three times in the same season.

However, there is also no denying the fact that UMass is a quality ball club, and the Owls know that they need to play their absolute best if they are going to have any chance of upsetting the heavily favored Minutewomen today in the first round of the Bell Atlantic/Atlantic 10 tournament.

The tournament is taking place this year in Amherst at the New Softball Complex, giving UMass the home field advantage, and giving the Maroon and White a chance to display its skills in front of their faithful fans at noon against the Owls.

It is a double elimination tournament that will pit the top four schools from the A-10 against each other in a three-day affair. UMass has drawn the No. 1 seed by pulling off a 13-3 conference record and will play 8-6, No. 4 Temple (19-29 overall) in the first round. The match up on the other side of the bracket will pit No. 2 seed Virginia Tech, 39-20 (12-4 A-10), against No. 3 team Dayton (34-21-1, 10-4 A-10), and will take place at approximately 2:00 p.m.

Tomorrow the two winners will play each other in game three at 12:00 and the two losers will battle it out in game four at 2:00. The nightcap of the tripleheader will match the winner of the fourth game against the loser of the third game, and the finals of the tournament will occur at noon on Saturday. A game seven will occur about 15 minutes after game six if it is necessary.

UMass comes into the game riding a hot streak, despite the fact that they just fell to rival UConn in a 3-2 nail-biter two days ago. Their 32-21 record is all the more remarkable because of the fact that the team started 0-9 and did not even get above the .500 mark until the middle of April. Before the game against the Huskies, the Minutewomen had won seven in a row and 17 of their last 18 contests.

For the Owls, freshman pitcher Bari Lynn Pflueger has posted a 1.75 ERA to go along with an even 9-9 record, and will most likely be starting against the Maroon and White. She has been hurt by a lineup that only has one starter batting above .250, and has failed to give her anything in the way of run support. Katie Spencer is hitting a solid .292 with 14 runs scored on the year for Temple, but after her the next best hitter is Ashley Caudill at .248. Erin Byrne leads the team in home runs with three, but also sports a paltry .191 batting average.

In the two previous meetings between the teams, UMass destroyed the Owls 9-1 in game one by the mercy rule, and struggled to hold on for a 1-0 win in a game two thriller. Emily Robustelli and Kaila Holtz paced the offensive attack in the first contest, going a combined 5-8 with a home run and 6 RBI, while Holtz was once again the star in game two, this time on the mound, where she fired a complete game no-hitter. The Minutewomen were able to scrounge out their lone run when pinch runner Kerri Landers came home on a Jen Hadley sacrifice fly.

Either Dayton or Virginia Tech will advance to the second round, and although both rely on an ace much the same way as Temple, they also have strong lineups to compliment these pitchers. Sara Hatcher has had a 20-win season for Dayton, one of those coming at the hands of the Minutewomen, and Ashley Dobbe has gone 17-9 with 1.22 ERA for the Hokies of Virginia Tech. In the regular season, UMass split a doubleheader with both teams, 7-5 and 1-3 against Virginia Tech on April 8 in Blacksburg, and 1-5 and 2-0 at home against Dayton on April 30.

Becoming Atlantic 10 champions is nothing new for the Minutewomen, as they are going for their 13th tournament title. Last year they were able to knock off Virginia Tech in the finals 2-0 behind the pitching performance of departed Danielle Henderson. Catcher Nikki Faetsler and shortstop/outfielder Kiley Scofield were named to the All- Tournament team at the conclusion of last year's final game.

picked up an extra four groundballs during the A-10 championship. Wales tickled the twine once this season, against St. Bonaventure.

Barnes describes Wales as "a groundball machine".

"She means a lot to our team," Barnes said. "She's one of our most aggressive defenders, and she's got a passion for the game."

Ingraffea also said that Wales had "a passion for lacrosse".

"She loves everything about it," Ingraffea continued, adding, "She's an incredible player."

Wales started in fourteen games as a sophomore and finished the season with three goals and two assists.

Despite having only nine total points in her career, Wales made up for it with tremendous defensive play, scooping up 24 groundballs that season, making her one of the team leaders. She also won 15 draw controls that year, and seven this season.

Kain feels close to Wales, as Colleen was Lori's host during her recruiting trip to the university.

"She's a great player, always talking, communicating, helping me out. It's hard as a freshman defender to come into such a great defensive unit and she comes and always tells me the best thing to do," Kain said."If I have a question I can always go to her. She's a great person to look up to."

Majoring in apparel marketing, Wales is currently on the hunt for a job in New York.

She calls her time at UMass "a good experience", adding that she "met a lot of good people."

"Lacrosse helped me settle in as a freshman," Wales said. "My best friends are all here."

As for being called a "groundball machine", Wales said, "when there's a ball, I want it."

Ambrose calls Wales "a great player with great stick skills".

"We'll definitely miss her next year," she said. "She helps us out on both sides and we can always count on her to not lose the ball."

Wales said her fondest personal memory of the four years she's played for the Maroon and White was "just stepping back onto the field and being able to play," after a torn ACL in her knee had her sidelined for the majority of her junior year.

"As a team, I think it's winning the A-10's," Wales said, "I've never won a big championship like that. I didn't know how to react."

DAN GANTZ/DAILY COLLEGIAN

Colleen Wales proved to be a "groundball machine" this year in her career finale, vaulting her Minutewomen to an A-10 championship.

efit the Minutewomen, who are looking to get back to the NCAA's this season.

Only three players on the current UMass roster – Brooke Bartlett, Kara Green and Kathleen Machanier - were on the last club that made the NCAA's, the 1997 team. However, Machamer did not play in the game against Harvard because she was recovering from a torn anterior cruciate ligament.

"Everyone's working towards making the NCAA tournament. I don't know how much one player can do for the team, but I've been there before. That's something that I can bring to the team," Podhrasky said. "I'm looking to make an impact on the team and I'm trying to please Jim Rudy. If that leads to a starting role, then that's great."

Take a bow

The Minutewomen handed out their season awards at their banquet last weekend. Emma Kurowski earned the Most Valuable Player award, while Kristi Robicheau took home the Hustle award. Alexi Rudd captured the Newcomer of the Year honors, while Robin Smith picked up the Sportsmanship award.

In other news, Rudy was honored by the UMass Alumni Association for his contributions to the school at a dinner in Boston last week. Also honored at the dinner were the Male and Female Athlete of the Year, Jeff LaVallee and Jill Meyers, along with UMass baseball coach Mike Stone.

"It was very flattering because some people have been here doing this longer than I have," Rudy said. "And what made it even better was that my coaching staff and six of my players were there with me. That just tied it all together."

Bartlett was also named to the NSCAA Academic All-America team for her work in the classroom. A communications major, Bartlett has excelled both on and off the field for her three years in Amherst.

The road ahead

For now, the Minutewomen have their sights set on the season opener – an August 25 home match against Texas-El Paso. All in all, UMass will have nine home games in the fall, including the UMass Classic. Georgia, the University of Albany and Long Island University also highlight the non-conference slate, while Atlantic 10 rivals St. Joseph's, Temple, George Washington, Fordham and La Salle will visit Totman Field.

The road schedule will be highlighted by a Sept. 13 night game against regional rival Connecticut at Morrone Stadium in Storrs, CT. UMass will also head west in late September to play Arizona State and San Diego State at a tournament in Tempe, AZ. Other road matches include games at Syracuse, Rhode Island, St. Bonaventure, Duquesne, Dayton and Xavier.

The Sports Department would like to bid a fond farewell to its lone graduating senior, Brett Mauser. He'll forever be remembered as the messy-haired kid with the most heart. Mauser, you'll be missed. Good luck in all of your future endeavors. You're clutch, kid.

to make the boys' team, but decided to start a girls' team with six or seven of her girlfriends. Which was good, because some of the boys' parents were going nuts."

The upstart girls' team at UAHS wasted little time in establishing itself, exploding to a second-place finish in the State in its very first season. An undefeated state championship year came next for the girls, and during her third season Hupp scored five of the team's six goals in propelling UAHS to its second straight state crown. She also earned first team All-State kudos all three years, leaving little doubt as to whether she had a future in water polo.

Luckily for UMass, Hupp decided to bring her immense talents here, where she has etched out a fabulous career that will undoubtedly stand the test of time. She ranks second on the University's all-time list in a myriad of categories, including goals (175), assists (87), points (262) and ejections drawn (133). Her stellar senior season has seen her amass 42 goals and 14 assists in 115 quarters played, after an All-American junior year campaign in which she put up equally impressive numbers (45 goals, 37 assists).

"Coming into UMass, I was just psyched to be on a team with a coach that really knew the sport," said Hupp. "Now, it's just unbelievable. I couldn't have asked to end my career on a better note."

Whereas many players wrack their brains trying to figure out a way to incorporate water polo into their lives after college, Hupp seems destined to maintain strong ties to the sport. She has been a swimmer since age five, and neither of her parents envision her simply walking away now that her collegiate career is over.

"This has basically been her life," Mr. Hupp said. "She loves it so much; she's studied it and she's very smart. I think she'd make a great coach down the road."

"The big question is what she would ever do without it," said her mother, Sue. "Marci has gotten so much out of the sport. She's learned a sense of fairness, politeness and how to treat others."

Michigan native Edwards is a true testament to the adage that no amount of adversity is a match for hard work and determination. During her senior year at Lansing Eastern High, the 5-foot-5 natural athlete faced the daunting task of battling back from major surgery and mononucleosis in her quest to ascend to collegiate level water polo.

"Laurie has had a certain toughness all along, but overcoming her health problems has really accented it," said her father Rick, himself a coach and water polo referee at the high school level. "She's always been a competitor, and not someone who gives up easily."

Knowing that UMass had a solid program in place, Edwards came east and made the contacts necessary to walk onto the Maroon and White squad. As a three-year varsity starter, the southpaw field star has provided McOsker's crew with a rock-solid right wing presence on offense and a heads-up defender with a knack for timely steals. Edwards has racked up 57 career goals in 61 games for the Minutewomen, while adding a monstrous 118 steals. She also ranks fourth on the UMass all-time assists chart with 71.

"Laurie's career is about much more than stats," said McOsker. "As a three-year starter, from where she was coming in to where she is now, she has proven that she's a winner."

Edwards has led by example outside the pool as well. After earning a perfect 4.0 GPA last semester, she now stands atop the team in the area of academics with a 3.8 cumulative average. As this year's recipient of the Senior Leadership Award, Edwards is proof that a perfect balance between athletic and academic excellence is possible with the right level of effort.

"Academics have always been a huge part of my life," said Edwards. "I was an Academic All-American in high school and three years running in college. The key is definitely time management; but I've also had a ton of support from my teammates all the way through."

Any discussion of Grogan must start with one simple statement: she is quite simply the most dominant water polo player ever to suit up for the Minutewomen. The California native holds virtually every school record imaginable in the sport (long goals (338), assists (231) and points (567) to steals (345), swim-offs won (147) and ejections drawn (150). She set the school record for goals in a season during her incredible freshman year with 91 tallies, then proceeded to shatter her own mark the next season with 97 scores.

As a two-year letter winner in water polo at Costa Mesa High, Grogan captained the squad to the 1996 Pacific Coast I Championship and earned all-league honors as a senior. That led to a flood of recruitment offers from a number of schools, but Grogan had higher priorities in mind than just settling for a big-name program.

Katie decided on UMass for two reasons," said her mother, Kathie. "She wanted to go somewhere where she'd have an opportunity to play on a regular basis, and she wanted a school where she could make a difference and help build a team."

Tessas that Grogan's other worlds play helped build the UMass team would be a gross understatement. the team went from 26 wins in 1997 to a school-record 31 victories in both this year and last. And just as the Maroon and White became the hot topic in water polo circles everywhere, its All-American co-captain emerged as one of the nation's elite.

"Katie is definitely one of the best players in the country," said McOsker. "She was asked practically every game of the season to guard the other team's best player. And usually the only single play I'll remember most from her career is her pass to Megan Pinto to set up the game winner against San Diego State in her final college game ever at Nationals. She's the kind of player who would rather make the pass than score the goal."

Though she has nearly put collegiate glory in her rearview mirror, Grogan is far from done leaving her mark on the sport. She still entertains aspirations of making it onto the National Team roster, and as a four-time Junior Olympics participant and two-time MVP, it only seems logical for Grogan to be a lock for the global water polo stage.

"At one point in my high school career, I traveled with the National Team for a brief stint to Sydney," said Grogan. "Once I go back to California, I'll be in the area where the team trains and I can put more time into achieving my goal of making it back onto the team."

So as the Minutewomen revel in the glory of their greatest season ever, they must also contend with the bittersweet emotions of bidding adieu to their four senior standouts. But with the level that Claudia Clement, Marci Hupp, Laurie Edwards and Katie Grogan have elevated the Maroon and White to over their four years here, it can be safely said that they will be as much fondly remembered as they are missed.

Fond farewell

Senior captains Young and Minaker leave legacy; the perfect combination of offense and defense

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Trying to defeat an army, in theory, is relatively simple. Get to the head of the operation, be it the general or admiral or whoever, and the troops will be uselessly without direction. The "cut off the head, and the body will go limp" theory is morbid, but accurate, even in the field of sports.

As the meat of the Atlantic 10 realized this season, such a strategy is unproductive in taking on the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team. Amongst a leadership-laden senior class of nine, the Minutewomen post an impenetrable captain at each end of the field – Lynne Young on defense and Rebecca Minaker on offense.

"It makes a huge difference in the fact that there's always some form of leadership on both ends and it really shows itself in games," UMass coach Phil Barnes said of the pair.

Questions about who to mark or where to go when keeping the ball away from top-notch Minutewoman goaltender Jen Nardi? Please address No. 24. She can be found in the grill of the best goal-scorers in the nation, probably rendering them harmless.

"It's good to have a person to look to whether you're on offense or defense," Minaker said. "Even since our freshman year, Lynne's been that sort of person. People will ask, 'Lynne, what do I do here?' Even I do it.

"[Lynne] knew what she knew, and she had to teach everything to everyone else. [Lynne's] stayed consistent, getting better and better every year. She has always been what has made the defense. That's what I see from the offense – she's so confident in what she knows that it's easy for the other players to learn from her and look up to her."

Questions about when to cut to the opposing net and who to direct potential assists to? Please address No. 6. She can be found exposing shortcomings in enemy defensive formations by darting in and out of traffic, with and without the ball.

"It's ideal because, being a defender, when I've looked at the offense in the past four years that we've played, I've always seen Rebecca as a leader," Young said. "You can see from the outside. You can see the leadership qualities there."

The key there is "four years." Leaders are leaders by trait, rarely by creation. Both Minaker and Young have always been leaders – it is not something they learned, but rather perfected.

For Young, former assistant coach Jill Pearsall helped her make the most of her existing leadership qualities.

"[Jill] taught me everything I know," Young said. "I tell our freshmen now, that I remember the day – two practices before Harvard – that everything clicked. I didn't have a starting position until that day. It was nice to have someone finally coach you on how to play defense, and to tell you, 'You're going to mark this girl, and she can't score goals.'"

Apparently, Young took the simple advice to heart.

"You're going to mark this girl, and she can't score goals."

Easy enough.

"Lynne is one of the best one-on-one defenders in the country," Barnes said. "She's really improved since her sophomore year and this year she was able to mark midfielders for the first time, and it really expanded her game and her overall play."

Looking back no earlier than this past weekend – ignoring the three previous seasons wherein Young was named a Northeast Regional All-American for good reason – this defensive dominance is glaring.

In the Minutewomen's opening round victory over Virginia Tech, 10-9, on Saturday in the A-10 tourney, Young was assigned to cover conference Player of the Year Dawn Will. Will had 56 goals in the regular season. Will was scoreless against UMass.

In the next day's league title game, Young took on Tournament Most Valuable Player, Kelly Ruch of Temple. Ruch poured on nine points a day earlier in the Owls' 15-9 drubbing of Duquesne. Ruch was scoreless against UMass. The Minutewomen defeated Temple by a slim 3-2 margin, proving for the second time in two days that Lynne Young is an expert at cutting off the proverbial head.

Minaker, through hell or high water, will always be on the other end of the field making sure that there are enough points on the board to justify Young's guillotine style of defense.

"Rebecca really holds the offense together – she connects at the midfield and she gets it into the offense," Barnes said. "This year her offensive production really picked up. I think she had a point in every game except one. Her play really had an impact on the game."

Like Young, Minaker enjoyed a stellar conference tournament, being named to the A-10 All-Championship team for the second straight year with, aside from all the intangibles, two goals and an assist against the Hokies in round one.

"Rebecca comes to play all the time," Barnes said. "She really pulls through no matter what the situation, so in championship play, that's really accentuated – you notice her all over the field."

Now, though both Young and Minaker have experienced bumps in the road. The two have seen the Maroon and White make a full recovery from its two-year dispansion in 1991-92, with the team's first A-10 crown in the league's second year of existence.

Both players, though headstrong and talented, have seen enough frustration to make the culmination of an Atlantic 10 Championship all the sweeter.

"Basically, every team that I'd ever played with [before UMass] was all offense and all high-scoring, so I kind of did what I knew from high school and just played," Minaker said.

"My sophomore year, I had a harder time getting in the swing of things, just because I had expectations from the year before and our team was getting stronger. The teams we played became more competitive, and we became more competitive, so I had a hard transition into that. Sophomore year was a little bit tougher for me, because I started out up high and then had to adjust."

"My sophomore year was kind of the same," Young agreed. "Our schedule was getting harder, and our freshman year was the first time UMass had been above .500 in a while – it just seemed like we were the class to be the stepping stone every year. My bigger deal was that I was now the only starter on the defensive line, so I had to coach my teammates into what I had learned the last year, being the most experienced of everybody. That kind of took me out of my game for a while, but I had to get used to playing with new people all over again."

Still, if one thing is to be learned from the stories of Lynne Young and Rebecca Minaker, it's that natural leaders don't fade away. They won't let themselves.

"My junior year, I regrouped, and was committed to finding what I had my freshman year instead of getting bogged down with all the mental stuff," Minaker said. "I picked myself up and got out of that. It was all uphill after that – after I got my confidence back."

"It was still a successful year, but there was a lot more adjusting to do... our defense just blossomed, and that continued into our junior year, when we had our best defensive year ever," Young said.

Said Barnes: "I think what the younger kids learn from it is, number one, how hard they should practice, and number two, 'What are Rebecca and Lynne doing right?' 'How can I emulate them and learn from what they're doing on the field... and off the field.'"

Among other things, they're winning.

They did it. Rebecca Minaker (Left) and Lynne Young raise the A-10 championship trophy.

Miele and Wales control no glory side of the ball

By Matt Foster

One of the top goal-stopping defenses in the country. A defense that held thirteen opponents to ten points or less, including opponents like Cornell, Syracuse, Temple and Virginia Tech.

Massachusetts' women's lacrosse has accomplished all of that this season, with the help of a pair of senior defenders, Melissa Miele and Colleen Wales.

Miele, a midfielder from Drexel Hill, PA, has spent four years with the Minutewomen, starting her freshman year, when she got playing time in six games and continuing through this season, which saw her start all fifteen games.

As the fifth highest scorer on the team, she has a scoring average of .800, the highest on the team. She's taken 15 shots this season, 12 of which reached the back of the net.

Head Coach Phil Barnes describes Miele as a "workhorse".

"She's probably one of the hardest workers on our team. She's great," he said.

Miele had three multiple goal games this year, scoring two goals against St. Joseph's, St. Bonaventure and Hofstra. She had three games with more than one goal her junior year, scoring two goals against Connecticut, La Salle and St. Joseph's.

She played in every game as a junior, starting thirteen of them. Miele tallied 11 times as a junior, putting up a scoring percentage of .78.6, another team-leading percentage.

Freshman defender Lori Kain calls Miele "a great defender."

"She's a good communicator, always telling me where to go and helping me out on defense," she said.

"She's a great person off the field, too," Kain said.

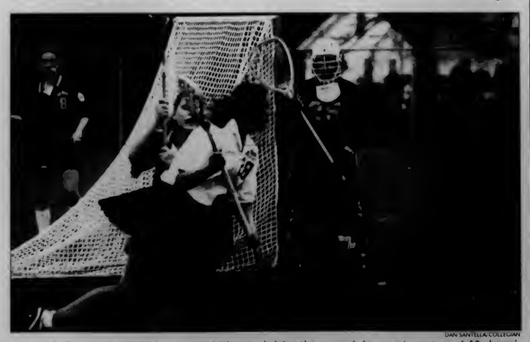
Next on the table for Miele, an animal science major in veterinarian's school at the University of Pennsylvania.

"It's kind of strange, the team, although it's changed, it didn't change a lot," Miele said, on what she called "the core" of nine seniors that have been playing together since their freshman year.

"I had a good four years," she commented.

Miele's fondest memory of her time at UMass was taking the Atlantic 10 Championship last weekend.



"Beating Temple," Miele said, "is definitely close."

Junior midfielder Rachel Ingraffea describes Miele as "very physically strong" and "aggressive".

"When she wants the ball, she goes for it," Ingraffea said. "She positions herself well."

Colleen Wales, a defender from Exton, PA, finished the regular season tied with Stephanie Pavlick for team high in groundballs, picking up 35. She Senior Melissa Miele ended her career on high note, helping the women's lax squad soar to an A-10 championship.

Polo stars reach twilight

Quartet finishes in true glory

Athletes have different ways of fueling their competitive fires. Some are motivated by the prospect of someday reaching the professional level of their prospective sports. Others accept scholarships or other recruitment perks in exchange for a commitment to competition. Still more are driven by the thrill of recognition, in the form of awards or simply the roar of the crowd.

But it is truly magnificent to find athletes whose sole motivation is love for their sport. And that is exactly what has driven Massachusetts seniors Claudia Clement, Marci Hupp, Laurie Edwards and Katie Grogan in their journey to the pinnacle of the collegiate water polo world.

"Athletics is so much more than money or recognition," said Edwards. "Water has always been a big part of my life, and I love being in shape and being part of a team."

Driving the No. 12 Minutewomen to an incredible fifth-place finish at this year's National Championships in Indianapolis was just the final jewel in a glimmering crown that these four athletes have assembled during their careers in Maroon and White. All four have played integral roles in the program's explosive growth over the last four years, during which the team has been forced to overcome an inadequate practice facility, miniscule monetary support from the University and the relative obscurity of water polo here on the East Coast.

In a sport where California schools rule, UMass has emerged as the lone Eastern powerhouse thanks in no small part to the fantastic individual achievements of its senior quartet.

"Each one of the seniors has exceeded our expectations from the get-go," said Coach Dan McOsker. "Look at our finishes at Nationals since they came in: tenth, then eighth, then fifth. That speaks volumes about what they've done for this team."

Foreign players dominate water polo at the highest national level, and Guam resident Clement serves as the Maroon and White's lone international import. Born In Venezuela, Clement mastered the finer points of water polo playing pick-up games against primarily male opposition in Guam's tropical waters even as she competed on the national swim team.

"In Guam, I started playing water polo with a bunch of older guys, doctors and lawyers who had played in college," said Clement. "I practiced with them a couple times a week throughout my senior year, and they really helped me a lot to both learn the basics and get excited about water polo."

Once Clement made the trek to Amherst, her pure power from the field allowed her to step into the UMass lineup and make an immediate impact. She piled up 24 goals and 33 points to rank seventh on the team in the latter category after a single season, and showed a wealth of promise defensively by adding 37 steals to her freshman year stats.

Since then, Clement has been nothing short of magnificent. Over the course of a school record 495 quarters played, the 5-foot-6 phenom has tallied a staggering 163 goals and 209 steals, all the while providing deft outside shooting to perfectly complement the team's powerhouse hole-sets.

Claudia Clement

MEDIA RELATIONS

Her six goals over the course of this year's Nationals included a pair of clutch long-range rockets that just beat the shot clock and kept UMass' momentum skyhigh.

"I was really excited that my offense was at a high level for Nationals," said Clement. "One of my goals all year was to score on a 7-meter foul, so to finally hit one when it counted so much was incredible."

Clement has paid dividends for UMass in ways other than just scoring points. Shouldering half of the team's captaincy, she has provided rock-solid leadership with her exemplary style of play and overall class attitude toward the sport and her teammates.

"Claudia is definitely a people person," said Hupp. "People feel comfortable coming to her with problems and issues, and she's the one at our meetings who's really big into team unity. That had a definite impact on the team's success this year."

Marci Hupp

MEDIA RELATIONS

The most powerful performance at this year's season-ending tourney may have very well come from Ohio original Hupp, who rocked the IUPUI Natatorium to the tune of eight goals in four games. And as dominant as Hupp was with the ball, her offensive onslaught from the 2-meter position may have even been overshadowed by her defensive dominance of some of the nation's best hole-set stars.

The Upper Arlington grad's power and skill were derived largely from her water polo roots, which began when she took up the job of tracking statistics for her high school's men's team. Hupp quickly developed a keen interest in the nuances of the sport, and it was only a matter of time before the already-dominant swimmer took to water polo like a fish to water.

"Marci starting practicing the summer after she began keeping stats, and she really picked up on it quickly," said her father, Ray. "She became good enough

Administration gives nod to surveillance cameras in dorms

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts administration has announced its decision to install surveillance cameras in the lobbies of the Southwest area residence halls in an attempt to prevent alcohol-related crimes.

The decision was announced on April 11 by Chancellor David K. Scott after a Western Massachusetts blackout led to incidents of violence including arson, vandalism and an assault in the Southwest living area.

The blackout, which occurred at approximately 3:15 a.m. on Saturday April 8, was caused by a raccoon that entered a station at the Western Massachusetts Electric Company (WMECO), coming into direct contact with the power equipment.

WMECO Spokesperson Denise Vogel said the raccoon caused the power to be brought down to a level where it couldn't be brought across distribution lines and, "chances are, the raccoon was electrocuted."

The power was lost to campus around 3:18 a.m. and wasn't restored until approximately 4:29 a.m. According to Barbara Pitoniak of the UMass News Office, the entire campus was affected, but most of the incidents were at Southwest.

"There was a large disturbance outside the area of Southwest," Pitoniak said. "Apparently there were incidents of bottles being thrown from windows and people being hit."

Pitoniak said there was an additional report of a male being assaulted outside the John Quincy Adams residence hall, though no injuries were reported.

Two arrests were made by the UMass Police Department (UMPD), one of which was in connection with a fire involving an alleged arson. The first incident involved a UMass Security desk that was taken from the Coolidge residence hall lobby and lit on fire in the middle of the Southwest quadrangle.

John M. Moran, 20, of 365 Gray St., Arlington, was arrested at approximately 4:04 a.m. in connection with starting the fire and was cited for additional charges.

"He is charged with disorderly conduct, inciting a riot and burning a personal property over $25 dollars," Pitoniak said.

Jared Thor Brunn, 21, of 29 Paul Revere Rd., Acton, was arrested at approximately 4:21 a.m. and charged with disorderly conduct and pending additional charges.

A second fire started in a seventh floor dormitory room inside the Washington residence hall at approximately 4:42 a.m. According to Pitoniak, the fire started when a UMass student placed a shirt over a lamp during the power outage. When the power was restored, the lamp caused the shirt to catch fire.

In addition to the campus police, the Hadley Police Department, Massachusetts State Police and the Amherst Fire Department responded to the scene.

While the fire department fought the blaze, additional instances of vandalism were reported, including vehicles in the vicinity of the fire having their windows smashed with objects.

According to Pitoniak, Chancellor Scott was passing through the Southwest area during the time of the outage and said he was concerned by the actions of the students who had participated in the "unruly behavior."

"This kind of behavior is deplorable and incompatible with the University's excellent academics, excellent faculty and top-notch students," Scott said. "We will not tolerate such behavior and we will see that all appropriate disciplinary steps are taken."

Three days later, it was announced that the administration would be carrying through with a proposal to install surveillance cameras in the lobbies of Southwest residence halls.

Chancellor Scott said the purpose of the cameras would be two-fold. They would serve a security purpose to prevent strangers from entering into the buildings during late hours when Student Security is not on-hand.

The second purpose of the cameras would be to prevent large amounts of alcohol from entering into buildings in an attempt to decrease the amount of alcohol-related crimes in the residence halls, incidents that Chancellor Scott said comprise of nearly 80 percent of all campus crimes.

Student Trustee Seth Avakian spoke out against the cameras at a Faculty Senate Meeting. Avakian said the cameras would go against the purposes and mission of the university as a learning environment, prohibiting upon student's rights to learn.

"The students have spoken very loudly and very clearly that they are against this," Avakian said. "I don't think that it would be easy to teach to a student that feels as though they live in a prison."

He went on to state that security cameras themselves would be a violation of student privacy and cited the recent Student Government Association ballot question in which the majority of students voted against having cameras installed. According to the SGA, of the 2,414 students that voted, 1,900 are opposed and 514 are in favor of having cameras installed.

Chancellor David K. Scott said the referendum results reflected the opinion of an "insignificant" number of students because only 14 percent of the UMass undergraduate students voted in the spring elections, and thus didn't accurately reflect the consensus of most students.

In addition, he stated that the cameras would not be monitored 24-hours a day. Instead, the tapes would be reviewed by campus officials only in instances in which a crime were to be reported around the residence halls.

SGA President Jeff Howe said he was concerned that the same kind of student who would burn a security desk, would have the inclination to break a security camera.

"Absolutely. They can be broken quite easily, and despite elaborate protections, a can of spray paint can undo most of the work," Howe said. "Nobody is saying that what happened there [Southwest] was right, and in fact it makes us look like a bunch of fools, but that doesn't mean cameras should be put in."

He suggested to the faculty alternative methods to making the campus a safer place, including adding an extra security van to the already existing route or hiring a professional security staff in buildings.

Last fall's assaults that occurred on campus are also a concern, Chancellor Scott said. On Nov. 2, a student reported allegedly being assaulted around 6 p.m. at the Campus Center Pond. On Nov. 9, another student reported being dragged into bushes adjacent to the Student Union at approximately 2:15 p.m. On Nov. 14, a third student reported being assaulted by three individuals outside the Campus Center Pond, but was able to free herself by pepper-spraying her offenders.

According to Scott, although the cameras could not prevent such outside activity, they would create an environment on campus that would invoke increased awareness to the issues of safety on campus.

Meanwhile, the SGA is organizing a petition drive focused on opposing the installation of surveillance cameras in campus residential areas. Other alternatives posed by the student senate have included the creation of a committee comprised of students and administration representation to address safety problems, while others have suggested creating a community watch program be put in place, rather than security cameras.

According to Chancellor Scott, the safety of students on this campus is a large concern and he said that after observing the incident in Southwest in April, he is convinced that installing cameras would be the best alternative to decreasing the amount of violence on campus.

He said there is no indication of when the process would be completed, but stated that students will have a direct representation in the issue. According to him, the cameras could be installed as early as next fall.

SGA frowns at decision

By Sam Wilkinson
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association's administration has reacted against Chancellor Scott's announcement that security cameras would be placed in Southwest.

Jeff Howe, the SGA President, said that Scott's proposal "flies in the face of what we've been trying to work on."

Howe had been alerted that the Chancellor planned to install cameras in Southwest, but didn't have details of when or where they would be placed. He said that the original message stated that the cameras would monitor outdoor areas, but felt that Scott had increased the cameras scope to include lobbies and hallways.

"I just hope that isn't the case," Howe said.

Student Trustee Seth Avakian described the measures as "reactionary."

"It shows no concern for the opinion of students, and I really don't believe it will serve the purpose he intends it to. There is limited funding, poorly paid security guards, un-staffed buildings, but for some bizarre reason," Avakian said, "the Chancellor believes security cameras are a good idea."

Mikale Billard, the Speaker of the SGA Senate, was "shocked that the decision came out the way it did."

"We hadn't heard anything about it. The Chancellor didn't mention anything to us [during the Safety Walk]. He only asked us for his support," Billard said.

The only explanation that Howe, who made security cameras one of his major campaign issues, had heard was that their installment was "related to [last semester's] fires and the riot situation." Last semester, students burned a security desk night during a power outage in front of Washington Residence Hall. Two were suspended after being charged in connection to the fire.

Howe felt the cameras would do nothing but make people feel uncomfortable. He suggested a community watch or "more interactive measures before monitoring how people live." Howe wondered where funding for the new cameras would come from.

"We can't get adequate lighting or call boxes," Howe said, later expressing disbelief saying that he "didn't think he'd [Scott] install video cameras."

Howe, Avakian and Billard all said student input should have been considered before the decision had been made.

Unions offer bids to prevent privatization

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Three unions at the University of Massachusetts that oppose privatization on campus have put in bids to maintain control of the University Store and the Textbook Annex.

The unions, USA/MTA, SEIU509, and AFSCME Local 1776, which belong to the Campus Community Labor Coalition, presented their bid to UMass Procurement Officials during a small rally at the Goodell Building. Union members, on-campus privatization opposition, and Representative Ellen Story from Amherst attended the rally.

In addition to the bid submitted by the union organization, the trustees also received two other bids from outside corporations. The University made the choice to privatize the University bookselling-corporation called the Follett Higher Education Group of Chicago, effective as of July 1. This decision came after much debate and review by the Board of Trustees and Chancellor David K. Scott.

"We are looking at a future that includes new stores, more competition, e-commerce and other challenges," Scott said. "Our own campus store has already taken steps to use Information Age methods."

He went on to say that he felt that Follett was the best choice for the University financially.

"Follett's bid provides for a significant financial return to the University, protects our employees, and delivers the best possible package for our students," Scott said. "In times of constrained budgets, we have to look at these opportunities where they can be accomplished responsibly and respectfully for our students and employees. Follett has done that."

Last spring, trustees hired consultants to study the cafeteria and auxiliary services, which included the University Bookstore, comprised of the University Store and the Textbook Annex. The reports concluded that the cafeterias on campus were failing to make a profit for the University, primarily due to high costs of union wages and benefits paid to workers.

The union bid planned to combine the University Textbook Annex with the University Store. The bid called for a two-step renovation process, in which a bookstore cafe will be added to the University Store space. In addition, the bid also entailed a reconfiguration of the University Store that would cost about $225,000. Another major portion of the bid is further development of the bookstore's "e-commerce" program that offers books for sale through the Internet. Students could currently access merchandise through the UMass website.

As of now, bids are being reviewed for the open spaces on campus. The deadline for bids for all food retail organizations on campus, including the Bluewall, the Coffee Shop, and the Hatch food court.

On-campus mail system endures delivery problems

By Aaron Saykin
Collegian Staff

While the mail changes each day, one noticeable constant remains: the stacks of undeliverable envelopes that pile up below the mailboxes of Johnson Dormitory at the University of Massachusetts.

One day recently, instead of the usual credit card applications or other bulk mail, three summonses for jury duty sat atop a five-inch stack of letters sent to students who no longer live at Johnson Residence Hall in Northeast Residential Area.

Whether they're junk mail or important notices, letters litter other dormitories on the Amherst campus as well.

The problem with delivering the student mail at the University of Massachusetts stems from the lack of emphasis during the training of mail sorters, officials said.

One student was angered by the mail sorters disregard for her jury duty notice, which was sent to a former address and discarded in a pile. UMass sophomore Rebecca D. Anderson, who lived in Johnson Residence Hall last fall, moved to Alpha Kai Omega sorority house this past semester.

Yet her mail continued to be delivered to her old address. Her jury duty envelope was one of three that sat atop the pile of junk and misdirected mail in Johnson dormitory. She said, if not for her former roommate, she could have missed the call for jury duty. Anderson said her former roommate called her telling her that mail was still arriving at her old address and mentioning the jury duty envelope.

Anderson said that she began to worry because of the line involved with missing jury duty. Finally her new jury duty summons arrived at the correct address, just one week before the date of summons. After speaking with her former roommate again, an angry Anderson learned that it was the third notice sent.

"I got it [one] Thursday, and I had to go [the next] Thursday," Anderson nervously said of the notice. "My old roommate had to call me and tell me. What if I still wasn't friends with her? I would have never known. I would have st my pants."

Anderson said that most of the mail that her former roommate received came from credit-card companies or other bulk-mailing centers. While she said she is furious about the discarded jury duty envelope, she said that she was overall satisfied with the on-campus mail redirection process.

The Southwest Area Director Jean Alstrand-MacKinnnie said that such mistakes are made because student employees who sort the mail do not check a printed database of residents' names that indicates which mailbox belongs to which student.

The list, she said, is updated weekly, and provided for the employees that sort the mail for each residence hall on campus. She said a simple solution would be a computerized database.

Her comments came after learning of the confusion to begin the spring semester. Most complications occur because of the month-long semester break, when no mail is delivered. The University often attempts to sort the month's worth of mail as quickly as possible for returning students, she said.

Commonly, students who have moved find in their mailbox credit card bills or other pieces of mail addressed to past residents. Although the University provides a bin and posts a reminder sign for misdirected mail in every dormitory, many students drop the misdirected mail on the floor, creating an enormous pile after a week, said Alstrand-MacKinnnie.

SUNY Honors Chair speaks to audience as dean search continues

By Jake Lilien
Collegian Staff

The search for a permanent dean of the Commonwealth College continued during early March, as Ruth Schwartz Cowan, the fourth of five candidates for the position, spoke to students and administrators in the Campus Center.

Cowan currently serves as the Chair of the Honors College at State University of New York [SUNY] at Stony Brook, where she also teaches history.

Cowan began the seminar by discussing her background, and her desire to teach the interdisciplinary courses offered by honors colleges. She described the Honors College at Stony Brook, where she and an administrator are the only faculty members.

"We are so under funded that there are only two of us to advise 250 students," she said. "Unlike the Dean of the Commonwealth College I choose my students and the faculty members on my advisory board. I recruit faculty to teach our courses. And I personally meet with every student."

She added that she is looking at positions at other universities "because I was tired of having to argue with my dean over every $5 [that we spend]."

She then opened the floor to questions. Sam Blasiak, a sophomore economics major, asked about the common perception that the Commonwealth College is divisive.

"Many of the other students see it as elitist, promoting differences between students," Blasiak said.

"I've never heard of a public university with an honors college that isn't charged with elitism," Cowan responded.

"According to my understanding," she continued, "the funding that is going to the Commonwealth College is not going to the rest of the University. It is what we call an add-on. It's not as if the money was taken from other programs. But let's say that it was.

"There are a couple of reasons for this – one is a phenomenon we call raising the bar. The presence of high-achieving, motivated people can make the academic experience better for everyone. The other reason is that a university's prestige comes from what important jobs their alumni have had, and how much money they've given back.

"In America," Cowan continued, "we at public universities are not going to be able to get high-achieving students to enroll without special perks. To compensate them costs money. I wish we lived in a different world, but that's the world we live in."

Blasiak also asked if she would support the idea of honors dorms, and she said she would not. She noted, however, that she supports the SUNY Stony Brook's system of having honors housing that is available to all students.

"Whether I could convince the administration to discontinue this policy [of having Commonwealth-exclusive learning communities], I don't know," she added.

She also stated that allowing Commonwealth students to live in Learning Communities for only one year "doesn't seem to make a huge amount of sense."

Cowan was also asked about how she would go about increasing the number of minority students in the Commonwealth College.

"Recruiting high-achieving minorities to a public university is not a piece of cake, but it is possible. We need to increase the amount of scholarship money, and use clever recruiting strategies."

When informed by Search Committee Chair Mary Wilson that Massachusetts law does not allow public universities to distribute race-exclusive scholarships, Cowan responded, "Then you don't say [that the scholarships are race-specific] in the stipulations – you just go and do it."

sentiments on better training for mail sorters. Along with other residential area directors, he and Alstrand-MacKimmie cooperatively manage the mail system from different ends. While Alstrand-MacKimmie supervises the people who hire mail sorters, Clarity is mostly in charge of misdirected mail once it is returned. But he agrees that such mail is seldom dropped into the misdirected bin.

Unlike the mail sorting policy, his forwarding mail office takes special care of important notices like jury duty envelopes or letters from the Department of Motor Vehicles, he said.

"When we get returned mail we pull those types of things out right away. Those are important. The sorters really should have taken care of them in the first place," Clarity said. "Part of the problem is that some students do not return misdirected mail."

According to Clarity, when his workers pick up misdirected mail from each dormitory, they must report to him any possible problems – even if the residence hall does not report them. Clarity said that these workers are asked to look for mail lying on the floor and any damage to mailboxes as well.

If they find anything unusual, Clarity said he reports his concern to the residential office, but can only encourage, not implement change. He also conceded that the system is unusual and not ideal.

For students who move, Alstrand-MacKimmie said that they should first properly check out of their old dorms to avoid this problem. Secondly, she said that relocated students should notify their creditors or anyone else who might send them mail. What worries her, however, is the misdirected mail that relocated students cannot control, specifically jury duty envelopes.

"Throwing mail on the floor is not a responsible thing to do," said Alstrand-MacKimmie, who said that residents could help by not mistreating any misdirected mail. "We should take neighborly responsibility but that just won't always happen but I guess this could be an issue brought up in training. We could certainly look at training materials and highlight some sections for the sorters to take extra care with important mail."

On the other hand, Alstrand-MacKimmie sympathized with the sorters because of the nature of the UMass mail system, which does not provide a central mail outpost for students, but instead routes mail to individual residence halls.

Alstrand-MacKimmie also defended the sorters, citing that an improved system could meet them half way. Hired by both residential directors and assistant directors, the sorters, usually students, rely on a paper database of residents within each dorm. Alstrand-MacKimmie said she wants a database computerized. This step, she said, would allow the name labels on the reverse side of mailboxes to be quickly changed if a student moves.

"We know [misdirected mail] is a concern, but it's not always easy for the sorter to know about the changes, especially if one is made right away," she said.

The call for a computerized system by proponents like Alstrand-MacKimmie was a topic only discussed last semester in meetings between the housing assignment offices and the area directors, she said. When the groups first met to discuss mail concerns two years ago, the main worry was mail theft. As was the case for problems of the past, Alstrand-MacKimmie said that the current request for computerized labels will eventually alleviate much of the misdirection problem.

Professors speak out on cuts

By Melissa Hammel
Collegian Staff

Since the announcements for campus-wide budget cuts were made, academic departments have been facing difficult decisions and negative consequences for their programs.

Chancellor David K. Scott issued an order in late January stating that each department on campus must reduce its budget by one to three percent. Due to this order, departments such as Consumer Studies have had to cut programs, while other departments have been left with little of the funding necessary to continue to run smoothly.

According to Reb Roy, the office manager for the Spanish Department, the program has already seen some of the consequences of the lack of funding for the program.

"We offered 180 sections to students this year," she said. "We are only allowed to offer 90 sections for this upcoming year."

In addition, the department has also seen the elimination of teaching assistants. According to Roy, the lack of teaching assistants will make it difficult for students to get into the classes that they need for the upcoming semester.

"We see students struggling to get into classes that they need for their degree," she said.

The program was faced with a shortage of teaching assistants over the past semester. Due to the lack of funding, they were not allowed to hire the personnel necessary for teaching the number of classes that were being offered to students.

"We were told that we had the funds, and we hired in good faith," she said. "We were then told that we had no money."

She explained that many people on campus were concerned about the budget cuts and were looking for a potential solution to the problems that faced the campus. She went on to say that the lack of help from the University proved to be overall frustrating for many departments.

"I don't know if they are offering any solutions to these type of things," she said. "Everyone seems to be walking around scratching their heads."

She went on to say that, "It is very hard to understand exactly what they [the University] are trying to accomplish."

Some departments with programs cut during a previous round of budget problems remember all too well the difficulty of a lack of funding. One department, the Slavic and East European Studies program, was forced to cut Russian as an individual major three years ago due to monetary issues.

According to Professor Joseph Lake, the head of the department, the program is now running along side of the Slavic and East European Studies major and allows students to pursue the Russian language in different ways. He explained that he was not concerned about budget cuts in the program, due to the cuts that had already been made during previous years.

"The adverse effect already happened a few years ago," Lake said. The Labor Studies Department also remained optimistic about budget cuts. Tom Iorvich, the head of the department, explained that no definitive plans had been made as to what to do about the budget constraints. He commented that because the department did not know by what percent their budget would be cut, they could not specifically state what would and would not be cut from the department. He did however, express concern about the cuts as a whole.

"All of the departments are deeply concerned about what the budget cuts will be," Iorvich said.

According to Jerry Mileur, head of the Political Science department, the situation is not pleasant for anyone involved, though he maintained that the cuts were only proposed and he was uncertain of what the future would hold.

"Nobody likes budget cuts, he said. "But there is nothing final in these early projections."

Two Sociology professors started an online petition to prevent the budget cuts from occurring.

200 faculty members from more than 30 departments and programs spanning seven of the nine schools and colleges signed the letter.

Norse invasion: Viking exhibit lands at Natural History Museum

By Peter Carlson
Washington Post

WASHINGTON – A thousand years ago, the Vikings were feared and loathed throughout Europe for their habit of looting cities, burning monasteries, kidnapping noblemen and raping women. Earlier this summer, they were the subject of a laudatory exhibit at the Smithsonian's Museum of Natural History.

Which shows just how much a despised ethnic group can improve its public image simply by discovering America.

The Smithsonian exhibit consisted of a multimedia extravaganza titled "Vikings: The North Atlantic Saga." It is timed to celebrate the thousandth anniversary of Viking adventurer Leif Ericson's voyage to various spots in Canada, a trip that occurred somewhere between 997 and 1003 – nearly 500 years before Christopher Columbus took his famous boat ride.

The exhibit aims to erase the absurd stereotypes that have grown up about Vikings over the centuries. For instance, the average American believes that Vikings were violent, rapacious plunderers who wore metal helmets with horns sticking out the sides. This is not true. Actually, they were violent, rapacious plunderers who wore leather helmets with no horns at all.

The exhibit is adamant about this helmet issue. In a display called "The Way They Weren't," a sign reads: "It's sad but true – Viking warriors never wore horned or winged helmets." Next to the sign is a collection of the kind of Viking helmets that Vikings didn't wear, including a plastic horned Viking helmet, a purple felt Viking helmet and a Minnesota Vikings football helmet. There's also a cartoon of Elmer Fudd wearing an inaccurate Viking helmet in the otherwise excellent 1957 movie "What's Opera, Doc?"

Inexplicably absent from this gallery of Viking-inspired pop culture is America's best-known Viking, Hagar the Horrible, the horn-helmeted marauder of the comics page, who just last Tuesday shared his philosophy of life with his young son: "On raids to England, take everything you can carry, but leave the rest for those less fortunate."

Hagar's helmet may be historically inaccurate but his view of England as ripe for plunder is dead on. The Vikings raided the British Isles every year from the late 700s through the mid-800s, sacking towns and monasteries and carting off everything they could carry in their longboats. The most famous of the raids was the attack on Lindisfarne, England, in 793. "On 8 June," a monk wrote at the time, "the ravages of heathen men miserably destroyed God's church on Lindisfarne, with plunder and slaughter."

In the exhibit, the raid on Lindisfarne is depicted in a gloriously lurid mural that shows the monastery burning and a Viking warrior grabbing an Englishwoman and shoving her toward the beach. A corpse floats in shallow water and one Viking warrior rips up a Bible while others roast a pig on a spit and pass around a drinking horn of grog.

The mural is part of a display called "Going Viking," a phrase which meant "sailing off to ransack and rob." The Vikings were, as the display points out, "part-time pirates." Most of the year, they were normal Scandinavian farmers. But during the summer, after the crops were planted, they would sail off under the command of a local chieftain to loot and plunder, returning in time to help their wives and kids harvest the crops. These raids were so lucrative and so much fun that by the mid-800s, the raiding parties grew to dozens of boats and some Vikings started pirating full time, venturing as far as Lisbon, Kiev and Constantinople. Paris was plundered annually until 845, when the weary Parisians paid the marauders nearly six tons of silver and gold bullion not to sack the city again-an early example of the protection racket.

To do a proper job of plundering, one needs the right tools, and the exhibit displays them: heavy metal swords, long spears and fierce-looking battle axes. The accompanying sign describes a typical battle in delightfully evocative prose: "wild frays of slashing swords, flying spears and battle axes smashing shields."

This stuff is big fun. You gotta love a museum exhibit that has a big sign that reads, "Pillaging and Plundering."

But Viking life was more than just pillaging and plundering, alas. Back home in Scandinavia, nearly all the decent farmland was claimed by the mid-800s, and so landless Norsemen began settling in places they'd visited on raids – Normandy, Scotland, Ireland.

The heartier among them took to the North Atlantic in their open boats, bringing their families and livestock with them to Iceland, where they found arable land and hot springs. There, many Vikings settled down, gave up pirating, converted to Christianity and became respectable farmers. In 930, the Icelanders founded an assembly called the Althing, thus pioneering the concept of the legislature, which is, it might be argued, a far more civilized institution for looting and plundering the citizenry.

By 1200, Icelandic bards were writing down the tales of Viking heroes that had been told around the fire for centuries. These "Icelandic Sagas," populated by characters with names like "Thorfinn the Skull-splitter," are as bloody as gangsta rap or the Bible.

One saga recounts the story of Erik the Red, who was banished from Iceland after he killed several men in a quarrel over borrowed bed boards. He and his posse fled west to an icy wasteland that the crafty Erik decided to call "Greenland," hoping that, as the saga puts it, "people would be attracted there if it had a favorable name."

Amazingly, this Realtor's trick actually worked, and Erik's Greenland settlement lasted for centuries, until a mini-Ice Age drove settlers away. The exhibit has a wonderfully macabre display of bones disinterred from Erik's graveyard-six skulls, three of them bearing scars suggesting that their owners' demise was hastened by ax blows to the head.

The saga of Erik does not reveal what happened to those folks, but it does recount the story of how Leif, Erik's son, sailed west with a group of Greenlanders and discovered a land where grapes grew. They set up a settlement and – surprise! – ended up fighting with the locals.

For centuries, nobody knew how much of Leif's story was true and how much was the blarney of the bards. But in 1960, Norwegian archaeologist Helge Ingstad unearthed an ancient settlement in northern Newfoundland that contained relics proving conclusively that the site was a Viking village from Leif's time.

Some of those relics are in the exhibit – a ship's rivet, a soapstone lamp, a busted barrel, bits of iron slag. They aren't much to look at, but they take on a bit of magic when you realize that they are proof of a pre-Columbian European settlement in America.

And they make you wonder: Is it ironic, or simply appropriate, that a group famous for looting and pillaging Europe were the folks who first brought "Western civilization" to the New World?

Our Opinion
Welcome to UMass

Welcome to UMass.

You've made the right decision. Choosing to come to the University is a choice that you will probably never regret, and that you may, indeed, come to regard as one of the most important you ever made.

This is a place for growth and development, and that is what you will need to do. Open your mind. Do not close off any options to yourself; always consider yourself an Undecided major, always take random classes for fun, always go out of your way to meet new people.

Join organizations. There are so many RSOs (Registered Student Organizations) on this campus that it is almost guaranteed that you will find one to suit your needs. From the media like us at the Collegian and the radio station WMUA, to political groups like the Republican Club and the University Democrats, to athletic groups like the Ski Club, you can find anything that your little heart desires. And that isn't even the tip of the iceberg.

If you get a chance, go exploring in the town of Amherst. There are great things to be done there, great food to be eaten, great beers to be drank, and much fun to be had. Don't think that the UMass experience is confined to the campus, or you will be making a horrible mistake. Venture out at the soonest possible opportunity; you won't regret it.

Take your classes seriously. An education is, after all, the real reason you're paying so much money to be here. Don't skip without a good reason, do your work, and for the love of God buy your textbooks. There is no greater mistake that a UMass student can make than not buying the books and then trying to get them from the library or borrow them from a friend when the exam rolls around, because it simply will not happen.

When you're taking your classes, make an effort to get to know your professors and teaching assistants. Professors, by and large, are good at what they do and can help you an many ways and make your education much more well-rounded with some personal experience. TAs are closer to your age and can identify more with your problems than professors, and still have a greater range of knowledge and experience than you do. Only good can come of better knowing this people.

Respect your RA. Don't get into trouble in your dorm; It's where you have to live, and you do not want to be removed for being stupid. Have fun and play hard, but don't make your RA do something that they probably don't want to do.

We here at the Daily Collegian wish you only the best of luck in your upcoming college careers. May you make the most of the UMass experience and carry your lives forward in a positive and safe manner.

You made a good choice.

Metallica versus the world

It seems that Metallica has struck again. We thought they would stop at Napster, but even after their lawsuits against Amazon.com, Yale University, and Revlon, they have continued their legacy to sue everyone on the planet.

Ima Scoundrel, a representative from the legendary rock band announced yesterday that Metallica plan to sue all radio stations across the country. Just like the Soup Nazi, the band's representatives said, "No free music for you!"

"The members of Metallica are sick and tired of the people of this country having the ability to listen to their music for free. It is absolutely unacceptable that people should be allowed to turn on their radios and listen to Metallica without having to pay them some sort of a fee."

Metallica was unable to be reached for comment in person because they are currently in court pursuing their lawsuit against Chemistry. If you remember, they proclaimed last year that, "There will be no more free use of the word 'metal' in today's public schools. Every single time a high school Chemistry teacher tries to tarnish our reputation by connecting the first half of our name to something like a 'metal ore,' we know that they're just trying to rip us off. Therefore, we've taken the names of over 600,000 Chemistry teachers, and they will feel the wrath."

After Metallica finishes suing Chemistry, they plan to move forward with their attack against the radio industry. If you factor in the amount that Metallica is worth in dollars, and their plan to sue the radio stations for every time they have played a Metallica song over the past twenty years, it is almost positive that radio as we know it will no longer exist.

Metallica realizes this, and assure the public to not yet panic. Scoundrel read a press release from founding drummer Lars Ulrich:

"Though radio will be gone, we will certainly find something or someone else to sue. There are plenty of other media elements that we haven't tackled yet. We're pretty sure that MTV has exploited us, even though they never play our videos. So we have two things we can nail MTV for. Number one, fans are unfairly watching Metallica videos without paying us for it. Fans need to understand that in order to see our videos you need to purchase a ticket. Therefore, we're going to sue MTV and anyone who has ever viewed it. Number two, we plan on suing The Backstreet Boys, N'Sync, Carson Daly, the entire cast of 'The Real World,' Tom Green, and Britney Spears twice (once for each breast) because all of these people are taking up valuable Metallica time that we could be using to sue people for seeing without paying us."

Ryan Benharris

During one television Interview with the band, in the middle of the suit against Chemistry, they were asked what they expect all of these people to do after they have been sued. Ulrich replied, "Bend over!" To this, lead vocalist James Hetfield added, "Yeah, it's like a freight train comin' your waaaaay! Ha Ha!" The band repeatedly laughed over and over again before walking away from the camera. Guitarist Kirk Hammet was overheard as saying, "Hey we should sue the dude who just interviewed us. I think his name was James something. That's got to be a rip off of my man Hetfield."

OK, so by my gross exaggeration you know that the preceding attempt at a news story was very fake. However, the message I'm trying to portray is very real. We're all upset at Metallica for suing Napster and everyone who uses it. The Internet has become a vast wasteland of millions of ways to listen to music without paying for it. Tackling whether or not Metallica should be upset is not my intent. I certainly don't disagree with anyone taking legal action against another party whenever necessary, but it is obvious that Metallica has gone too far. They've been in and out of court more times than Michael Jackson, and he molested children. It is certainly time for Metallica to stop and realize how ridiculous they look. By compiling a list of over 300,000 names of Napster users, it is unclear what they hope to accomplish.

If Metallica wants to spark some change in the way that music is distributed online, then they should find more productive ways to do it. Instead they've chosen to take the selfish route that will only benefit them financially. Hopefully the lawsuit will prove so worthless to the group that they will stop their petty squabbling with everyone.

In case you haven't heard, the following things have been trademarked by Metallica, and legal action will be taken if they are broken. Banging your head in an 'up-down' motion as to signify that you are listening to a Metallica song, use of the word or number "one (1)," not forgiving someone, cutting your hair, and growing a mustache. Oh yeah, in case you're worried about the Sandman coming into your room at night, don't be afraid. He's locked in a county cell awaiting his trial against the superpower that's suing him for entering a child's bedroom without paying the proper royalties.

Orientation blues

Don't get your hopes up.

I know what you're thinking. That's right, all you freshmen-to-be reading this during your orientations, I know exactly what is on all your minds. I also know that you need to stop thinking those thoughts right now.

If this is the first day of your orientation, you're all excited about the few days to come during your virgin stays here at UMass. You're enraptured about all of the people you'll meet, the things you'll do, and the fun you'll have.

Get over it, because none of it is going to happen the way you've planned it in your heads. You will, in fact, meet numerous people during your orientation; you may even like some of them and hang out a little bit before you have to go home again. Don't get attached; you will never see these people again. My roommate during orientation was a guy named Seth from Brooklyn who came to be a defensive lineman for the football team. He wanted to stay up until 3 AM to watch the Bulls playoff game on his portable TV; I didn't argue.) He was roughly twice the size of the dorm room we were stationed in; if I ever saw him again I am sure I would have recognized him, but I never ever did.

Rob Schulze

This campus is so huge and populated by so many random people that it is easy for you to lose yourself, never mind anybody else (even a guy the caliber of Seth). If you go to Orchard Hill and the person you meet goes to Southwest, that is it. Southwest and Orchard Hill aren't so far apart by mere coincidence; the social circles are completely different (jocks versus honors students, beer versus mineral water) and people don't have much of a tendency to run into each other. So give up that idea.

You also probably won't have as much fun as you think. I mean, you'll probably have some fun (as long as you don't go to the Bluewall open mike – that is where fun goes to die), but not nearly as much fun as you think. For one thing, it is hot as hell and nearly as humid in Amherst during the summer, so you should plan on spending your entire orientation bathed in your own rancid sweat.

Also, you'll be taking tests fairly much all the time, which I would rate right up there on the Fun Meter with pulling out individual pubic hairs. Failing the UMass food fairly much guarantees lengthy stays on the UMass toilets.

Also, you'll be taking tests fairly much all the time, which I would rate right up there on the Fun Meter with pulling out individual pubic hairs.

Not exactly the ideal fun-filled vacation you had in mind, eh?

As for the things you'll do, well, you'll take tests, sweat, meet with advisors who will tell you to take the classes they personally teach, and do a lot of walking around campus totally lost, even if you do have your map.

Is all lost, then? Are your few days donated to learning about your new home a total, ill-spent waste of your precious lives? Well, almost. But not quite.

You can definitely learn a lot about UMass from your student advisor. They probably will (and definitely should) cut through all the crap and tell you flat-out what life is like here and what you should and should not do. To be perfectly honest, UMass rules and you can have the time of your life here, but not if you fail out or live in a place where you'll be miserable.

My advice: don't kill yourselves first semester. Take Food Science classes and Psych 100, and tell 'em Rob sent you. If you can get away with it, just take four classes; your parents will bitch and moan, but you'll have a lot more fun and a better chance of not failing out first semester.

Pay close attention on your campus tour, particularly to the dorm rooms. Where you live will have an enormous impact on your UMass experience, and you need to live in a place which makes you happy. I recommend Orchard Hill, Southwest towers, and Central, but that's just me. Some people love pubic hairs. Of course, some people also masturbate to midget porn, so you have to take these things with a grain of salt.

Whatever you do, though, don't take anything too seriously. This whole orientation venture is a big propaganda session that's designed to get you excited about UMass without you leaning what it's actually like. Chances are you will love this place (I know I do), but not for the reasons told to you in your orientation; after all, there wasn't even any public drinking or nudity during my orientation.

So that's it: try to relax, take nothing seriously, and get some sleep if you can. I'll see you in the fall, and trust me, you'll have a lot more fun then.

Especially if you're into midget porn.

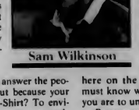
Welcome to UMass

Welcome to the University of Massachusetts, home of the free and land of the brave. You've been accepted into the most prestigious University in the entire northeast, no no no, the entire eastern seaboard, no no no, the entire country, no no no, the entire world.

Listen to people; they'll tell you.

Welcome to UMass.



They'll tell you how good we are, how amazing we are, how activist we are, how liberal we are, how smart we are. But it isn't all sunshine, sugar and spice. It's where you can learn about everything that's good in the world.

But slow down there young freshman.

Welcome to UMass.

Don't think for even the slightest, shortest, tiniest or cutest amount of time that everything you learn is going to be good, great and positive.

Some of those same people, the ones that were bragging all day long about good we are, they'll tell you how bad the "system" is. How bad the man is. How bad most people are. How corporate people are.

Sam Wilkinson

Welcome to UMass.

So what's your response? How do you answer the people that will accuse you of being a sellout because your aging grandmother bought you a Gap T-Shirt? To environmental groups that will maintain you want cute seals to die because you refuse to sign their petitions? To people that maintain your support of a free and open campus is ridiculous and restrictive?

Because those people are here, be them the rabid environmentalists, Republicans or anti-sweatshop students.

Welcome to UMass.

You're all young, most of you anyway. It's your first year away from Mom and Dad, your first year away from your brothers and sisters, your first year away from high school and the things that made you feel safe.

A rough observation, but it's true. The decisions you make, for the most part, will be yours. You'll be responsible for the people you associate with, the people you call your own, the people that you allow to influence you.

And because of that, it's your responsibility to make informed decisions, and informed means seeking out information, opinions, viewpoints and beliefs. To accept, because you're told to, the idea that sweatshops are bad, that Republicans are good or that the SGA is just fine as it is to avoid any actual thought. And you don't come to this University to avoid "actual" thought.

You come here because you aggressively thought in school. Because you were able to conjugate verbs and solve complex theorems and because this school thought you'd be a good candidate for independent thought. This campus didn't select you to be a "yes man" or "yes woman." It selected because you'd be an honest person, a person that was informed enough to make good decisions.

And that doesn't mean supporting a cause without being informed. The people that chose you believe that you'll make informed decisions on your own, a noble charge, a brave calling, and an important trust on their part.

But can you be a part of it?

Can you make sure that you know the "whole" story before you choose to be a radical left-winger or a radical right-winger? Will you be able to say that you know enough to make an informed decision?

Because you can't if you only know one side. Imagine It like this. If you can't make an impassioned argument for the other side of the argument, the side that you don't agree with, you can't make an informed argument about your side. The ability to play devil's advocate might be the most important skill you ever pick up here on the green learning pastures of UMass. You must know what the other side is thinking and saying if you are to understand what your side is saying.

Because understanding is more important than being able to spew forth the party line or being able to explain your side. Your side isn't as important as knowing why the other side feels the way it does, because you are opposing the things they say.

So here's hoping that you Involve yourself enough to know what "they" think. Go up to the Republican's office and give a big 'ol hello to Mike Marin or Zach Spilman. Go down to GEO and say "yo" to James Shaw and the others down there. Stop in at the Student Government Association and say hi to president Jeff Howe or check in with the Graduate Student Senate and give a huge "wassup" to Executive Officer Jon Zibbell.

It's your job to know what's going on, and if you don't, you're strangled by the other side which knows that you know nothing about their position. You're at a University, the perfect opportunity to learn about the other side and what they believe.

If you don't, and you choose to believe what whoever "they" are tell you, you won't be taken seriously by the "opposite" side, the exact group that you need to take you seriously.

Because if they don't take you seriously, no one will.

Your Guide to all that's going on in the Pioneer Valley

Mission: Conquering the box office

By Adam Martignetti
Collegian Staff

What's the expression in Hollywood? Spring showers bring summer dollars. At least that usually seems to be the case.

Movies like Erin Brokovich, which became the first $100 million groaser on the new millennium earlier this year, Scream 3, which was the largest February opener ever at $34.7 million, and Mission to Mars, which opened to $22.9 million on March 10, have prepared us for the summer blockbusters, but the best (or worst) is yet to come.

Hollywood's biggest box office season is ready to get under way, and it all starts tomorrow with what is fast becoming one of the biggest box office weekends of the year. During the same weekend in May two years ago, Deep Impact had the largest non-holiday opening of the year and went on to become the sixth highest grossing film that year ($140.4 million). One year later, The Mummy was the second biggest non-holiday opener of 1999 (behind only Austin Powers: The Spy who Shagged Me) and the eight largest grosser ($155.2 million) in the exact same weekend.

This time around, it's Gladiator that occupies the coveted weekend. The film starring Russell Crowe (L.A. Confidential, The Insider) and directed by Ridley Scott (Aliens) has already been described as "epic" and some people are saying that it could be the next Titanic (somehow that's supposed to be good). With preliminary screen counts indicating a massive number of locations, Gladiator's box office presence should be massive. The only thing that could potentially hold it back would be its two hour and thirty minute run time, but that didn't stop Saving Private Ryan ($30.6 million open at nearly three hours).

Final Verdict: Gladiator will open between $45 and $50 million with the final gross of $170 million.

John Travolta brings father of Dianetics and Scientology, L. Ron Hubbard's book onto the big screen in Battlefield Earth. The sci-fi fare has an obvious built in audience, but could struggle in the wake of Gladiator. Over five million copies of Hubbard's book have been sold worldwide. Combine this with Travolta's fan base and I'd expect numbers slightly better than The General's Daughter ($22.3 million open last year)

Final Verdict: open $25 million, final gross $105 million

On May 19, Disney will release what should become this summer's biggest hit, Dinosaur. A combination of stunning animation and Disney marketing has the film tracking well among all age groups. The Lion King opened at $40.9 million June 15, 1994. Dinosaur should easily top that, making it the largest animated opening ever. I'm going out on a limb here and saying that the film will become the all-time highest opener for a non-holiday period (surpassing Austin Powers: THWSM at $55 million) Think Jurassic Park

Final Verdict: open $62 million, final gross $350 million (tie, sixth all-time highest)

If you're looking for summer sleepers, then Dinosaur's weekend might be a good place to start. Two teen films, Loser and Road Trip will vie to become a summer breakout film. Since the teen romance genre has been lagging lately, I'd have to give the edge to the grossout, moronic Road Trip, which also has Tom Green's name attached to it.

Final Verdicts: Loser: $7 million open, $25 million gross. Road Trip: $12 million open, $50 million gross

Memorial Day weekend sees the return of ultra-superstar Tom Cruise to his role as super-secret spy Ethan Hunt in Mission: Impossible 2. Perhaps the most anticipated sequel since that Menace thing, M12 is guaranteed gold at the box office. The original opened at $74.9 million over the five-day period in 1996. Sequels always open bigger, so buy tickets in advance. This has an outside chance to challenge The Phantom

Tom Cruise hopes his Mission Impossible sequel climbs to the top of the box office this summer.

Boston's Godsmack will be one of the bands on this year's Ozzfest tour.

Ozzfest: This summer's best traveling festival

By Michael Delano
Collegian Staff

Winds blow from the bowels of Hell again this summer as the Ozzfest tour is set to begin its fourth nationwide jaunt starting at the beginning of July. Sponsored by Sega Dreamcast, the metal militia rolls by these parts on July 29 and 30 at the Tweeter Center. Hot off the success of last year's Black Sabbath-headlined show, Ozzy will host the show for what he claims will be the final time, although he'll be maintaining involvement in future Ozzfests to be hosted by other major acts. The official Ozzfest site at www.ozzfest.com assures fans that while much will stay the same, there will be both improvements and additions. The site features preliminary sketches from artist Perry Blake, which show what the stages will look like this year, and massive demons and crimson reas are the dominant aspects. Also, Roy Masvoga, formerly of Soulfly, will be assuming the position of Ozzy's drummer this year. Fans can also expect another hilarious Ozzy intro movie, which is currently in production.

Never Neverland, the line of kiosks which features tattoo artists, piercing, jewelry, and the infamous breast painting, will be back in full force this year, in addition to Sega kiosks which will feature a variety of Sega products with an obvious focus on their successful Dreamcast system. Reveille has also recently been added to the second stage, splitting the four dates in half with newcomers Pumpjack, who will take over duties at the beginning of August.

The lineup this year is formidable, but can't really compete with past years, mainly due to some poor choices, placement, and repeats from previous Ozzfests. The main stage will feature, in addition to Ozzy, Pantera, Godsmack, Static-X, Incubus, Methods of Mayhem, P.O.D., and Queens of the Stone Age. Pantera, behind Ozzy, is the undisputed highlight of this year's lineup. Their recent album, Reinventing the Steel, again reaffirms their position as the kings of modern metal, and they will no doubt ignite the stage, Southern style. Godsmack, returning to the main stage again this year without another album under their belt, seems a poor choice despite their popularity, so hopefully some new songs will generate more interest than hearing "Whatever" for the 1,000th time. Static-X also seems an unlikely choice since they too were just part of the festival last year and have released only a couple of new songs since last year. I love Static-X, but with Mininry on the same tour, they'll have to work much harder to make an impression with their industrial sound.

Incubus returns to the tour after a one-year absence, and the mellow flow of their latest release, Make Yourself, will provide a nice contrast to the other heavier acts. Methods of Mayhem, Tommy Lee's rap/metal offering, is just crap and shouldn't be on the tour at all, let alone the prestigious main stage. P.O.D.'s recent buzz was certainly instrumental in landing their main stage spot, although their mid-afternoon time slot will make it hard for them to make a substantial impression. Queens of the Stone Age, a sludge-rock group in the tradition of Monster Magnet and Kyuss, will have an even harder time impressing the sparse crowd with their early time slot and far from easily accessible sound.

The second stage, headlined by Ministry, features a daunting eleven bands, with the usual few unsigned acts. On the list are Kittie, Taproot, Primer 55, Pitchshifter, Disturbed, Crazy Town, The Deadlights, shuvel, Slaves on Dope, and the aforementioned Reveille and Pumpjack. Ministry is the perfect headliner for second stage, and their set will be a blast provided they play very little from Dark Side of the Spoon and a lot from Psalm 69 and The Mind Is A Terrible Thing to Taste. From the popularity of their unimpressive debut Spit, Kittie, by being an all-female band, will add variety, if nothing else, to this year's lineup. Taproot, who plan to release their debut album, the gift, on June 27, have already amassed a dedicated fan base and plan to hit the road previous to Ozzfest with other promising newcomers Papa Roach. Primer 55's debut album, An

Full slate of summer movies set to explode

By David Troupes
Collegian Staff

The summer movie marketplace is always a fascinating one: with kids out of school and home from college, there is incredibly potential for profit, and filmmakers will do anything and everything they can to claim as much of that expendable income as they can. Smaller, more independent-flavored films tend to be shouldered out by the box-office giants, but the occasional indie gem can garner enough attention to take advantage of increased theatre attendance. The market is flooded from all directions by movies eager for a piece of your movie-going dollar, and the result can be an often overwhelming field of choices. Hence, the following guide, which should let you know what to expect from the silver screen this summer

MAY

Gladiator

If you have both an x and y chromosome, you better see this movie. Aussi Oscar nominee Russell Crowe plays a Roman general forced to compete in the gladiatorial arenas by the tyrannical emperor. Gladiator opens this weekend, and is an excellent vacation from your term paper blues.

Battlefield: Earth

Adapted from L. Ron Hubbard's classic science fiction novel and both produced by and starring John Travolta, Battlefield: Earth tells the story of a beaten Earth's resistance to its alien conquerors. It remains to be seen how effective Travolta will be in an action lead as the alien warlord, but those in need of a comic book-style sci-fi fix should be able to find their fill.

Dinosaur

Disney takes a good thing, i.e. a beautifully rendered, fully-CGI prehistoric world of dinosaurs and primitive mammals, mixes it before a comet strikes the Earth, and screws it up with cliched story arcs and general silliness.

Screwed

Norm Macdonald, Danny DeVito, and Lochlyn Munro star in this possibly funny farce about three guys looking to extort some monies from their rich elderly employer. Hopefully this will improve upon Macdonald's last movie, Dirty Work, an exercise in tedium.

Mission: Impossible 2

Ah, yes. This movie is going to kick our asses up one side and down the other. Tom Cruise returns as Ethan Hunt, and costars with the excellent Ving Rhames and Anthony Hopkins. John Woo, the man behind such thrill-a-minute flicks as Face/Off and Broken Arrow, will direct. Hopefully, this sequel will retain the intrigue and mystery of the first movie, while turning the action sequence and plot decipherability dials up a few notches.

Shanghai Noon

Jackie Chan's latest pain-by-numbers action movie, this time set in the Old West. I think we all know what to expect here.

JUNE

Big Momma's House

Martin Lawrence continues to encroach onto Eddie Murphy's turf, here playing a cop going undercover as an obese middle-aged woman known as Big Momma, complete with tubby body suit. There's no denying that although sometimes annoying, Lawrence is a talented comic actor, and this could provide a welcome respite from the guns and explosions that generally populate summer movies.

Gone in 60 Seconds

"What do you think is more exciting – stealing cars or having sex?" Either one as long as I don't have to do it while watching this movie. Nicholas Cage whose popularity continues to astound me, costars with Angelina Jolie in an action movie about competing gangs of car thieves.

Shaft

Samuel L. Jackson and Busta Rhymes. That's all I have to say. I'll see you at the theater

Titan A.E.

An animated science fiction romp from Fox, with such notable voices as Matt Damon, Bill Pullman, Drew Barrymore, Nathan Lane, and Janeane Garofalo. With any luck, this could be what Episode I was supposed to be last summer: sci-fi entertainment without the wooden acting and artificial dialogue. Expect the action to be tailored for a younger crowd.

Me, Myself and Irene

Jim Carrey, taking a breather from the serious roles of The Truman Show and Man on the Moon, stars in his newest comedy from the Farrelly brothers, the guys who brought us There's Something About Mary and Outside Providence. Carrey plays a state trooper whose two different personalities collide when he forgets to take his medication. Each sided thing he self falls in love with the same woman, a wayward beauty named Irene, played by Renee Zellweger.

The Adventures of Rocky and Bullwinkle

There should be some sort of law against stuff like this.

The Patriot

Mel Gibson stars as Genera Francis "Swamp Fox" Marion in the Revolutionary War drama and sure fire box office juggernaut. God bless America.

The Perfect Storm

Based on the best-selling book of the same name, this movie will retell the heroic efforts of a fishing boat crew to survive a north Atlantic storm of incredible ferocity. George Clooney, Mark Wahlberg, and Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio are among the talented actors involved.

JULY

Scary Movie

The spoof that had to happen. The Wayans brothers take a stab at the resurgence of slasher flicks. As if the originals weren't stupid enough

The Vi-Men

Hell yes.

What Lies Beneath

Harrison Ford stars as a professor investigating a supernatural murder with Michelle Pfeiffer as his wife. With such recent mistakes as Six Days, Seven Nights and Random Hearts under his belt, it would be quite disappointing if Ford had once again chosen a ill-conceived, light weight script that further scars his career. What ever happened to the guy who made The Fugitive and Clear and Present Danger?

The Hollow Man

Kevin Bacon stars in this supernatural thriller about a scientist who discovers a means of becoming invisible. The only problem: how to turn back? Hopefully this movie won't turn out as cheesy as it looks like it will.

AUGUST

Coyote Ugly

This movie tells the story of an aspiring songwriter who takes a job in a female-run night club in New York City, and stars all of your favorite swimsuit and lingerie models wearing halter-tops. John Goodman costars, hopefully not in a halter-top.

Space Cowboys

Clint Eastwood stars in and directs this movie about aging pilots who want to undertake one last outerspace mission. Tommy Lee Jones, James Cromwell, and Donald Sutherland costar, a veritable who's-who of over-the-hill-but-still-got-it actors.

Menace's five-day record of $105 million.

Final Verdict: open $87 million, final gross $183 million.

Jackie Chan returns, this time to the Old West in Shaghai Noon. It's more of the same tricks for Chan, and I simply don't think the audience is there, especially after last year's Western disaster Wild Wild West. Rush Hour ($33 open, $98.4 gross) was as much Chris Tucker as Chan. This could be disappointing.

Final Verdict: open $17 million, final gross $54 million

Big Momma's House looks like a good follow-up to the surprising Blue Streak ($19.2, $67.9) for Martin Lawrence. The trailer looks halfway decent and this could break out. Watch out for Waterboy syndrome here.

Final Verdict: Open $27 million, final gross $100 million

Gone in 60 Seconds features hot cars and hotter Angelina Jolie. Toss Nick Cage into the mix and you come out with $100 million. This is prototypical summer fare.

Final Verdict: open $24 million, final gross $101 million

With a veritable plethora of big name teen stars (Freddie Prinze Jr., Jason Biggs, Claire Forlani, Alyson Hannigan, and Monica), Boys and Girls could also be a potential hit. If it's She's All That, then it's golden, but if it's Down to You, then it could be in trouble. I haven't seen anything to make me decide one way or the other.

Final Verdict: open $13.9 million, final gross $46 million

Shaft with Samuel L. Jackson. There's not really much else to say. This should have a cult following, but I'm not sure if it will catch on in the mainstream.

Final Verdict: open $13 million, final gross $65 million

Fox gives audiences its animated answer to Disney in the form of sci-fi Titan AE. Matt Damon, Drew Barrymore and Janeane Garofalo provide voices. The trailer looks good and I like it to top the June 16 weekend. Could also die among mixed audiences.

Final Verdict: open $27 million, final gross $108 million

One of the summer's biggest wildcards is Fantasia 2000. After an exclusive IMAX release during which it grossed $42.4 million, the updated version of the Disney classic is set to hit everywhere June 16. Dinosaur should still be around then, so Disney might find itself in a promoting bind. Plus, I'm not sure anyone still wants to see it after six months of release.

Final Verdict: wait and see...

Jim Carrey has given up hopes of an Oscar nomination and returned to being... well, Jim Carrey. In Me, Myself and Irene, a Farrelly brothers comedy, Carrey plays a state trooper with multiple personalities. Audiences will be waiting with open arms for Carrey's return to form. Think Ace Ventura Part 3.

Final Verdict: open $42 million, final gross $120 million

Famed animation innovator Nick Parks takes a mainstream turn with Dreamworks' Chicken Run. Mel Gibson will do the voice of an American chicken who falls for a British hen. The animation may be brilliant, but this still might not reach everyone.

Final Verdict: open $14 million, final gross $73 million

In perhaps, the most brilliant marketing scheme since the last time it was done (Independence Day), Mel Gibson takes his Revolutionary War epic, The Patriot, into a July 4th weekend. Rumored three hour running time doesn't help. Director of ID4 does. Mel Gibson's not Will Smith, but he's pretty damn good.

Final Verdict: open $30 million, final gross $160 million

Warner Brothers tries to answer the same weekend with The Perfect Storm. Based on the true story of a 1991 sea storm, I think this one has potential. It may skew to a younger audience or people wanting something less heady than American patriotism. Plus, I smell a "money shot" when the ship encounters that huge tidal wave.

Final Verdict: open $37 million, final gross $127 million

In the absolute stupidest TV adaptation ever, July 4th also stars Rocky and Bullwinkle. The trailer looks awful and a blend of animation and live action is generally a bad idea.

Final Verdict: open $7 million, final gross $35 million

One of the summer's most talked about films, The X-Men, hits theaters July 14th. Despite a trailer that looks slightly embarrassing at best, this will be huge. It's what we call a Greasy Fan Boy Movie (GFBM). That is, a movie that no matter how awful it looks, a select number of devout fans will see in excess of ten times just to brag that they did so. The X-Files Movie was a GFBM. The Phantom Menace was a GFBM. The impending Final Fantasy Movie and Tomb Raider are both GFBMs. Comic book collectors have been salivating over this for some time now. Don't go opening night would be my advice.

Final Verdict: open $37 million, final gross $175 million

Pokemon: The Movie 2000. I said the "P" word, so you should all be rushing for tickets as you read this. The original shocked experts with a $31 million open before falling like a deflated Pikachu. Sequels always open igger.

Final Verdict: open $41 million, final gross $82 million

The final movie on my list of box office goldmines is Nutty Professor 2: The Klumps. Eddie Murphy charmed audiences with the inanity of the first installment ($25.4, $129). And remember, sequels always open bigger.

Final Verdict: open $31 million, final gross $110 million.

Here are my predictions for the top five openers and top five grosser:

Openers

Mission Impossible 2 (3 day) - $65 million
Dinosaur - $62 million
Gladiator - $47.5 million
Me, Myself and Irene - $42 million
Pokemon - $41 million

Total Gross

Dinosaur - $350 million
Mission Impossible 2 - $183 million
X-Men - $175 million
Gladiator - $170 million
The Patriot - $160 million

Introduction to Mayhem, is about as enjoyable as a root canal, but they proved at the recent New England Metal Festival that they can move the crowd so their set should be tolerable. Pitchshifter's placement in the middle of the second stage is the biggest crime in the history of Ozzfest, and their excellent industrial punk metal will no doubt be highlight of the second stage. Disturbed have been making serious waves with their recently released debut album, The Sickness, and the Chicago metal outfit is currently spreading their disease on the road with Danzig. Crazy Town is another band to jump on the rap/metal bandwagon, and while I wasn't at all impressed with their debut single "Toxic," hopefully their live show will leave a more lasting impression.

A dose of aggro will be added to the mix when The Deadlights hit the stage with selections from their self-titled debut, while the recently signed shovel bring their brutal funk fresh off a tour with Kittie. Canadian rockers Slaves on Dope bring their revolution-minded sound to the second stage, and Pumpjack does their rocking Texas style, so well, in fact, that they caught the attention of members of Pantera, who decided to help the band out. New England audiences won't be seeing Pumpjack however, instead getting Reveille, whom will no doubt be well-received, but I have to admit I would have much rather seen an upcoming band that hasn't played a million shows in the area over the past year.

Ozzfest 2000. There it is, and tickets are already on sale. How can I describe it? Pantera already did it for me when they said, "It's Goddamn Electric."

Despite the fact that the Massachusetts women's soccer team lost nine players from last year's club, the returning players have shown promise for a successful 2000 fall campaign by virtue of a solid spring.

Since March, the Minutewomen have tested their skills against a variety of clubs from New England and New York in both indoor and outdoor contests.

Outdoors, UMass went 1-0-1 against female competition during the spring. UMass played to a scoreless deadlock against the Springfield Sirens on April 30, but rallied back to crush John Abbott College of Montreal last Saturday by a 7-0 score. The Canadian school was a Canadian Collegiate Athletic Association semifinalist a year ago, but were dominated by the Maroon and White.

The Minutewomen also played in the UMass/All Sport Invitational on March 4, finishing the indoor tournament with a 2-2-1 record. UMass managed to make it to the finals, but lost to Syracuse by a 2-1 score.

"I thought that we did very well [in the tournament] considering that we were about two weeks behind every team in it [practice-wise]," UMass women's soccer coach Jim Rudy said. "We outplayed Syracuse in the final and outshot them by a lot. I was plased even in defet because I thought that our fitness really came through."

UMass also had a game with Vermont and a tournament at UConn cancelled because of rain. Another scheduled game with the Long Island Rough Riders was also cancelled bcause of time constraints.

"It's too bad that we didn't get all of our games in on schedule," Rudy said. "It would have been a nice reward for the team for all of the hard work that they put in."

Rudy also credited the dedication of both his players and the training staff during off-season workouts.

"Between Dan's [Magner, the UMass assistant coach] great job improving our fitness and Anthony Catterton and Bob Otrando creating a power program, the kids really bought into both lock, stock and barrel," Rudy said. "The benefits have been obvious so far. We are more skillful and more confident."

"The key thing is that we made great progress last spring, like this we did this year, and now it's a matter of what the kids do over the summer," added Rudy. "I expect [the returnees] to show up ready in the fall because we have some very good new players coming in and it's going to be very competitive."

Out with the old, in with the new

The newcomers to the 2000 edition of the Minutewomen include early letter of intent signees Erin Lilly, Janelle Khouri, Amy Mink and Michelle Luttati. In addition, Rudy also garnered a commitment from Kelly Nigh, a goalkeeper from Seattle, in the past month.

"Kelly is a very athletic, hard-working player who has been in the Region IV ODP pool. Dan saw her down at the Miami Cup, and she stopped three penalty kicks in the final," Rudy said. "She also gives us some size that we haven't had in years' past."

"She worked with Amy Allmann, a former goalkeeper of mine at Central Florida, so I feel very good about her recommendation," added Rudy. "I think that she has the potential to bcome a big-time goalkeeper here at UMass."

In addition, it also seems likely that current Clemson University goalkeeper Julie Podhrasky will transfer to UMass in the fall. Although Rudy could not comment on the status of the Dallas native because of NCAA regulations, Podhrasky seems ready to become a Minutewoman in the fall.

"I liked the area and the opportunity that the college provides. I'm from Dallas, and I went to school in the South [at Clemson], so I think that UMass will be a nice contrast," Podhrasky said. "As far as the team, it's a good program and it's one that I wouldn't mind investing in."

Should Podhrasky matriculate in Amherst next year, she will bring extensive experience from Clemson, including knowledge of playing in the NCAA tournament That should benefit the Minutewomen, who are looking to get back to the NCAA's this season.

Only three players on the current UMass roster – Brooke Bartlett, Kara Green and Kathleen Machamer - were on the last club that made the NCAA's, the 1997 club. However, Machamer did not play in the game against Harvard because she was recovering from a torn anterior cruciate ligament.

"Everyone's working towards making the NCAA tournament. I don't know how much one player can do for the team, but I've been there before. That's something that I can bring to the team," Podhrasky said. "I'm looking to make an impact on the team and I'm trying to please Jim Rudy. If that leads to a starting role, then that's great."

The road ahead

For now, the Minutewomen have their sights set on the season opener – an August 25 home match against Texas-El Paso. All in all, UMass will have nine home games in the fall, including the UMass Classic. Georgia, the University of Albany and Long Island University also highlight the non-conference slate, while Atlantic 10 rivals St. Joseph's, Temple, George Washington, Fordham and La Salle will visit Totman Field.

The road schedule will be highlighted by a Sept. 13 night game against regional rival Connecticut at Morrone Stadium in Storrs, CT. UMass will also head west in late September to play Arizona State and San Diego State at a tournament in Tempe, AZ. Other road matches include games at Syracuse, Rhode Island, St. Bonaventure, Duquesne, Dayton and Xavier.

Every day, over 17,000 people pick up a copy of the Collegian and are instantly informed about the important happenings on campus, across the country and around the world.

Get involved with the Collegian!

Every year, scores of new students with an interest in covering news and events come to UMass. And the truth is that surprisingly few of those students take the time to come down to the Campus Center basement and involve themselves with New England's largest college daily. Despite a real need for writers, editors, photographers, graphics personnel and even webmasters, the Collegian remains constantly understaffed and those of us involved in its production must work twice as hard to make up for our semesterly loss of new helping hands.

That is why we would like you, this year's incoming crop of new students, to seriously consider joining the Collegian team. For those of you interested in a career in the field of journalism, there is absolutely no better practical experience that you can gain at this institution. For those with any interest whatsoever in campus involvement, where else can you find an opportunity to meet face-to-face with the movers and shakers of UMass and get the real story on the issues and controversies that surround our school? And even if your passions lie outside the field of reporting, the Collegian offers great resume-building possibilities in everything from advertising sales and design to computer-aided graphic art.

The possibilities for employment at the Collegian are practically limitless!

So when the time comes for you to explore the extracurricular activities UMass has to offer, why not start at the same place where the day of practically every student here starts – with the Collegian!

Write for Arts & Living

Let's face it, you can't spend all of your spare time in college swilling keg beer and scarfing down take-out food. Sooner or later, you'll need to venture out and explore the many movies, plays and concerts that comprise the surprisingly diverse cultural scene of western Massachusetts.

And what better way to dive into the arts and entertainment world than as a writer for the Collegian?

The arts department at this newspaper sends its writers on every sort of assignment imaginable, covering such varied cultural happenings as art openings, improvisational comedies, music festivals and even amusement park openings! An act as simple as opening the mail is an adventure waiting to happen in Collegian arts; inside any given envelope you'll find concert tickets, movie passes or even pre-release CDs to review.

And no one gets closer to the entertainment world than the writers for Collegian arts. When phenomenally popular filmmaker Kevin Smith came to speak at UMass this past semester, our arts writers took up nearly the entire front row and later rubbed elbows with the creator of Clerks and Dogma. Before big name musical acts Bush and the Mighty, Mighty Bosstones took to the local stages, they sat down with writers from the Collegian for personalized interviews. And when new movies are screened in the Pioneer Valley, we're usually at the top of the list for passes and exclusive interviews with both the directors and actors.

So don't just spend your semester playing Goldeneye and watching the Discovery Channel. Come down to the Campus Center basement and jump headfirst into the UMass entertainment scene.

Write for Collegian arts!

Write for Ed/Op

You know the old saying about how opinions are like a certain portion of the human anatomy... everyone has one. But wouldn't it be nice to have a sandbox from which to shout your proverbial two cents – to an audience of over 20,000 people?

That's the idea behind the Collegian Ed / Op page. Whether you have a serious beef with the University and its sometimes unexplainable policies or you just want to rant about how disgusting your roommate is, the Ed / Op page is the perfect place for you to get it all off your chest.

And not only can we get your words and ideas out to the entire student population, you can even get your photo in there as well, so everyone you insult will know exactly what you look like!

Tired of the crummy food being offered in the dorms? Yelling at your television when you see Sick of the slop being shoved in your face in the D-C? Don't even bother complaining to the people doing the so-called cooking. Angry at the fact that you have to stagger home from the bars because no buses run late enough? The drivers themselves couldn't care less.

In reality, there are very few avenues through which to vent your frustrations here at UMass. But fortunately for you, you hold one of the most powerful right here in your hands.

Be heard! Write for the Collegian Ed / Op page!

WRITE FOR COLLEGIAN SPORTS

Interested in sports?
Like to travel?

Every year, the sports department of the Collegian sends sportswriters all over the country to cover events. This semester alone, students traveled to Houston, Iowa City, Seattle, Indianapolis, Notre Dame, Richmond, Philadelphia and even Puerto Rico! And travel is only part of the experience of covering sports for the Collegian; writers get to go behind the scenes and get up close and personal with coaching legends like Tom Penders, John Chaney, Tara Vanderveer, Roy Williams and, of course, Bruiser Flint. And that's not even mentioning the free food, courtside and pressbox seats and special events like team banquets that Collegian sportswriters get to enjoy.

So come on down to 113 Campus Center basement and get involved with Collegian sports. Who knows, you may like the taste of it and end up being the next Marv Albert!

UMass shocks water polo world

Cinderella season ends with fifth at Nationals

By Adam White
Collegian Staff

INDIANAPOLIS, IN – It has been said that a winner is someone who saves his or her best performance for when it counts the most.

Ladies and gentlemen, we have a winner.

The No. 12 Massachusetts women's water polo team shattered all expectations at this year's Collegiate National Championship Tournament, stunning a trio of higher seeded programs en route to a fifth-place finish at the IUPUI Natatorium in early May.

The Minutewomen shocked No. 5 San Jose State 8-4 in Friday's opening round, then gave the Trojans of No. 4 USC a scare before falling in a 10-7 thriller. UMass went on to exorcise some regular-season demons by upsetting No. 8 Princeton 9-6 on Saturday, and finished off the weekend by rolling over No. 6 San Diego State 4-3 on Sunday.

The Maroon and White's finish is the best in school history at the National Tournament. The team also matched its best record ever by finishing 31-8 on the season.

"Placing fifth is basically the same as winning a National Championship for us," said UMass coach Dan McOsker. "If you consider the operating budgets and scholarship money that the top four programs have, they are really on another level. That's why what we've done is so unbelievable."

The entire Maroon and White squad chipped in during the team's unlikely run, as scoring came from players from up and down McOsker's roster. More importantly, the Minutewomen used stellar team defense to keep the high-octane offenses of West Coast powers like San Jose State and San Diego State from sinking UMass.

"Marci Hupp, in my opinion, had the most outstanding tournament of anyone," McOsker said. "Not just by scoring, but by shutting down the best 2-meter players in the country. Sarah Newell was matched up against the team's best driver, who had scored six or seven goals [on Saturday] and she didn't let her score once. But if I had to choose an MVP, it would go to the entire team."

One player who did receive a higher degree of recognition was senior All-American Grogan, who earned a spot on the All-Tournament first team with her five-goal performance on the weekend. The California native finished her collegiate career at the tops of the UMass all-time list in nearly every statistical category possible, including goals (336), assists (231), points (567), steals (343) and ejections drawn (150).

"Katie is definitely one of the best players in the country," said McOsker.

The National Championship ended up in the hands of UCLA, which blasted the Trojans 11-4 in Sunday's final. But the talk of the tournament was undoubtedly UMass, which garnered accolades from nearly every other program for its unlikely top-five run.

"People keep coming up to me and saying 'this is the best thing that could have happened for water polo,'" McOsker said. "I feel like I'm in the movie Hoosiers."

Hockey seeks resurgence as Cahoon takes the reins

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Following a disappointing 11-20-5 season in 1999-2000, the University of Massachusetts decided last March that it would not renew the contract of hockey coach Joe Mallen when it expired in May.

As a result, the Minutemen were a team without a coach for almost a month. However, on April 5, the school named former Princeton head coach Don Cahoon as the next coach in the storied UMass program. A Bay State native, Cahoon attended college at Boston University and has served as an assistant coach at both UMass-Lowell and his alma mater.

Now, with a new coach and a fresh approach, the Minutemen appear ready to make the next step up the ladder of the Hockey East conference.

"I'm looking forward to the challenge. I've come back home to Massachusetts, a place where I was born and raised," Cahoon said. "I've been entrenched and steeped in the tradition of Massachusetts hockey, so this is a real thrill for me."

The new coach has already stressed his desire to compete with the tradition-ladened teams in the conference – Maine, Boston College, Boston University and New Hampshire. The Minutemen have finished no higher than sixth place since joining Hockey East for the 1994-95 season.

"We've got to be able to compete with Boston College, Boston University, New Hampshire and Maine on a regular basis," Cahoon said. "Those are four of the top 10 teams in the country, and I think that we can achieve parity with them. But it's going to take a commitment by the players to buy into our system."

Cahoon also expressed his hope to work on recruiting within the state of Massachusetts. In fact, he already has two New England products committed for the 2000-01 season – Scott Horvath and Mike Warner.

Horvath comes to UMass from Avon Old Farms in Avon, CT. A rugged 6-foot-3, 230 pound forward, he will be looking to jump into action for UMass next season. Warner attended Arlington Catholic, but hails from Waltham who will also be vying for time in 2000-01.

"Scott was about ready to commit [before former coach Joe Mallen found out his contract would not be renewed], but then when there was a change, he wanted to wait and see before securing a spot. He's a kid with great puck skills and shooting ability," Cahoon said. "Mike is a kid who has real good speed and is a great kid across the board. We think that he'll function well as a defensive forward for us."

As far as the coaching staff, Cahoon inherited assistant coaches Dale Dunbar and Bill Gilligan from last year's club. Dunbar has since left to pursue other opportunities in the sport, while Gilligan's status is still uncertain.

However, former UMass volunteer assistant Brian Dennehy is back in the Pioneer Valley. Since Dennehy's departure, he has since been an assistant with Cahoon at Princeton, and was most recently the head coach at Fairfield University.

"When I came in, I inherited Bill and Dale, who I have both known for many years. After talking with Dale, he decided to move in a different direction," Cahoon said. "Bill is still with us, but we're still trying to find out if he's a good fit for the system. It's not about competence, because I know that he can do the job very well. It's about whether or not he's a good fit."

"We brought back Mark, who is a very hard-working, talented and enthusiastic guy. He coached with me at Princeton and was a part of the three most successful teams that I had there," added Cahoon. "He's been here before, so he knows the lay of the land. I'm very enthusiastic to have him."

Another change for next season will be UMass' style of play. It will also be a bit different under Cahoon. In recent years, the Minutemen have employed the neutral zone trap to confuse their opponents. However, Cahoon wants to keep the team open to many different options.

"With a big rink, there are times when using the trap is appropriate. I'm a coach who wants to use a variety of systems depending on the flow of the game, what we're doing, and what the other team is doing," he said. "We're going to be a multiple-look team."

Cahoon also mentioned that he has talked with each returning player, as well as the collective group, since arriving in Amherst.

"I'm really pleased with the kids. They seem to be very receptive and open to a new system," he said. "I think that we're all looking forward to getting started. In fact, I wish it was September right now so we could get going."

Although the schedule is not officially set, Cahoon mentioned the possibility of facing a handful of opponents from each of the other three big conferences. The Hockey East schedule will once again consist of 24 games.

After run for the ages, UMass falls short in 1999

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Four games in, the season was all but over with. The Massachusetts football team was a fluke, the complete definition of a "one-hit wonder."

The Minutemen were 1-3 and hurting.

However, the Maroon and White weren't done fighting. Wearing their pride on their chests and their jewelry on their hands, UMass ran off seven straight wins in the regular season to make its second consecutive postseason appearance.

The piñata came in the form of Northeastern, as the Huskies were beaten and beaten and beaten in a 77-0 thrashing at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium. UMass took four of the next five on the road, knowing one slip, one off-day, meant a December at home. To close out the season, archrival UConn, in its las, game at the Division 1-AA level, were left for the hounds in the season finale. UMass jumped out to a 38-0 halftime lead, coasting to a 62-20 decision over the visiting Huskies.

The Minutemen showed the resiliency of their championship run, where there was no quit, where the fire was constantly peppered, even if by a single man blowing on the flame. Head coach Mark Whipple let them play following a 27-14 loss to Hofstra at home, and play they did.

Playing one of the most memorable games in the program's history, the Minutemen eked out of Greenville, S.C. with a 30-23 overtime victory over Furman. Marcel Shipp, after a second half fumble in the red zone, carried the Minutemen in the overtime period to get on the board first. Then the defense stepped up, stopping the Paladins on four downs to push the end date up a week.

What awaited was what everyone wanted – a date with Georgia Southern. The Eagles were steaming after their title hopes were dashed in a 55-43 loss in the national championship game the season before. They stampeded through the regular season with thoughts of sending the Minutemen home. And that they did.

Adrian Peterson rushed for 333 yards on 32 carries, scoring all five of GSU's touchdowns in a 38-21 win in Statesboro, GA. UMass stayed close for a half, but there was simply too much Peterson down the stretch, as the sophomore standout added four scores to the winning potion after intermission.

UMass must find a way to fill the voids left by a core of seniors that helped put Amherst on the map. Returning is a trio of captains that helped backbone both sides of the ball. Marcel Shipp rushed for 1846 yards and 24 touchdowns. In addition, he caught 54 balls out of the backfield for 336 yards.

However, Shipp must say goodbye to Todd Bankhead, who quarterbacked the Minutemen to back-to-back playoff appearances. The junior college transfer threw for over 3,000 yards, rewriting the UMass record books in just two seasons in the huddle. He will be replaced by Richard Lucero, another IUCO grad, who comes over from Arizona.

Just as the changing of the guard was taking place, the defense said goodbye to six starting seniors, but will return Buck Buchanan Award finalist Kole Ayi and strong safety Brian Smith, who will join Shipp was captains of the squad. Linebacker Joe Ferrer comes over from Notre Dame after playing in all 12 games for the Irish in 1999.

UMass softball wins sixth-straight title

By Jesse Greenspan
Collegian Staff

At the beginning of the 2000 season there was one main problem facing the Massachusetts softball team: how would it going about replacing last year's Danielle Henderson, the winner of the 1999 Honda Award as the best collegiate softball player in the nation?

Even veteran skipper Elaine Sortino, who coached her 1000th game for the Minutewomen on May 9 against Connecticut, didn't have an answer for this one.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Infielder Cherra Wheeler will be one of the top returnees for the Massachusetts softball team in 2000.

"Different," she said, referring to what life would be like without Henderson, who graduated last May and is now a member of the U.S. Olympic team.

Well, things were definitely different for Sortino's freshmen and sophomore-laden squad. The ballclub suffered through a disastrous Fiesta Bowl Tournament in February and a horrible NFCA Leadoff Classic in March that left the Maroon and White with a 1-10 record – this coming from a team that lost only 10 games all of last year.

However, things would get better.

The Minutewomen finally began to come into their own at the Speedline Invitational and the Lady Seminole Invitational, improving their record to 9-16 and surviving the toughest part of their schedule. Games against national powerhouses Stanford, Oklahoma, Hofstra and Arizona State all turned into losses, but those contests gave UMass the experience it needed when it came time for the Atlantic 10 portion of the schedule.

"Psychologically, we came off that trip feeling much better about ourselves than we had in all our previous trips," Sortino said. "Then by design, we took off two weeks, knowing that we'd have a huge laundry list of things that we needed to clean up and get ready."

After the two-week break, the Minutewomen came out rolling. They picked up sweeps of Syracuse, Central Connecticut and Temple, and split doubleheaders with Princeton, Virginia Tech and St. Joseph's to run their record to 18-19. On April 20 against Fordham, UMass surpassed the .500 mark for the first time in the season by sweeping the Rams.

From there, the Minutewomen proceeded to win 14 out of their next 15 games to take home the regular reason Atlantic 10 conference championship for the sixth straight year.

The Maroon and White had gone from a 0-9 team to a 32-21 team, and by verge of their 13-3 conference record, were able to get the No. 1 seed for the Bell Atlantic/Atlantic 10 tournament in May.

At press time the tournament had not yet been completed, but the Minutewomen did advance into the second round with a convincing 10-1 win over Temple.

Perhaps the greatest individual accomplishment of the year for the softball team was the record-breaking performance of freshman first baseman Brandi Cross. Against Rhode Island on May 6, she blasted her ninth home run of the year to break the single season home run record at UMass, and batted an astounding .403. In addition, she was named to the Atlantic 10 All-Conference team, along with senior catcher Nikki Faessler and freshman Emily Robustelli.

Probably the scariest thing about the current team, however, is the fact that everyone but Faessler will be back for the 2001 campaign. This includes sophomore third baseman Cherra Wheeler (11 career home runs), sophomore center fielder Teri Rooney (four home runs in 2000) and the entire pitching staff that did nothing but improve as the season went on. As a result, there is no reason to believe that the Minutewomen will not be crowned regular season champions for the seventh consecutive time next spring.

Women's lacrosse wins A-10 crown

By Matt Foster
Collegian Staff

It was a championship season for Massachusetts' women's lacrosse team, as they won the Atlantic 10 Conference Championship, beating Temple in the final game 3-2, in overtime.

The current A-10 Champion Minutewomen began their season on a rough note, losing their first three games, against Harvard, Cornell and Syracuse, but came back to lose only one conference match-up, to Virginia Tech.
